Top national Republican leaders have told Mr. Steele they want him to succeed Ken Mehlman as RNC chairman in January and are discussing the move with White House chief political strategist Karl Rove.

DOJ_NMG_0093639

Other top Republicans, including Mr. Rove, think Mr. Steele should be rewarded for what was widely regarded as his high-quality campaign for the U.S. Senate, even though black Marylanders remained loyal in numbers to the Democratic Party on Tuesday to elect Mr. Steele's white opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Mr. Steele, 48, sounded ready, even eager, to assume a post somewhere within the party, and to steer a GOP course distinguishable from the one that has disillusioned many voters in recent years.

"The GOP must return to efficient government, to appropriate spending priorities that are not out of line, that don't create deficits, that speak to a strong national defense without failing to understand the need for diplomacy, and the things that will keep this country strong," he said.

"My campaign opened up a lot of eyes about how we can be effective on the ground in urban communities and diverse communities across the country, and hopefully I'll have something to offer," Mr. Steele said.

Mr. Mehlman, as reported yesterday in The Washington Times, has decided to step down at the end of his two-year term when the RNC convenes its annual winter meeting in January in Washington.

Party campaign strategists and elected officials generally agree that Mr. Steele has the political experience, personality and campaign skills to continue a career in politics -- which is precisely what many in the Bush administration would like to see.

Spokesmen for the administration occasionally point out that President Bush has appointed more black, Hispanic and other minorities to top-level posts than any other president.

Mr. Steele is said to be especially popular with the 165-member RNC -- made up of 50 state party chairmen and an elected committeeman and committeewoman from each state.

"I will be happy if he decides to run for national chairman," Florida Republican Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan said. "I served with him on the [national] committee when he was the Maryland chairman. He's one of us."

He also appears to have unqualified support from top Republicans in his own state.

"Michael would be an excellent chair," said Joyce Lyons Terhes , an RNC member from Maryland. "He is admired and respected by the members of the committee who got to know him when he was chairman of the Maryland GOP."

Others were more reserved in their judgment.

"Steele was an excellent candidate in Maryland, and his experience from that race should be a tremendous asset to the party if he succeeds Ken Mehlman as chairman of the RNC," Texas RNC member Bill Crocker said. "However, I just don't know enough about his background and basic philosophy to know whether or not he would be the best choice to succeed Mehlman."

Mr. Crocker said the national chairmanship "is going to be critically important to the well-being of the Republican Party in the foreseeable future, and we need the very best we can put there."

Some backers of Mr. Steele fear that a two-year stint as RNC chairman and therefore chief defender of Mr. Bush and his polices will undermine his future in politics by tying him too closely to a president of uncertain popularity.

But as of now, Mr. Steele doesn't sound like a partisan pit bull defending the White House.

"This election was a show of a lack of confidence in the leadership and the direction of the party and the administration," he said. "I think that as a party we need to address that."

Mr. Steele is finishing up his first and only term in elected public office, though he had been an elected county and state party chairman.

He said he has "not heard from anyone" at the White House and has not entered any serious talks with the RNC.

"There has been no serious offer or anything put on the table," Mr. Steele said. "I have just for the last few days been enjoying being at home and actually getting reacquainted with the family."

Mr. Steele has one son in college and another about to enter college, and employment in the private sector might be an attractive financial option at this point, friends say.

Cabinet secretaries earn $183,500 year.

The RNC "chairman's salary equals what the speaker of the House makes, which is roughly $200,000 a year," RNC Communications Director Brian Jones said.

And Mr. Steele said he is not finished with politics.

"Losing is something that it strengthens me. I learn from it," he said. "It doesn't mean you won't win future races."

Corporate Donors Increased Their Support For Dems (USAT)

Big business hedges bets

Democrats won the most expensive midterm election in history with stronger financial support from big business.

DOJ_NMG_0093640

Democratic congressional candidates amassed $616 million vs. $632.2 million for Republicans in the 2005-06 election cycle, according to figures through Oct. 18 from the Center for Responsive Politics.

Corporate donors traditionally favor Republican candidates. In the last midterm contest in 2002, Democrats raised $248.6 million vs. Republicans' $342.2 million.

While Democrats attracted money from longtime supporters, such as trial lawyers and labor unions, they also drew a greater share from industries that lean Republican, such as pharmaceuticals. Some businesses may have been hedging their bets as a Democratic victory appeared more likely late in the campaign.

"The reality is they have to play both sides," says Sheila Krumholz, the center's acting director.

The total cost of the 2006 federal election was an estimated $2.8 billion, a 27% jump over 2002, the center says.

Topping the list of Democratic donors was the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which funneled 97% of its $2.2 million in contributions to Democrats. The union supports such Democratic-backed causes as raising the minimum wage.

The Association of Trial Lawyers of America kicked in $2.1 million, 95% to Democrats. The group is battling Republican efforts to limit big payouts in personal-injury cases.

"We're in favor of holding negligent actors accountable when their actions cause harm and injury," says Linda Lipsen, the group's senior vice president for public affairs.

Other big Democratic donors include the entertainment and publishing industries.

Media giant Time Warner channeled 71% of its $1.4 million in contributions to Democrats, the center says. The firm supports tougher digital copyright protections to prevent piracy.

The center's figures on top donors include political action committees and employees, such as top executives, and are based on government filings through summer.

Other Republican-leaning companies balanced out their giving. Wal-Mart Stores sent 31% of its $988,000 in donations to Democrats, up from 19% in the 2004 election. "We partner with elected officials from both sides of the aisle," says Wal-Mart's David Tovar. "We're finding doors are open to us across the political spectrum."

Wal-Mart is a strong supporter of free trade, an issue generally championed by Republicans.

Wall Street brokerages tilted more Democratic this year, giving 51% of their $48.2 million in political donations to Democratic candidates, up from 48% in 2004.

The industry favors extending lower capital gains taxes and bolstering retirement accounts.

Republicans Lose Ground Among Hispanic Voters (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Democrats perceived as being on 'right side' of immigration issue

WASHINGTON — Republican gains among Hispanic voters evaporated in Tuesday's elections, and some party leaders are blaming harsh rhetoric on immigration for the reversal.

Cutting into the Democrats' traditional advantage among Hispanic voters was a key to both of President Bush's election victories. In 2004, when Bush was at the top of the ticket, 44% of Hispanics surveyed after they cast their ballots said they voted Republican. This year, the figure dropped to 29%.

The decline is significant because Hispanics are fast becoming a crucial voting bloc. Census figures show Hispanics make up at least 10% of the population in 11 of the 28 U.S. House districts that switched from Republican to Democratic hands on Tuesday.

Strategists from both parties say the vocal opposition of some Republicans to a proposed immigration bill that would give many of an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship drove Hispanics back to the Democratic camp.

"This time there is no doubt they felt Democrats were on the right side of the immigration issue," says Lionel Sosa, a Hispanic ad executive who has advised Republicans. One of the Democratic Party's top-ranking Hispanics, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, agrees. He says Bush's decision to bow to conservative pressure and sign legislation authorizing construction of 700 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexican border "sent a terrible signal."

Bush backs citizenship for many of the people who are here illegally, as do a number of potential 2008 GOP presidential candidates, including Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas. But House Republican leaders blocked a path to citizenship in the immigration bill and GOP conservatives such as Indiana's John Hostettler made their opposition a campaign issue. Some members of the party believe that backfired.

"There has been too much of an anti-immigrant tone," says Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart, R-Fla., a Cuban immigrant. He argues that Hispanics are "a natural" Republican constituency because they are entrepreneurial and socially conservative. But

Diaz-Balart adds, "When people start to perceive that immigrants are being put in the same category as a threat to national security, it's hard to get your message across."

In Hostettler's close race, the six-term congressman appeared with representatives of the Minutemen, a controversial citizens group that has been patrolling the border, and ran ads touting his opposition to "the nightmare of amnesty." In Arizona, Republican Randy Graf ran an advertisement showing a blond-haired child walking toward a slowly opening door as a voiceover delivered statistics about crime and other problems caused by the nation's "open door" border.

Both Hostettler and Graf lost, a point likely made by House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi when she talked to Bush Thursday. She asked for his help in passing a bipartisan immigration bill when she and fellow Democrats start running Congress in January. "Those candidates who ran largely on immigration did not succeed," she says.

Gabrielle Giffords, the Democrat who defeated Graf, also carried Cochise County, Ariz., along the U.S.-Mexican border where frustration with immigration is highest. Gifford says she believes voters there preferred her because "people want solutions, not slogans."

Immigration could be key in a House race still to be decided. In Texas, GOP incumbent Henry Bonilla is in a runoff with Democrat Ciro Rodriguez, a former lawmaker, in a district where more than half the population is Hispanic.

Bonilla is one of only two Hispanic lawmakers who backed a controversial House bill that would make it a crime to assist illegal immigrants. He says he's taking a get-tough approach to protect his border constituents from crime and illegal drug trafficking.

But Sosa, who lives in the district and describes himself as Bonilla's friend, worries that some Hispanic residents may misinterpret his stand. "I have told him that in my opinion he should soften his position," Sosa says.

He says the election results don't mean the GOP has lost the Hispanic vote. "It means Republicans need to have a much higher sensitivity about how Latinos feel about their worth and the worth of immigrants," he says.

For Latino Voters, Best Years Are Ahead (USAT)

Commentary By Marisa Treviño

USA Today, November 10, 2006

With another election completed, one has to wonder whether the much-hyped strength of the Latino vote is a reality or simply a spin on the classic fairy tale The Boy Who Cried Wolf.

Exit poll results from Tuesday's elections show an increase in Hispanic voting from 2002. Those results appear to confirm a pre-election report by the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO), which predicted that Latinos would make up about 6% of the vote. That's at least one percentage point up from 2002, but hardly enough to get excited about.

A Pew Hispanic Center fact sheet titled "Hispanics and the 2006 Election" provides some interesting perspectives on why Hispanics might, in fact, be a powerful voting bloc that just hasn't yet arrived.

Hispanics eligible to vote are a smaller portion of the Hispanic population — as compared with other racial/ethnic groups — because many adults are not citizens, and many citizens haven't reached voting age. Only 39% of Hispanics are eligible to vote, according to the Pew study, compared with 77% of whites, 65% of blacks and 51% of Asian-Americans.

So are all the predictions of Latino voting clout to be dismissed? No. They're just premature. The coupling of Hispanic youth and technology just might change the equation. The U.S. Census reports that last year about a third of the Latino population was younger than 18. Couple that fact with a report by the Pew Internet & American Life Project that found English-speaking Hispanics use their cellphones to access the Internet and to text message in greater percentages than any other race or ethnicity.

Armed with this data, the non-partisan Voto Latino, which aims to increase Hispanic voter participation, has targeted young Latinos by entering their world of cellphone text messaging and online social networks, such as MySpace. A simple text message from an interested Hispanic youth, or anyone for that matter, prompts an immediate response on how to get a voter registration form. Voto Latino registered about 38,000 people from September to the end of October.

Maria Teresa Petersen, executive director of Voto Latino, says 50,000 Latinos turn 18 every month in the USA. Eighty-seven percent of them are eligible to vote. One can quickly see the potential in these numbers.

Though Hispanics historically have had a poor civic participation rate, the immigration reform protests this year could be a sign of things to come. Exit polls this week showed that Hispanics voted heavily Democratic, in part because of the immigration debate.

The voices heard this past Tuesday will only grow louder in the years to come.

Immigration Losers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

Republicans on Tuesday managed both to lose their majority in Congress and alienate a fast-growing bloc of Latino swing voters. Other than that, the House GOP strategy of trying to save itself by bucking President Bush and using immigration as a wedge issue worked pretty well.

Republicans can't say they weren't warned. Like trade protectionism, the immigration issue is the fool's gold of American politics. Voters like to sound off to pollsters about immigrants, yet they pull the lever with other matters foremost in mind. Elections seldom if ever turn on immigration, and the GOP restrictionist message so adored by talk radio, cable news and the nativist blogosphere once again failed to deliver the goods.

Worse, this time Republicans made "securing the border" a loud national theme, only to do nothing about it save for approving a 700-mile fence along a 1,951-mile Mexican-U.S. border. They thus managed to highlight either their fecklessness in failing to do something about an allegedly urgent problem, or their cynicism in raising it at all.

In Arizona, which is ground zero in the illegal alien debate, two Republicans defined by their opposition to immigration were defeated by wide margins. Representative J.D. Hayworth, who is so proud of his desire to turn the U.S. into a single gated community that he wrote a book about it, lost handily. So did Randy Graf, another anti-immigration absolutist who ran for an open seat in a district that borders Mexico and sees more illegal immigrant traffic than perhaps any other Congressional seat in the nation.

These Democratic gains came in solidly Republican districts that President Bush won easily two years ago. Mr. Graf was seeking to fill the slot now held by Representative Jim Kolbe, an 11-term Republican who's retiring. Mr. Kolbe is a supporter of the comprehensive approach to immigration reform favored by the President but spurned by GOP restrictionists. It would combine more border security with a guest-worker program for newcomers and a path to legal status for undocumented workers already here. Mr. Kolbe won 60% of the vote in 2004. Mr. Graf was trounced, 54%-42%, on Tuesday, after having won a primary against a Republican with views similar to Mr. Kolbe's who could have held the seat.

Indiana incumbent John Hostettler, who chairs a House subcommittee on immigration and is one of his party's most outspoken restrictionists, managed to win just 39% of the vote in his losing bid for a seventh term. Mr. Hostettler's district is so Republican that John Kerry won only 38% of the vote there in 2004.

Colorado Congressman Bob Beauprez made opposition to illegal aliens the centerpiece of his gubernatorial bid. He lost to his Democratic opponent by 15 percentage points. The GOP candidate who ran to replace Mr. Beauprez in the House and appropriated much of his anti-immigration rhetoric also lost by nearly as much.

GOP Senate candidates who thought immigration would put them over the top were disappointed as well. The issue didn't help the cause of challengers like Tom Kean in New Jersey and Mike McGavick in Washington state, both of whom tried to make illegal aliens an issue down the stretch but still lost to vulnerable Democratic incumbents. Nor was it the silver bullet for Pennsylvania's Rick Santorum, who fell 59%-41%. Senator Santorum spent the summer trying to link Mexican immigrants to the Iraq war. By the end of the campaign, he was accusing anyone who favored comprehensive immigration reform of being soft on terrorism.

In addition to losing seats, however, the GOP's restrictionist strategy has reversed significant gains among Latino voters. Exit polls show that 70% of Hispanics voted Democratic in House races this year. Meanwhile, some 29% voted Republican -- an eight-percentage-point drop from the 2002 midterm, and down 15 points from the 44% won by President Bush in 2004 (which had improved from 31% in 2000).

The GOP has a long history of fumbling the immigrant issue. And Mr. Bush, a former border-state governor who knows the issue well, has wisely been trying to steer his party away from repeating those mistakes. Mr. Bush might yet save his party from losing generations of Latinos the way its xenophobic message in the early 20th century turned away Irish, Italian and Asian voters for decades. He told reporters this week that immigration is an area where "I believe we can find some common ground with the Democrats."

We hope his party lets him, having learned the hard way not to follow Lou Dobbs, Bill O'Reilly and the editors of National Review magazine down the garden path to defeat.

Recount Likely In Harris' House District (AP-Y)

By Phil Davis, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

The touch-screen voting machines Katherine Harris championed as secretary of state after the 2000 presidential recount may have botched this year's election to replace her in the U.S. House, and it's likely going to mean another Florida recount.

More than 18,000 Sarasota County voters who marked other races didn't have a vote register in the House race, a rate much higher than the rest of the district, elections results show.

Florida Secretary of State Sue Cobb sent a team to Sarasota County on Thursday to observe the expected recount and audit the county's touch-screen voting machines. The county's elections supervisor, Kathy Dent, had requested the team after one of the candidates reported complaints about voting machines malfunctioning.

Earlier, Dent defended her staff and the machines, arguing that the thousands of voters must have either overlooked the race — which was pushed to a second screen by a glut of minor U.S. Senate candidates on the ballot — or simply decided not to vote for either candidate in a race marked by mudslinging.

"My machines have recorded accurately for 40 elections," Dent said.

But she couldn't explain why the undervote rate in her county was so much higher than in the four other counties in the district.

Republican Vern Buchanan declared victory in the race with a 373-vote lead over Democrat Christine Jennings — less than 0.2 percent.

"Sarasota voters have been victimized by not having their votes count," Jennings said Wednesday.

Buchanan's campaign said a recount would confirm their candidate won.

"We want to ensure every vote is counted as well," Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts said.

Florida law requires a machine recount if the difference between the top candidates is less than half a percent. If the machine tallies find a margin of less than a quarter percent, a manual recount is conducted.

To do a manual recount for touch-screens, officials go back over the images of the electronic ballots where the machine didn't register a choice. But state rules essentially say that if the machine doesn't show that a voter chose a candidate, the voter is assumed to have meant to skip the race — it would be tough to prove otherwise.

Final results must be certified by Nov. 20.

Harris, a congresswoman since 2002, ran for U.S. Senate this year but lost to incumbent Bill Nelson.

As secretary of state in 2001, Harris had pushed for an election overhaul that outlawed the punch-card ballots involved in the 2000 presidential race recount that made Harris a GOP star. The law now required counties to use touch-screen devices or optical scan machines that read paper ballots voters filled in.

Harris spokeswoman Jennifer Marks said Harris had no comment on the House race.

In Florida, Echoes Of 2000 As Vote Questions Emerge (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla., Nov. 9 — A Democrat who narrowly lost the Congressional race here is seeking a recount after dozens of people reported problems using Sarasota County's touch-screen voting machines and a significant number of ballots had no recorded votes in the high-profile race.

The Democrat, Christine Jennings, lost to her Republican opponent, Vern Buchanan, by just 373 votes out of a total 237,861 cast — one of the closest House races in the nation. More than 18,000 voters in Sarasota County, or 13 percent of those who went to the polls Tuesday, did not seem to vote in the Congressional race when they cast ballots, a discrepancy that Kathy Dent, the county elections supervisor, said she could not explain.

In comparison, only 2 percent of voters in one neighboring county within the same House district and 5 percent in another skipped the Congressional race, according to The Herald-Tribune of Sarasota. And many of those who did not seem to cast a vote in the House race did vote in more obscure races, like for the hospital board.

More than 100 voters have told the Jennings campaign that their votes for her did not show up on the summary screen at the end of the touch-screen voting process, and that they had to re-enter them. The candidate's lawyers said they feared that not everyone had noticed the problem or realized that they could re-enter the vote.

"There is a spontaneous combustion of outcry in this county," said Kendall Coffey, a lawyer who was on Vice President Al Gore's legal team in the 2000 presidential recount and is now working for Ms. Jennings. "We are determined to do everything we can to make sure that every vote counts and everything we can to get to the bottom of this."

A recount will almost certainly be conducted because the vote was so close. State law requires machine recounts when the margin of victory is half a percentage point or less, and manual recounts when it is a quarter of a percentage point or less. But it is not clear that a recount can recover a vote that was never properly recorded.

The Florida Elections Canvassing Commission, which includes Gov. Jeb Bush and two other state officials, both Republicans, will meet Monday and decide whether to order a recount. Secretary of State Sue M. Cobb announced Wednesday that she would send a team to conduct an audit of the county's voting system.

Any recount results would be certified on Nov. 20, said Sterling Ivey, a spokesman for the Florida Department of State. In a manual recount of touch-screen voting results, Mr. Ivey said, canvassers try to determine whether voters who skipped making a selection in a certain race did so unintentionally.

But Rebecca Mercuri, a computer scientist and an expert on voting technology in Hamilton, N.J., who has been critical of electronic voting, said it would be impossible to figure out voter intent in a recount of touch-screen votes.

"If a vote is not recorded electronically inside the machine for whatever reason, there's no way to go back and recover it," Ms. Mercuri said. "Chances are that nothing's going to change, because those votes are gone."

A preliminary review by The Herald-Tribune found that if Ms. Jennings had won the same percentage of the 18,000 missing votes as she did among counted votes in Sarasota County, she would have won the race by about 600 votes instead of losing by 373.

Ms. Jennings, a banker, and Mr. Buchanan, a car dealer, ran a bitter and costly race to replace Representative Katherine Harris, who left her seat to run for Senate but lost by a landslide on Tuesday. Ms. Harris, a Republican, was Florida's secretary of state during the disputed 2000 presidential recount, supervising a balloting process widely considered flawed and certifying President Bush as the winner of Florida's electoral votes.

Mr. Buchanan declared victory early Wednesday and began preparing for his new job, but Ms. Jennings has refused to concede. She has not ruled out going to court, Mr. Coffey said, but she will first wait for a recount to be completed.

Some state officials, including Ms. Dent, the elections supervisor, theorized that many voters skipped the Congressional race because they were turned off by vitriolic campaigning. But Mr. Coffey said if that had been the case, other counties in the same Congressional district would have had similarly high "undervote" rates.

So many voters reported similar problems in the state's early voting period, Mr. Coffey said, that the Jennings campaign wrote a letter to Ms. Dent expressing concern. He said the results showed that an even larger portion of early voters — 20 percent of the total — did not vote in the Congressional race. By contrast, only 2 percent of voters using paper absentee ballots skipped the race, he said.

Mr. Coffey said Ms. Jennings wanted independent experts to come test the county's iVotronic voting machines, made by Election Systems and Software of Omaha. Ms. Dent did not return a call seeking comment on Wednesday.

"I don't think any of us would be satisfied with having the government do the verification," Mr. Coffey said, "because, honestly, the government appears to be part of the problem here."

Mike Lasche, a boat captain here, said that when he voted his vote for Ms. Jennings did not show up on the final review screen until he cast it a second time.

"If I had not checked carefully I would have gone on without ever thinking about it," said Mr. Lasche, 50. "You have to wonder how many people it happened to and may not have even noticed it."

Voters Say Yes To Borrowing Billions For New Projects (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Voters were in a borrowing mood this week.

State and local governments won approval for more than 88% of the $78.6 billion they asked to borrow in Tuesday's election, according to i-Deal, a New York company that tracked the results.

The money will be spent on schools, roads, sewers, fire stations and other projects.

California voters approved the biggest chunk of debt: $43 billion for five bond issues for roads, schools, flood control, parks and affordable housing.

"California is now leading the country in seriously addressing infrastructure needs, and we'll continue that," says Adam Mendelsohn, deputy chief of staff for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Big bond issues approved elsewhere:

·Wake County, N.C. Voters approved borrowing $970 million to build 17 schools, buy land for 13 others and improve another 100 buildings in the county, which includes Raleigh.

·Dallas. Voters approved borrowing $1.4 billion for parks, streets and libraries. The Cotton Bowl football stadium will get a $30 million renovation, and the local farmer's market will get a $6.6 million upgrade.

·The Hartford, Conn., area. Voters approved borrowing $800 million to start a massive sewer upgrade to stop untreated sewage from flowing into streets and rivers after heavy rains.

The biggest bond issue to fail: Los Angeles' proposal to borrow $1 billion to build affordable housing.

State and local governments now owe $1.9 trillion, up 8.2% from a year ago, the Federal Reserve Board says. By comparison, the federal debt is $4.9 trillion.

In the past 60 years, voters have approved 74% of the money requested in bond issues, according to Thomson Financial, a research firm. This year's rate will approach the record of 91.4% approval in 2004.

"States have the capacity to handle this debt. I'm not worried," says David Hitchcock, a credit analyst at the Standard & Poor's credit rating agency. He says governments, especially in the booming West, must build infrastructure to handle growing populations. Most bond issues are repaid from property taxes, and higher real estate values have made it possible to borrow more without raising tax rates, he says.

Issues driving voter approval:

·"The American people are clamoring for relief from traffic congestion," says Matt Jeanneret, senior vice president of the American Road and Transportation Builders Association.

·"People are weary of overcrowded schools," says Ed Davis, superintendent of schools in Union County, N.C. Voters there approved borrowing $174 million to build five schools.

Chris Edwards, director of tax policy at the libertarian Cato Institute, says he's surprised so many bond issues passed in a year of voter discontent. "Voters don't seem to understand that bonds are taxes," he says. "There's no such thing as a free lunch in economics."

Iowa Governor Declares For '08 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Nov. 9 (AP) — Gov. Tom Vilsack began a long-shot bid for the White House on Thursday.

"Americans sent a clear message on Tuesday," Mr. Vilsack, a Democrat, said. "They want leaders who will take this country in a new direction. They want leaders who share their values, understand their needs and respect their intelligence. That's what I've done as governor of Iowa, and that's what I intend to do as president."

His announcement came two days after the midterm elections, which put Democrats in control of both the House and the Senate for the first time in a dozen years.

Mr. Vilsack, a two-term governor, filed documents with the Federal Election Commission in Washington to create a presidential campaign committee. His campaign started operating, with an office open and letterhead printed. His campaign Web site, tomvilsack08.com, was online by early Thursday.

He is the first Democrat to file for the presidency, although a number of better-known candidates are presumed to be running.

Although the favorite son in Iowa, Mr. Vilsack has trailed the other potential candidates in early polling, among them Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee and former senator from North Carolina.

Mr. Vilsack plans a multistate tour beginning Nov. 30 to announce his bid formally. The first stop will be his hometown, Mount Pleasant, where he served as mayor and which he represented in the Iowa Senate before being elected governor in 1998.

On the Republican side, Representative Duncan Hunter of California has announced the formation of an exploratory committee. About a dozen other candidates, including Senator John McCain of Arizona and Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, are weighing bids.

McCain Plans A Committee To Study '08 (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

Senator John McCain of Arizona is about to form an exploratory committee for a possible presidential campaign, advisers said, taking a concrete step toward a full-blown campaign in 2008.

Advisers to Mr. McCain said he had not made up his mind whether to run, although he has acknowledged that he is strongly considering doing so.

"There's not going to be a formal announcement this year," John Weaver, an adviser to Mr. McCain, said. The senator, who appears at or near the top of public opinion surveys about who should run for higher office, will wait until the Christmas holidays, when his children are home, to make a final decision, Mr. Weaver said.

"It's incorrect to characterize it as a formal decision or a final decision," he said.

Even so, the move is likely to speed up an already accelerated presidential race, in which candidates on both sides barely waited for the midterm elections to end before leaping ahead to the next campaign.

The sudden shift in power in Congress does not appear to have slowed the rush. On Thursday, Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa declared his intention to run; other Democrats, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, have said they are thinking about it and have made trips to Iowa, the home of the first caucuses.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, widely considered the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, has been more coy about her intentions. Mrs. Clinton used her minimally contested Senate re-election campaign as an excuse to avoid questions about the presidency until last Tuesday; since her landslide victory she has said she is taking a break before addressing 2008.

But Mrs. Clinton has put together an imposing apparatus for a possible presidential bid and has more than $13 million left over from her nearly $38 million Senate campaign to roll into a national race. To spend that money on presidential activity, she would need to take the legal step of forming an exploratory committee along the lines of the one Mr. McCain is establishing.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers have said she is likely to make her intentions clear in December or January, although her financial advantage — particularly her expected ability to raise money down the road — gives her the option to wait until later.

Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is leaving office, and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, both Republicans, are also preparing for possible campaigns, although neither has taken any formal legal steps.

Mr. McCain's advisers said he was moving forward with a committee — likely to be formed next week, and almost certainly by the end of the month — because he did not want to skirt regulations that forbid using money from his existing political action committee toward presidential costs, even preliminary ones like travel.

"He's preparing in case he does choose to run and gauging whether he has the support in order to make a successful run," Mr. Weaver said. "And in order to do that, we'll meet all legal requirements." He said that Mr. McCain had about $1 million in his Senate coffer, Friends of John McCain, which is transferable.

Election Doesn't Shutter Clinton Campaign Offices (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election race may be over, but she is hardly closing up her campaign shop or worrying about deep debts.

Advisers to Mrs. Clinton say she has more than $10 million left in her political bank account, not to mention a priceless reservoir of speeches, issue research, and financial networks nationally for any future use.

Her advisers also say that she does not intend to disassemble her campaign apparatus and staff, as many candidates do when an election ends, nor does she plan to immediately close her New York City and Washington campaign offices.

Indeed, the Clinton camp has spent months building a re-election team that could easily shift into gear for a 2008 presidential bid. Fresh from her landslide victory, and with a fistful of I.O.U.'s from winning Democratic candidates nationally, Mrs. Clinton is comfortably positioned as she prepares to enter an important period of strategy talks, reading and reflection while deciding whether to run.

The millions left in her campaign account have helped fuel chatter about a presidential bid among supporters in the last few days because that money could be used for political activity if she chooses to run.

Also stirring talk about her presidential ambitions was a memo sent out on Wednesday by a senior Clinton lieutenant that highlights the senator's political gains on Tuesday in traditionally moderate and Republican areas of New York.

Mrs. Clinton is expected to make a decision on a presidential bid this winter, and there has been slightly more open discussion about 2008 between her inner circle and outer circle advisers in the last couple of weeks, members of both groups said this week. Still, some advisers and donors to Mrs. Clinton say that they do not see any urgency or signs about 2008 decision-making.

"She's so strongly positioned that she can set her own timetable for any decision she might make," said Alan Patricof, the finance chairman of her re-election campaign. "She hasn't asked anyone specifically to be at the ready; if and when she does that, it'll mean that she's in a mode to move forward."

Even if she does nothing in coming weeks, she still looms over the 2008 race: Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa even called her this week to give her a heads-up that he was planning to seek the Democratic presidential nomination, advisers to both of them said. Mr. Vilsack is a longtime admirer of Mrs. Clinton, his advisers said, and he is well aware that she has the standing and money to mount a formidable campaign.

Howard Wolfson, a Clinton adviser, said there were no specific plans for spending the rest of the campaign's money. He said he was not aware of any plans to dismantle the campaign staff, nor of plans to help other Democrats retire their election-year debts. At the same time, he did not rule out debt relief.

"Senator Clinton did everything she could to be as helpful as possible to candidates in the last cycle, and I'm sure if there are other things she can do to be helpful in the future, she will be," Mr. Wolfson said.

At least one of Senator Clinton's possible rivals in 2008, should she win the Democratic nomination, is already taking steps in that direction. Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who campaigned for more than 35 candidates this year, is looking into the campaign debts of Republicans and expects to help some candidates retire debt, according to his spokeswoman, Sunny Mindel.

Mr. Giuliani is also making his first postelection foray to a presidential swing state, Pennsylvania, on Sunday, where he will give a speech on leadership, hold a brief news conference, and dine privately with a group of young entrepreneurs, according to organizers of the event at Wilkes University.

Advisers to Mr. Giuliani said they did not expect him to announce a candidacy for the presidency during the visit, noting that it had been on his schedule for many weeks.

Clinton advisers said she had no major political travel plans or speeches in the near future. Democratic strategists with ties to the Clinton camp say the next several weeks will be a particularly sensitive time for potential candidates like Mrs. Clinton on issues like Iraq, because their fellow Democrats in the House and Senate are assembling a governing agenda and message.

For now, at least, the Clinton team has been focused on assessing the victory in New York, drawing lessons from it and thanking supporters, as Mrs. Clinton did during a statewide tour on Wednesday.

Patti Solis Doyle, a chief campaign aide and longtime adviser to Mrs. Clinton, sent e-mail messages to supporters on Wednesday to note political high points of her victory: She won 61 percent of the vote upstate, compared with 48 percent in her 2000 race, and she won 64 percent of independent voters, up from 46 percent in 2000.

"Even as she campaigned for her own re-election, Hillary headlined 131 events in 57 different cities on behalf of other Democrats," Ms. Solis Doyle wrote, underscoring Senator Clinton's national profile as well.

"President Clinton had made 97 campaign stops by last weekend, and has probably done another 10 since then."

The fact that Mrs. Clinton drew only slightly fewer votes than Eliot Spitzer, the successful Democratic candidate for governor, also drew her advisers' attention. A criticism that has been made of Mrs. Clinton is that she is a polarizing figure, certainly more than Mr. Spitzer, who is broadly popular. Yet she won 67 percent of the vote compared with his 69 percent.

"That's a very, very strong indicator of how Hillary can sell herself to voters, in New York and nationally," said one Clinton adviser, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to discuss 2008. "She's within two points of Eliot — the most popular guy in state politics — yet you would've thought that more people would be gunning for her than for Eliot. Yet she convinced people to be with her."

The '08 Race For The White House Begins (CQ)

By Craig Crawford

CQ Weekly, November 11, 2006

The coming presidential campaign will be the most wide open in eight decades. The future of a war is at stake. There is the potential to elect the first woman, the first African-American — or even, possibly, the first African-American woman.

To most of the political world, the 2008 presidential campaign will be considered under way this week. But, in fact, activity on the hustings in the battleground states, those with the early nominating contests, began within weeks of the day George W. Bush was re-elected in 2004.

In the wake of this week's elections, the margins of control are so narrow that establishing a firm rule over the nation's direction will not be feasible until the 44th president of the United States is elected on Nov. 4, 2008.

If Tuesday's elections were the midterms, consider 2008 the final exam. And what a brutal test it should be.

By definition, any presidential election makes history. But this one is shaping up as the biggest, baddest, meanest and, quite possibly, the most historic race for the White House in at least a generation.

With Vice President Dick Cheney unambiguously ruling out a bid, the stage is set for an epic battle without an official heir apparent on either the Democratic or Republican side.

"It's the first cycle since 1928 with no incumbent president or vice president running for the White House," said University of Virginia political science professor Larry J. Sabato. "As a result, we are seeing the earliest campaigning ever, by the most candidates in both parties."

The 2008 contest began so early that we already have a dropout. Last month, former Gov. Mark W. Warner of Virginia said he would not be running after making several forays into Iowa, New Hampshire and other early-voting or big-money states — and earning standing among the pundits as a member of the emerging Democratic field's top tier.

In Iowa, site of the first nominating test, more than two dozen potential presidential contenders from both political parties—including 10 percent of the current governors and 12 percent of the current Senate—have already racked up more than 100 campaign trips there since the last election. And the pace is picking up in early-primary states such as New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Many of the White House hopefuls set up their federal exploration committees long ago. As a group, they have already raised a cash total that is now climbing above the tens-of-millions range. Permanent staffs have been hired. Direct-mail campaigns are under way. Consultants have designed logos, tested slogans and even made bumper stickers.

Civilians not accustomed to the guerrilla warfare of a presidential campaign might well think it is amazingly early for so many candidates to be so active. Not so. To win the biggest political prize on Earth, it pays to start now. Indeed, those who have not at least begun testing the waters by now might already be too late — so much of the big money and so many of the smart campaign people having already been spoken for.

Lining up top-shelf strategists and policy experts almost becomes a primary campaign unto itself at this early stage.

Hillary Rodham Clinton is set to inherit the bulk of her husband's constellation of political stars, James Carville first among them. And John Edwards has won the services of a top rural strategist, Dave "Mudcat" Saunders. But many of the major Democratic operatives, while quietly placing their bets on potential candidates, are hedging those bets until Clinton makes a final decision on whether to run.

On the Republican side, John McCain is mainly sticking with the team he assembled for his run in 2000 and has added some interesting names on the policy front, among them former Clinton administration drug czar Barry McCaffrey. Mitt Romney, though, scored a coup in signing on Mike Murphy, who was McCain's top adviser last time. George Allen attracted the services of GOP super-nova Mary Matalin and former Republican Party Chairman Ed Gillespie.

But nobody has won the biggest prize of all in this subcampaign — the ear of Karl Rove, the president's longtime political Svengali, who has painstakingly avoided even hinting at who he might help, or even whether he will join the fray at all. No Exaggeration

Would-be presidents are scrambling to the field so soon thanks to a genuine power vacuum in both political parties. For once, it is not hyperbole to call an election one of the most important ever, as politicians tend to say every four years — especially when it's their moment to make history.

Republicans must debate what to do after the Age of Bush, a period that featured two decades of party rule by a single family — George W. Bush's two presidential terms following the four years that his father, George Bush, spent as president starting in 1989.

A threshold question for Republicans in their nomination struggle will test the fate of social conservatism's influence. President Bush built a victorious coalition squarely founded upon the support of evangelical Christians, who are one of the most effective grass-roots players in the history of American politics. But their intensely conservative social agenda disturbs enough Americans that many Republicans, including some of the major 2008 contenders, are eager to make this next campaign about moving the GOP toward the center.

Much will depend on who among the Republicans will claim the mantle of social conservatives' darling, which the president himself will be shedding, and whether that person will possess Bush's skill at leveraging the religious base without narrowing his appeal to the rest of the electorate.

On economics, Bush has struggled to bridge a widening gap between Wall Street and Main Street, and the next nominee will be pressed to manage that rift. This tension was at the root of the roiling Republican debate over immigration, for instance. Big business, with Bush at its side, pushed GOP congressional leaders for changes aimed at legalizing the status of millions of immigrants. But rank-and-file Republicans balked in a fury, scuttling the Bush initiative.

The officially leaderless Democrats, for their part, will be in search of someone who can pull the party's varied factions together into a winning coalition — a task that even this week's sweeping victory might not come close to accomplishing.

Trickiest for the crop of Democrats running for president will be how to win over the legions of party activists who want to immediately withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq. It will be tempting for candidates to get on the good side of these voters, who are likely to dominate the primary balloting, but the obvious risk is being tagged by Republicans as weak on national security, a brand that has hobbled the party more often than not since Vietnam.

Of course, the best-case scenario for both party's candidates would be for the Iraq War to become a non-issue in the 104 weeks before Election Day 2008. But even if the Bush administration some day does begin significantly reducing troop levels, it seems a remote possibility that Iraq will not remain a national headache in two years.

The stakes for the country in the next election are as high as they are for the political parties. Polls show that voters are disgusted with the country's direction. With two years of bitterly divided government ahead of them, the voters are likely to be even unhappier when they choose the next president.

Look for the White House race to echo much of what was heard in the midterm elections, a tug of war between stay the course or time for a change. Republicans must offer some change, while making the case for keeping the status quo of a GOP-held White House. Democrats must argue for change, but without scaring people.

They have 14 months until the votes are counted in the living rooms, cafes and schoolhouses of Iowa. And then at least two people, one Republican and one Democrat, will start moving toward a place in history. They will probably come from the roster of people, a baker's dozen from each party, whose current strengths and weakness — political, ideological and financial — are sketched in alphabetical order below. The Democrats

Evan Bayh — Junior Senator, Indiana

Rationale: A red-state darling and the son of another Democratic senator from Indiana — Birch Bayh, who sought the presidency in 1976 — this telegenic graduate of Washington's prestigious St. Albans School is a proven vote-getter in his home state, winning two terms as governor (he served from 1989 through 1996) of a state that Democrats have not carried in a presidential campaign since the Johnson landslide of 1964. A dedicated centrist and a senator since 1999, he served from 2001 to 2005 as chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, the middle-of-the-road policy group once headed by Bill Clinton and Joseph I. Lieberman. In a blitz of campaigning for Democratic congressional candidates in 25 states this year, he has aggressively positioned himself as a Washington outsider, telling stump audiences, "The gulf between our nation's capital and the people of our country has never been greater."

Resources: With more than $10 million in his account, Bayh should have no trouble meeting the cover charge to run a credible nomination campaign. His home state's relative proximity to all-important Iowa will help him muster a network of grass-roots activists. His frequent trips to Iowa and New Hampshire in the past year have attracted local media interest and favorable comments. And his movie-star looks helped make an instant hit of his profile on the popular Facebook.com, drawing more than 2,000 "friends" to sign up.

Hobby Horse: Stressing fiscal responsibility, lower taxes, job creation and lean government, this is one Democrat who hopes to dodge the liberal label so often pinned on his party brethren in national campaigns. His Capitol Hill voting record shows that, until recently, he sided with President Bush on key issues more often than not.

Hobble Horse: Coming across as a mild- mannered Midwestern deacon is not what presidential campaign audiences expect — and in Washington, he is viewed as an intellectual lightweight. To compensate, Bayh asks Democrats, "Do we want to vent, or do we want to govern?" He might find that primary voters prefer venting.

Joseph R. Biden Jr. — Senior Senator, Delaware

Rationale: A Democrat who talks the way many people talk, Biden's vernacular style is frequently on display in his many appearances on radio and television news shows, such as his regular gigs with syndicated host Don Imus. Despite spending more than half of his life in the Senate, the world's most elite political club — he arrived in 1973, when he was 30 — he seems to have a genuine instinct for middle-class sensibilities. Before the Iraq War, most Americans knew him from a series of bruising Judiciary Committee battles for Supreme Court nominations as he delighted liberals with his ferocious assaults on Republican presidents' choices. In past years his seat on the Foreign Relations Committee afforded him the chance to travel frequently to Iraq and stand out as one of the most vocal critics of the Bush administration's handling of Iraq.

Resources: Biden never has faced genuinely difficult re-election races in Delaware, a small state where he has not needed to develop a large financial donor base — at least by presidential campaign standards. This has left him chronically unable to raise enough money to match his White House ambition, which manifested itself in a short-lived run in 1988 and dalliances almost ever since. Still, his popularity with broadcast news producers and personalities gives him a tool for reaching voters that most rivals envy.

Hobby Horse: Despite voting for the 2002 resolution authorizing the Iraq War, Biden dissects the war's subsequent troubles with relentless passion and a knack for explaining his views in ways that average folks can grasp. And he takes great delight in pointing out that recent White House policy adjustments track his own longstanding suggestions.

Hobble Horse: If Biden could raise big bucks he would have been a serious contender in any of the last several presidential campaigns. And despite his average-Joe demeanor in public, his 33 years in the Senate — along with his reputation as the very model of a long-winded lawmaker — tag him as a creature of Washington. So, too, would the target-rich database of thousands of roll call votes from which opponents could cherry-pick.

Wesley K. Clark — Retired General

Rationale: In an era of national security concerns that could last a generation, a retired four-star general who has been around the presidential-campaign block should be a most attractive commodity. Now a contributor to the conservative-leaning Fox News Channel, Clark has the opportunity to develop general- election appeal by reaching many voters who distrust the Democrats. Although unsuccessful in what experts deemed a disorganized 2004 bid for the Democratic nomination, he performed well enough to earn the undying loyalty of moderate voters attracted to his background as West Point graduate, wounded Vietnam veteran and NATO commander during the Kosovo conflict. Having run before and established modest political credentials, Clark — lacking experience as an elected official — might not be at as much of a disadvantage in a second run.

Resources: Raising $30 million in his first outing on the presidential field was not too shabby, but so far Clark has not begun to put together a serious war chest. Since most of his 2004 campaign funds came from individual donors, thanks to an effective Internet program, it is likely that he could raise plenty of start-up cash quickly if he decides to run again. But the major-league Democratic donors have shied away from him so far.

Hobby Horse: As the only potential contender in either party with such a distinguished military résumé, Clark commands attention as long as voters rate the war in Iraq as a top concern. His experience in handling the Kosovo conflict and helping negotiate the Bosnia peace accord give him unrivaled credibility.

Hobble Horse: Although Clark's lack of experience holding elective office is a plus to some voters, it is likely to remain a hindrance in the eyes of media and political elites. And he has not effectively used his time since the last campaign to shore up his credentials on the domestic front.

Hillary Rodham Clinton — Junior Senator, New York; former First Lady

Rationale: Having evolved from Goldwater girl to first lady to player on the mighty Senate Armed Services Committee, Clinton is better known and more road-tested than any of her rivals and is by far the most politically viable woman ever to ponder the presidency. She is hugging the ideological center to shed the liberal, big-government image she acquired in a failed attempt during her husband's presidency to radically change the nation's health care system. But now she is tacking rightward, backing federal legislation against flag burning, refusing to recant her vote in 2002 to authorize the Iraq War — even sounding a distinctly centrist tone on abortion. And she seldom misses an opportunity to emphasize her conservative Republican roots growing up in the Chicago suburbs. A recent HBO documentary about Barry Goldwater prominently featured pictures of her as one of his teen supporters along with interviews of her warmly praising the father of modern conservatism.

Resources: Insiders say she will tap former Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe, a longtime Bill Clinton fundraiser, to oversee a nomination campaign with a donor budget expected to at least double the record-shattering $100 million that George W. Bush stockpiled in 2000. She has surprised observers by spending so much on her shoo-in second term Senate campaign, however, which means that she will not have as much left over for a presidential bid as she could have — and has fueled speculation that she might not actually run.

Hobby Horse: Clinton is a passionate policy wonk with a think tank to prove it. Founded three years ago as a refuge for Clinton administration alumni, the Center for American Progress has become an emerging force within the Democratic Party, sometimes outdoing the party's congressional leaders in taking on the Bush administration.

Hobble Horse: A stilted and sometimes boring performer on the stump, she pales in comparison with her husband when it comes to revving up crowds. And she seems cozier with the many Hollywood stars who are flocking to her cause than with the average folks she most needs to win over.

Rationale: Call it buyer's remorse, the notion that a nation once so high on George W. Bush might possibly embrace the man who led the Senate Democrats for a decade but lost his bid for a fourth term in South Dakota in 2004 after going toe-to-toe with the White House throughout the president's first term. Now that Bush is at rock bottom with voters, perhaps they would see Daschle's partisan warring — once so successfully targeted as "obstructionist" by the Republicans — as a badge of honor worth a belated reward. Grass-roots Democrats especially might be receptive to repaying a debt to Daschle. And with the pivotal state of Iowa neighboring his home state, he has a chance to play a role akin to that of the martyred favorite son in the first nominating contest of 2008.

Resources: As Democratic leader, Daschle was able to raise $20 million for his 2004 race back home, or $51 on every vote cast. Building the even more substantial war chest required for a presidential campaign could be an uphill struggle without the platform of an influential Capitol Hill post to help attract donors. Despite launching a new political action committee last year and testing the waters with trips to Iowa and New Hampshire last summer, Daschle has not revved up his fundraising sufficiently to convince skeptics that he can get his groove back on the cash front.

Hobby Horse: Daschle can argue that he was out front against Bush when it was hard, when the president was rated so high in the polls that many Democrats ran for the hills. And from his perch at the Washington lobby shop of Alston & Bird LLP, he has an opportunity to maintain access to party fundraisers who favored him in those heady days as a Senate leader.

Hobble Horse: Having pulled out of an expected presidential race last time, when he was at the height of his influence, Daschle could easily be written off as a has-been and a loser. Although a recent stint debating former GOP House Speaker Newt Gingrich in California earned them both points for across-the-aisle creativity, it seemed to make both men look very retro.

Back to top

Christopher J. Dodd — Senior Senator, Connecticut

Rationale: In an era when liberal Democratic partisans see the party's move to the ideological middle of the road as caving in to conservatives, Dodd is the true-blue alternative to centrism. Although he voted in favor of authorizing the war in Iraq, Dodd's liberal credentials are solid. He has a 91 percent support rating from the AFL-CIO and sided with President Bush only one-third of the time on the Senate floor last year. Dodd is a popular speaker in Democratic circles, easy-going and humorous even while hurling verbal spears at the opposing party. Within his robust résumé as a senator since 1981 — and as chairman of the Democratic National Committee from 1995 until 1997 — Dodd has the tools to bolster his case.

Resources: Dodd has raised more than $1 million to fund contributions to Democratic campaigns in the midterm election, but it will take much more to seriously get into the presidential game. Corporate givers are not fond of his longstanding opposition to their pet projects, such as restricting shareholder and class action lawsuits. Still, his home state is home to many wealthy givers, and his politics should appeal to the Hollywood money crowd.

Hobby Horse: Although he's a liberal, he is a pragmatist known for cutting deals at the last minute to shape legislation that he opposes more to his liking. In 2005, for instance, he gave in to Republicans on a bill to restrict class action lawsuits after winning concessions from them.

Hobble Horse: Another New England liberal might not be the ticket Democrats are looking for after walking the plank in 2004 with John Kerry of Massachusetts. And Republicans in Florida would have a field day with his strong support for opening up relations with Cuban dictator Fidel Castro.

John Edwards — former senator, North Carolina; 2004 vice-presidential nominee

Rationale: As one of the few political figures on the national stage who routinely talks about fighting poverty, Edwards was a natural for the debate on helping the impoverished citizens of the Gulf states after Hurricane Katrina hit a year ago. His come-from-nothing personal story — the first in his family to go to college, he became a multimillionaire personal-injury trial lawyer before his election to the Senate from North Carolina in 1998 — makes him the genuine article when it comes to appealing to the middle class. One of the most popular speakers on the Democratic chicken-dinner circuit, Edwards is keeping a high profile outside Washington. He impressed Beltway insiders weary with Democratic waffling on the Iraq War when he wrote a Washington Post op-ed last year plainly stating that he was wrong to vote for authorizing the war while in the Senate.

Resources: Edwards raised $2.5 million for his One America Committee in the 2006 election cycle, funding a full-time staff and other expenses for one of the most aggressive PACs of the presidential wannabes. As happened at the outset of his 2004 run for the Democratic nomination, his seed money — nearly $1 million — comes from lawyers, presumably drawn to Edwards' own background. Broadening that donor base will be a major objective for him.

Hobby Horse: Edwards is all but living in Iowa, where a poll last June showed him in first place, ahead of Hillary Rodham Clinton. Iowa insiders say he has natural appeal in the state — the Des Moines Register endorsed him in 2004 — and might have won the presidential caucus if he had maintained a stronger grass-roots organization.

Hobble Horse: Washington's political insiders tend to dismiss Edwards as a poor performer on the 2004 national ticket who came across as a lightweight in the debate with Vice President Dick Cheney and could not even help carry his home state of North Carolina.

Russ Feingold — Junior Senator, Wisconsin

Rationale: The ultimate insider-acting-like-an-outsider, Feingold often breaks ranks with his party and sometimes the entire Senate. The campaign finance overhaul enacted in 2002 over the objections of the leadership in both parties is known as the McCain-Feingold law. Perhaps the most uncompromising liberal in the Senate, Feingold's name appears as the only dissenter in the occasional Senate roll call. His lone-ranger status forever endeared him to civil libertarians in 2001, when he cast the single vote in the Senate against the counter-terrorism law dubbed the Patriot Act — and did so just six weeks after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. More recently, party leaders refused to even seek a vote on his resolution to censure Bush for ordering "warrantless" surveillance.

Resources: Even Democratic Party insiders grumble that Feingold goes too far in spurning the campaign finance system by refusing to accept most forms of outside money, even before McCain-Feingold took effect. Still, he has managed to raise more than $2 million for his presidential exploration fund, most of it from individual donors. The law he helped write could level the playing field to his advantage, as rivals must play by the rules he set.

Hobby Horse: No one in the presidential field for both parties has a better track record for advocating clean government, even when his stands irritate his own party's leaders. Voters cynical about corruption in Washington should find him to be a refreshing exception and tireless champion.

Hobble Horse: Feingold's social liberalism — he opposes the death penalty and supports gay marriage — delights his loyal followers, but it could be a devastating target in a general election and severely limit his reach into middle America. He didn't help matters by once referring to Greenville, Ala., as a place of "check-cashing stores and abject trailer parks."

Al Gore — former Vice President; 2000 presidential nominee

Rationale: Revenge-minded Democrats could have a champion in Gore if they want a do-over of the 2000 presidential election, which many believe he actually won. After wandering in the wilderness after that bitter loss, Gore re-emerged to popular acclaim as George W. Bush was tanking in the polls. It is tough to discount his claims that the United States would not be mired in Iraq if he had become president. And he restored some of the old luster by starring in a critically acclaimed film, "An Inconvenient Truth," alerting audiences to the dangers of global warming. While once rejecting any notion of another race, Gore has recently cracked the door open a bit. Party insiders believe that he will definitely run if Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton opts out.

Resources: Gone are the heady days when Gore, as the two-term incumbent vice president under Bill Clinton, raised well above $100 million for his second presidential campaign. (He first ran in 1988, the year he turned 40, when he was a freshman senator from Tennessee.) Four years ago, when he toyed with another try, many of his financial backers abandoned him, a major factor in his final decision to sit out the 2004 campaign. If Gore joined the 2008 field, associates say he would shun the big bucks — out of necessity — and try to make it an asset by running as an outsider.

Hobby Horse: Global warming and the environment enthuse Gore like no other topic, although some observers note that he failed to make those issues much of a priority while he was vice president. On the Iraq War, he parted with Bush and most congressional Democrats in vehemently opposing the invasion early on.

Hobble Horse: Endorsing Howard Dean for president in 2003 was a sign to some Democratic insiders that Gore had simply lost his way, reducing his appeal to the party's fringe elements. And his global warming obsession is not viewed as a big enough platform to revive a presidential bid.

John Kerry — Junior Senator, Massachusetts; 2004 presidential nominee

Rationale: The preferences of a few counties in southern Ohio cost Kerry the electoral votes that would have made him president last time. Since he came so close against an incumbent, he could put it over the top in a race for an open seat in the White House — especially considering that, since the 2004 election, the country has turned against Bush on the war in Iraq. Battle-worn from that race, the 22-year senator from Massachusetts says he has learned crucial lessons in how to run against Republicans. Primarily, he vows to fiercely defend attacks, evidenced by his initial refusal to apologize last week when Bush assailed him for joking that young Americans must get educated or "get stuck in Iraq." Instead, Kerry counterattacked, calling the president's aides hacks who are "willing to lie." He apologized for the gaffe the next day.

Resources: Money is the least of Kerry's problems. He raised nearly $350 million for his last presidential campaign and nearly $6 million in the 2006 cycle for his political action committee, Keeping America's Promise. His personal wealth, mostly from the fortune of his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, came in handy in his first national run, when he infused his Iowa caucus campaign with his family money in the final days and eked out a win that propelled him toward the nomination.

Hobby Horse: Kerry has determinedly used his Senate platform to extend his campaign against President Bush and fuel another presidential bid. He turned much of his 2004 campaign policy agenda into a legislative agenda. Just a few weeks after that election, for instance, he retooled his campaign health proposals into the first bill that he introduced.

Hobble Horse: Last week's imbroglio over what Kerry himself termed a "botched joke" — which, to many, appeared to suggest that American soldiers are uneducated — was yet another reminder to Democrats of how clumsy he can be on the stump. It forced him off the campaign trail as fearful Democratic candidates canceled his appearances.

Barack Obama — Junior Senator, Illinois

Rationale: Right now he holds one of the hottest cards in American politics, his initial flirtation with a 2008 campaign generating so much enthusiasm that media pundits have labeled the nation beset with "Obama fever." With his deep baritone voice and Lincolnesque physicality, he has Oprah Winfrey swooning and Democrats cheering, attracting massive audiences on a White House exploration itinerary thinly disguised as a book tour. Although Obama once flatly ruled out a presidential bid so early into his first Senate term, on NBC's "Meet the Press" last month he acknowledged that he could well change his mind. On paper it would seem much too early in his career for such a run, but when you are holding such hot cards it is tempting to play them.

Resources: Anyone who can stir the waves as he has done usually finds that the money flows in. He raised $15 million for what was a cakewalk 2004 Senate campaign and more than $4 million this year for a federal political action committee that presumably would become his presidential exploration fund. Obama's biggest PAC contributors come from organized labor, and it seems he delivers, already earning a 100 percent support rating from the AFL-CIO for his Senate votes.

Hobby Horse: Obama has captivated the imagination of baby boomers in an ironic way, by arguing in his new book, "The Audacity of Hope," that it is time for American politics to move beyond them and the polarizing issues of their growing-up years in the 1960s. His forward-looking message clearly resonates with many Americans.

Hobble Horse: Although many political experts say the country would be open to electing an African-American president (his father is from Kenya, his mother is a white woman from Kansas), it would be a racial gamble for the Democratic Party to nominate only the third black senator since Reconstruction. And his far-from-ripe career on the national stage, while evoking memories of a youthful Jack Kennedy, is bound to give pause among some voters.

Bill Richardson — Governor, New Mexico

Rationale: For starters, ethnicity and geography argue in favor of Richardson, a Latino governor in a battleground state that backed Al Gore in 2000 but George W. Bush in 2004. Add to that his varied Washington experience — 14 years in the House plus four years in the Clinton administration, first as U.N. ambassador and then as Energy secretary — and on paper you have the ingredients for national office. Richardson is a larger-than-life character who is charming on the stump. On policy matters, he is a pragmatist who remains quite popular in his politically fluid state, recently winning kudos for making good on a 2003 campaign promise to save taxpayers $90 million in state budget costs. Governors do well in presidential contests, which is enough of a reason to consider Richardson a player.

Resources: Richardson raised more than $8 million for his bid for a second term as governor this year, a sizable sum in New Mexico politics. And his shoo-in standing in that race has allowed him to spread his money around to other Democrats in the state, always good for earning chits to solidify his home-state base in a presidential campaign. Also, the bulk of his campaign funds come from business interests instead of big labor, a good talking point for any Democrat in a general-election bid.

Hobby Horse: Richardson earned foreign- policy credentials as the ambassador to the United Nations, troubleshooting hot spots from Iraq to North Korea, and he also can emphasize his popular management of New Mexico and tout what is expected to be a lopsided re-election victory.

Hobble Horse: Richardson's closet is not entirely clean. At a minimum, a presidential bid will again bring to light his brush with the Monica Lewinsky scandal, in which he reportedly offered her a job, and revelations that for years he erroneously claimed to have been drafted as a pitcher by the Kansas City A's.

Tom Vilsack — Governor, Iowa

Rationale: Vilsack's hopes are pinned to a four-letter word: Iowa. As the outgoing governor of the state that has the first presidential nominating contest, he owns the place. Democrats take note that he was the state's first governor from their party in 32 years. In recent years he has worked hard to broaden his portfolio with a heartland-focused message assailing Washington's pork barrel spending and arguing for an end to what he derides as corporate giveaways in federal budget and tax policies. He has a strong working knowledge of economics and knows how to appeal to middle class pocketbook worries. His wife, Christie, is a talented politician in her own right and was instrumental in helping John Kerry win the Iowa caucus last time.

Resources: Vilsack raised more than $6 million for his successful 2002 re-election bid, with contributions from business groups edging out labor donors. He has raised a bit more than $2 million for his current political action committee but would need much more to convince party bosses that he can move into the major leagues of fundraising.

Hobby Horse: As one of a handful of governors in the race from either party, Vilsack is well-positioned to run against Washington at a time when voters seem disgusted by corruption in the nation's capital. And he intends to make his views of the excesses of federal spending one of his primary targets in a presidential campaign.

Hobble Horse: Another Iowan, Sen. Tom Harkin, demonstrated in his 1992 presidential bid that being a favorite son might be enough to win the state's nominating caucus, but it was much discounted by the national media and proved not to be anything close to a momentum generator for the New Hampshire primary.

Back to top The Republicans

George Allen — Junior Senator, Virginia*

Rationale: A Ronald Reagan conservative with George W. Bush's down-home style, Allen has deep appeal to those social conservatives who dominate Republican presidential nominating contests. His background as Virginia governor and a solid conservative voting record during his term in the Senate present a powerful résumé. A year ago, Allen was seen as a top prospect to inherit the conservative chair in GOP circles. But a bruising re-election bid this year against Democrat Jim Webb has seeded ample doubt. Still, his troubles could be a blessing if he wins a second term. Despite his gaffes on the campaign trail and charges of racism in his past, Allen always could argue that these matters have now been vetted fully and dodge further discussion in a presidential run. All bets are off, of course, with Allen's loss this week.

Resources: There once was no doubt that Allen, a fundraising machine, could fund a credible presidential campaign — until his Senate re-election campaign foibles surfaced. Raising almost $14 million for his current race, much of it from outside Virginia, Allen had hoped to save a chunk of the money as seed funds for a White House run. But, instead, he has had to shovel the bulk of it into television ads in a last-minute effort to save his seat.

Hobby horse: Before his political skills were called into question this year, Allen was seen as a major talent on the stump. Never considered much of a policy wonk, he has served the GOP well on the political front, such as his successful management of the Senate Republicans' 2004 campaign team.

Hobble Horse: Even some Republicans privately say that Allen is not too bright, an image reinforced by his stumbling this year on the campaign trail. With his loss on Tuesday, Allen will likely be seen as damaged goods. And his tough race kept him tied down in Virginia, unable to travel the country earning the favor of other Republicans.

* see note at the top of this story

Sam Brownback — Senior Senator, Kansas

Rationale: Brownback has an opening to seek the social conservative mantle in Republican politics, especially if Sen. George Allen loses his re-election bid in Virginia — and with it his viability for 2008. Brownback is no poser on issues of concern to evangelical Christians, who have grown restive about the Republican Party's real commitment to their cause. In Brownback, they would have a true believer who passionately denounces what he sees as the decay of American culture and has made the championing of social conservatism a centerpiece of his decade in the Senate. He has remained steadfast in opposition to stem cell research — a litmus test for anti-abortion conservatives, who view the harvesting of embryonic stem cells in the cause of medical breakthroughs as the destruction of human life. While others in his party are looking for room to wiggle toward the center on that and other socially divisive issues, Brownback has stayed put. None of his potential 2008 rivals can beat his ties to politically active religious leaders on the right.

Resources: Although he raised a respectable $2.7 million for his breezy Senate re-election campaign in 2004, Brownback has no experience in the major leagues of presidential campaign fundraising. His current political action committee, Restore America, raised just under $600,000 over the past two years. But if he can ignite the evangelical grass roots for a White House drive, Brownback could overcome a money deficit.

Hobby Horse: Brownback has cultivated Mideast credentials since the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks when he began making use of his standing at the time as the top-ranking Republican on the Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations panel. Since then, he has developed a reputation for expertise on Afghanistan and the Muslim world.

Hobble Horse: As a darling of the religious right, Brownback might have a leg up for the GOP nomination, but his appeal in a general election could be quite limited. Pragmatic Republicans would likely argue this case against him in the primary campaigns.

Bill Frist — Senior Senator, Tennessee; Majority Leader*

Rationale: Before his stunning promotion to majority leader four years ago, Frist was seen as the heir apparent to President Bush's command of the Republican Party. Many say he was handpicked by the White House for the top Senate job. Despite a lackluster-at-best performance during his four years as GOP leader — and his decision to retire from his Tennessee seat at year's end — Frist can still argue that his résumé as a transplant surgeon and his political base in the South keep him in the running for 2008. He has struggled to balance his party's ideological divide. On the one hand, he pleased social conservatives when he set a Senate vote to overturn Florida court rulings that allowed the comatose Terri Schiavo's husband to have her life support removed. But he irritated evangelicals by taking a strong stand in favor of stem cell research — and in opposition to the Bush White House.

Resources: A very wealthy man, thanks to his own surgical prowess and a family fortune in the hospital business, Frist is comfortable and persuasive among the super-rich who fund major political campaigns. He raised nearly $6 million for his 2000 re-election and, naturally, health industry donors led the way. In the 2006 cycle, he has raised more than $7.5 million for his political action committee. If he runs for president, Frist could be one of the better-funded candidates in the field.

Hobby Horse: Frist is working hard to regain the trust of social conservatives after parting company with them on stem cell research. He got out front in the drive to ban same-sex marriage, even though it was a non-starter in the Senate. He knows that winning over the evangelicals is his first order of business for renewing interest in his presidential prospects.

Hobble Horse: The Senate got little done on his watch, and many conservatives hold him responsible for failing to enact their agenda. And as he tries to make it up to them, moderate Republicans accuse him of pandering to the right wing. Washington insiders who were once so high on his chances now all but write him off.

* see note at the top of this story

Newt Gingrich — former Speaker of the House, Georgia

Rationale: In a twist on Jimmy Carter's 1976 campaign slogan, "Why Not The Best?," Gingrich could use as his campaign tag line the rhetorical question, "Why Not The Past?" And why not, indeed? Gingrich, who led Republicans to control of the House in 1994 for the first time in 40 years, could be just the one to revive his party's winning spirit. With one of the sharpest minds in politics and policy, he can outtalk anyone in the game. And none of the party's current problems, from the Iraq War to the swirl of scandal around lobbyist Jack Abramoff, can be laid at Gingrich's doorstep. He's been out of politics since he resigned his House seat eight years ago, giving him the right to chide his party for losing its way, as so many grass-roots Republicans seem to think has happened. All he needs is a new contract with America.

Resources: Having been out of politics and the fundraising game for so long, Gingrich might have trouble getting up to speed. But when he was at the top of his game, as Speaker in 1996, he amassed more than $6 million for one of his more competitive House re-election races in suburban Atlanta. He has kept up ties with the money crowd as a popular speaker on the convention circuit, where well-to-do business leaders congregate.

Hobby Horse: Gingrich gives no ground when it comes to national security, arguing that the nation is already embroiled in World War III and should act accordingly. Although concerns about terrorism were not at the top of the agenda during his days in power, he has written several books about war and misses few opportunities to join the national debate.

Hobble Horse: Some think that Gingrich just talks too much, sometimes sounding like a nutty professor, and is much too eager to be provocative even at the risk of being misinterpreted. Social conservatives distrust him, and it doesn't help that he's on his third marriage. And the last big campaign he ran, the 1998 midterm, was a big enough bust for the GOP that it forced him out as Speaker.

Rudolph Giuliani — former mayor, New York City

Rationale: No one has ever moved from a city hall to the White House, but Giuliani could be the first for one reason: He still basks in the glow from his role as "America's Mayor" five years ago, when his considered but forceful stewardship of New York City after the Sept. 11 al Qaeda hijackers' attacks on the World Trade Center earned him comparisons to Winston Churchill and prompted Time magazine to name him "person of the year." Other hallmarks of his eight years as mayor, such as fighting crime and cleaning up Times Square, bode well for making his case as a competent manager. He is a sought-after speaker on management topics. And perhaps most important to his political ambitions, Giuliani has tirelessly trooped around the country to leverage his star power stumping for Republican candidates. Despite his moderate social views, he has made a sincere effort to reach out to religious conservatives and talk in personal terms about his own beliefs.

Resources: Giuliani raised $2.4 million for his political action committee, Solutions America, in the 2006 season and gave nearly a half-million dollars to GOP candidates or other campaign committees. Among the home states of his donors, Florida and Texas are in the top five, a positive sign that he can tap the deep wells there for Republican cash. Still, he is untested as a national fundraiser.

Hobby Horse: Competence will be Giuliani's best argument. He takes pride in having run the nation's largest city and surviving the experience well-remembered as an able manager who actually got some things done. And his earlier days as a crime-fighting federal prosecutor could be cited as a credential for fighting terrorists.

Hobble Horse:Giuliani's views on abortion rights, environmental protection and other domestic issues are far to the left of the typical GOP voters' And his personal life, to put it mildly, is something of a mess. He has been married three times and his last divorce sparked a tabloid frenzy of charges and countercharges. Main Street Republicans and evangelical Christians might find it all a bit much to handle.

Chuck Hagel — Senior Senator, Nebraska

Rationale: Call him the new John McCain. With two Purple Hearts earned as an Army infantryman in Vietnam and cozy relations with the press corps, Hagel comes across as the Republican maverick that McCain once was — before he began courting President Bush and the party's conservative wing. Early on, Hagel was a rare GOP voice in opposition to Bush's handling of the Iraq War. He did not let up, despite extreme pressure from party leaders to cool it. As a result, he is a favorite Republican to many Democrats. But he is no wild-eyed liberal, having once voted to overturn the Roe v. Wade protection of a woman's right to an abortion. For a presidential campaign, geography favors him: His home in Omaha is practically within walking distance of Iowa.

Resources: With just over $1 million raised by his political action committee during the 2006 cycle, Hagel shows no signs of being a campaign-finance powerhouse. He easily won re-election in 2002 with a modest $1.6 million in campaign funds. Chances are that if Bush and his friends have anything to say about it, Hagel will not be tapping a lot of traditional GOP resources. He has been a thorn in the president's side, and payback is probably on its way.

Hobby Horse: For Hagel, the word is maverick. In an era when voters are disgusted with blind partisanship, he is about as independent as they come. Like McCain and Rudolph Giuliani, his best argument to Republican primary voters is that he could appeal to a wide swath of general-election voters.

Hobble Horse: Plenty of GOP conservatives would rather set themselves on fire than see Hagel win the Republican nomination. They see his persistent criticism of the Iraq War as treason within his party, if not to the nation as a whole.

Mike Huckabee — Governor, Arkansas

Rationale: If teaching Americans how to lose weight can make you president, then Huckabee is a shoo-in. After being diagnosed with diabetes in 2003, he set upon a life-changing course of eating less and running more. Now 110 pounds lighter than when he began his exercise and diet regimen, Huckabee last year published a book about his experiences, titled "Quit Digging Your Grave With a Knife and Fork." As governor, he has argued that promoting healthier living, among both citizens and state workers, ultimately saves taxpayers millions of dollars in medical expenses. Huckabee's weight-loss evangelism comes naturally. He is a Baptist minister accustomed to inspiring others. As Bill Clinton demonstrated, you do not get to the top of Arkansas politics and stay there without knowing how to charm a crowd. And Huckabee, who has been governor for a decade (and was lieutenant governor for three years before that), gets high marks as a crowd pleaser.

Resources:Huckabee raised $2.3 million for his last governor's campaign, in 2002. The bulk of his money came from Arkansas business interests and only a little more than 10 percent of his funds came from out of state, suggesting that he might have some difficulty financing a national race. Although Huckabee might possess some of Clinton's charisma, he does not share his fellow Arkansan's knack for fundraising.

Hobby Horse: In a party so dominated by religious conservatives when choosing presidential nominees, Huckabee's status as a Baptist minister should get him a hearing. He and his wife, Janet, entered into a "covenant marriage," a popular movement among evangelicals in which couples agree to limited legal grounds for divorce.

Hobble Horse: A penchant for granting pardons went awry for Huckabee when he released a convicted rapist, Wayne Dumond, who then committed a murder in Missouri. Look for this story to get plenty of play if Huckabee becomes a credible presidential candidate.

Duncan Hunter — Congressman, California's 52nd District; Chairman, Armed Services Committee

Rationale: In these times of national security worries, there is nothing like an ex-Army Ranger to the rescue. In the halls of Congress, where he's been since 1981, Hunter still comes across as a trained combatant. At the helm of the House Armed Services Committee for the past four years, he has earned a reputation as a blunt and ferocious advocate for the military, especially when it comes to protecting the troops from budget cuts. When the Bush White House wanted to redesign the nation's intelligence hierarchy, the president, the vice president and many others in the administration had to personally lobby Hunter to back off his firm stand against it. He finally signed on when satisfied that the changes would not threaten the access of soldiers in the field to intelligence data.

Resources: Considering the squads of defense lobbyists who traditionally swarm the Armed Services panel's offices, running from the Rayburn Building is a fine platform for raising money, and Hunter has mustered war chests in the $1 million range for each of his last three re-election bids — none of which has been remotely close. But if Republicans lose control of the House, Hunter would lose his chairmanship and not be in as strong a position to raise money.

Hobby Horse: Beyond his solid credentials as a defense hawk, Hunter presents a social conservative portfolio that has appeal in GOP presidential primaries. He has long sponsored legislation to ban abortions. And now that building a fence along the Mexican border is in vogue, he can point out that he has proposed doing so for years.

Hobble Horse: Hunter is a powerhouse on Capitol Hill, but outside Washington and his Southern California district he remains a complete unknown. Perhaps he is expecting to have plenty of time to get outside the Beltway and build name recognition after Tuesday.

Back to top

John McCain — Senior Senator, Arizona

DOJ_NMG_0093657

Rationale: As close to a Republican heir apparent as anyone gets in the 2008 field, McCain has done his best to earn that title from tradition-minded voters in his party. His positioning as a straight-talking maverick continues to give him clear general-election appeal, so his challenge is winning over social conservatives to get the GOP nomination. Independent voters and more than a few Democrats flocked to his initial presidential campaign. At the risk of losing some of those voters, McCain has courted religious conservatives and buried the hatchet from that bitter rivalry for the GOP nomination six years ago. The result has been a swell of conventional wisdom in Washington that sees McCain as the party's most likely nominee. Look for the president himself to give that nod at some point if all goes well between the two former rivals.

Resources: Money was tight for McCain toward the end of his 2000 nomination bid, which played a role in his ultimate loss to the massively funded Bush machine. But no one on the horizon for 2008 seems able to duplicate what Bush accomplished, opening the way for McCain to play the role of the presumed nominee and attract the attendant onslaught of cash.

Hobby Horse: While the corruption scandal brought on by convicted ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff primarily tainted the Republican Party, it could make GOP voters all the more eager to nominate McCain, who has earnestly built a squeaky-clean image — he was, of course, a principal author of the 2002 campaign finance overhaul — despite himself getting caught up in the "Keating Five" savings and loan scandal of the 1980s.

Hobble Horse: Age and health are the biggest worries for McCain. He would be 72 on Inauguration Day 2009, meaning he would be the oldest person to become president. (Ronald Reagan was just shy of his 70th birthday when he first took the oath.) And although McCain says his bout with skin cancer is behind him, it left marks on his face that — along with injuries he suffered as a prisoner of war in Vietnam — deny him the appearance of robust health that Reagan projected.

George E. Pataki — Governor, New York

Rationale: The governor's mansion in Albany was a good enough launching pad to get Theodore and Franklin D. Roosevelt into the White House — but it proved lousy for Mario Cuomo, who had to shelve his national ambitions in 1994 after losing his bid for a fourth term to Pataki, then a relatively obscure state senator. That upset earned Pataki the awe of Republicans nationally. They have watched him ever since, and his stewardship of the state — cutting taxes and creating jobs — has not disappointed them. (He's not seeking a fourth term of his own this year.) After the attacks of Sept. 11, Pataki was in the national spotlight, side by side with Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, demonstrating a calm competence that made their party proud. Instrumental in bringing the 2004 Republican Convention to New York, Pataki on paper is ready to play an even bigger role at the next convention.

Resources: The state of New York by itself has enough money to potentially fund a presidential campaign, but in 2008 there could be three from the state dialing for dollars: Pataki, Giuliani and Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton. The Clintons have a tried-and-tested national network. Giuliani has been out of office with plenty of time to travel the country. Pataki, without the track record of the Clintons or the free time Giuliani enjoys, could face a tough challenge finding enough cash elsewhere.

Hobby Horse: A governorship has been the job of choice in four of the past five presidential elections, and Pataki is currently the nation's longest-serving governor — with plenty of policy achievements to boast about. Tax-conscious conservatives will find Pataki's tax-cutting record quite appealing. For compassionate conservatives, he can tout his 1999 health care plan extending insurance to those without employer-provided plans.

Hobble Horse: Pataki's charisma deficit — he's considered boring on the stump — will not help him charm his way into the hearts of religious conservatives who are not going to warm up to his abortion stand and support of gay rights. Rockefeller Republicans are still not welcome in such circles.

Condoleezza Rice — Secretary of State

Rationale: She has said no in every imaginable way, but the political world cannot stop being fascinated with the idea of Rice on the national Republican ticket. She fits the bill for those who think only a solid conservative could ever become the first woman president, let alone the first African-American in the Oval Office. Rice, of course, is both of these — and she would make history just by running and winning a single primary. Careful and calculating in public, Rice makes very few mistakes despite having so many political foes gunning for her. A stalwart in the Bush White House's war on terrorism, from national security adviser in the first term to secretary of State since last year, she has the policy platform for a credible campaign despite lacking the experience of elected office.

Resources: If the Bush family gets behind her, all things are possible. The president is her biggest fan, and so far no one knows which of the 2008 hopefuls he might favor. Such high-powered backing is probably what it would take for Rice to mount an adequately resourced campaign. She has no experience raising the amount of money needed for such an undertaking, though her fame and rock-star appeal at GOP gatherings could make up the difference.

Hobby Horse: While she has legions of critics, no one can doubt her toughness in the national security arena. She gives no ground, whether on talk shows or in contentious Senate hearings. And the State Department turned out to provide some refuge from the brickbats being hurled at Bush's war policy, where Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has taken ownership of the hot seat.

Hobble Horse: As a presidential candidate, Rice would face endless questions that she now mostly dodges about uncomfortable matters, such as the warnings she received about terrorist activity before Sept. 11. That headache alone could be enough to dissuade her from joining the White House fray.

Mitt Romney — Governor, Massachusetts

Rationale: If conventional wisdom is correct and John McCain is the one to beat for the Republican nomination, someone will emerge as the conservative alternative. Bet on Romney to at least have a turn in that spotlight. Most pointedly, he rushed to President Bush's defense when McCain was taking on the White House plan to expand the authority to interrogate terror suspects. On immigration, Romney has taken a hard line, in contrast to McCain's middle-of-the-road approach in support of the president's proposals. And Romney seems to show up in religious conservative country, such as South Carolina, every time McCain tries to make his way there. Romney is doing what Sen. George Allen was planning to do until his own Senate re-election became dicey in Virginia. If Allen is out of play, Romney stands to gain.

Resources: It is hard to know which is better for training as a major league fundraiser, being governor of a good-sized state or running the Olympics. Romney has done both. He raised nearly $9.5 million for his 2002 election as Massachusetts governor (he's not running again this year), and he compiled nearly $2.5 million for his federal political action committee in the 2006 cycle. And those ties to corporate biggies when he was CEO of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City? Priceless.

Hobby Horse: In an age when politicians cannot stop yammering about health care, Romney did something about it, signing into law last April an insurance plan that covers nearly all Massachusetts citizens without raising taxes. The plan's emphasis on individual responsibility for premium costs and subsidies for lower-income citizens is already becoming a popular model for Republican-style health care reform.

Hobble Horse: As a Mormon, Romney faces doubts among many evangelical Christians who are suspicious of the denomination. He does his best to disarm the doubters, once even cracking a joke about polygamy, saying that he believes marriage is "between a man and woman and a woman and a woman."

Tom Tancredo — Congressman, Colorado's 6th District

Rationale:One-issue protest candidates are a hallmark of presidential campaigns, and Tancredo aims to make illegal immigration his cause. As Congress' leading advocate for tighter border controls and the deporting of people who have immigrated illegally, he is riding a wave of conservative sentiment that is roiling the Republican Party. Even some religious conservatives are getting as agitated about immigration as they are about abortion. And Tancredo was on this case long before it was hot. He says that he began focusing on it as a state legislator in the 1970s, when waves of immigrants moved into Colorado, eventually forcing the state to implement bilingual education programs. As a self-described religious-right Republican, Tancredo only gives way to liberals on gun control — a conversion brought about by the 1999 shooting deaths at Columbine High School, just blocks from his home in the Denver suburb of Littleton.

Resources: Protest candidates don't need a lot of money to maintain their candidacy. A cell phone and a rental car is about all it takes. But Tancredo is no slacker in this regard, having hit the $1 million mark in campaign funds when necessary for his re-elections since first winning his House seat in 1998. His alignment with anti-immigration groups and evangelicals should provide a healthy source of cash and direct-mail addresses to keep a campaign as long as he likes.

Hobby Horse: Tancredo's long-standing obsession with border fences and other measures to reduce illegal immigration is no longer burdened by the nutty image it once suffered. Last month, President Bush vindicated Tancredo's movement by signing into law a bill authorizing construction of 700 miles of fence along the Mexican border.

Hobble Horse: The inconvenient truth for Tancredo is that his own grandparents were immigrants. They came to the United States from Italy, but he says they always regarded themselves as Americans and not as Italian-Americans. And since they were legal immigrants, presumably he would not have them deported if they arrived today.

Denver Wooing Democrats For '08 (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Hopes for convention are mile high

DOJ_NMG_0093659

DENVER — The Mile High City is hoping that a rising Democratic tide in Colorado and the West will lift its chances of hosting the party's 2008 convention.

Officials involved in Denver's bid for the convention say their prospects against rival New York City improved on Tuesday as Colorado voters put a decidedly Democratic stamp on the state.

"I think our chances are now better," says Denver City Council member Rosemary Rodriguez, who serves on the city's convention bid committee. If held in Denver, it would be the first Democratic convention here since 1908, when William Jennings Bryan was nominated.

Bryant Adams, spokesman for the Colorado Republican Party, says the GOP will bounce back from a "very difficult year" because "Republican values are in line with views and values all across the West."

Democrats in Colorado this week reclaimed the governorship after eight years of GOP rule, captured a House seat that had been Republican since 2002 and strengthened their majorities in the state House and state Senate. Colorado Democrats will hold four of seven U.S. House seats, a U.S. Senate seat and, for the first time since Dwight Eisenhower was president, control both the Legislature and governor's office.

Elsewhere in the West, Democrats picked up a Montana Senate seat, two House seats in Arizona, and re-elected governors in Wyoming, New Mexico and Arizona. Five of the eight mountain West states will have Democratic governors starting in 2007; prior to the 2002 election, they had none.

"We've had a lot of success in the West, and it seems to us here in Colorado that the way to keep it up is to focus on the western U.S.," says Steve Farber, a Denver attorney who co-chairs the city's convention effort.

"Democrats need to look at the Rocky Mountain West as their hope for the future," adds Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo. "We're ready. We have the facilities. We have the most beautiful state in the nation."

A spokesman for New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg did not respond to messages seeking comment. Republicans will hold their 2008 convention in Minneapolis-St. Paul.

Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean is expected to decide between Denver and New York by early December. At a breakfast meeting with reporters in Washington on Thursday, he said both cities are still under consideration.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who is likely to become majority leader in January, has backed Denver's bid.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a Democrat who just won a second term, said Tuesday's election results "make a strong case for the convention going to Denver."

Referendum Revelations (WSJ)

Republicans took a drubbing in Tuesday's elections. But judging by the results of various referendums nationwide, some of the ideas they used to stand for are alive, well and popular among voters.

The most significant moral victory comes in Michigan, where voters approved by a surprisingly lopsided 58-42 margin Proposal 2, which bars discrimination and preferential treatment "in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting." Michigan voters showed common sense in passing the proposal over the demagogic objections of special interests such as women's groups and minority contractors, who outspent proponents of the measure three to one and ran ads depicting it as a disaster on par with 9/11 and Hurricane Katrina.

In California, four measures that would have raised taxes in an already overtaxed state went down in flames. One of them was a 300% hike in the duty on cigarettes; another a $50 per-parcel tax on landowners. Then there was Proposition 89, which would have hiked corporate taxes by 0.2 percentage points to create campaign funds for political candidates able to raise at least $125,000 in five-dollar increments. For a state in which porn stars have been known to throw their g-strings into the political ring, this nod toward Moonbeam populism probably wasn't a good idea.

For our money, however, California's dumbest proposition was numbered 87. Backed by movie producer Stephen Bing, it would have slapped a sliding-scale tax on California oil producers in order to fund alternative energy sources and, supposedly, reduce dependence on foreign oil. But exactly how increasing the cost of domestic oil was supposed to do that -- especially when the proposition forbade energy companies from passing along the higher prices at the pump -- was a conundrum to which supporters never gave much thought. The proposition went down 45% to 55%.

Also encouraging were the nine states that passed anti-Kelo referendums, which restrict state governments from using their powers of eminent domain to transfer property from one private owner to another. That brings to nearly 40 the number of states that have responded to the Supreme Court's infamous 2005 ruling that allowed the city of New London, Connecticut, to seize 15 homes to do the bidding of corporations and developers. The three states that rejected similar measures on Tuesday -- California, Washington and Idaho -- did so in part because proponents overreached politically by insisting that landowners should be compensated when government regulations diminish their property values. Opponents were able to portray this as a threat to state budgets and fiscal prudence.

Social and cultural issues were also on the ballot. Arizona, where voters otherwise evicted anti-immigration Congressman J.D. Hayworth, approved a measure making English the official language by a three-to-one margin. This suggests to us that what Americans want isn't so much restricted immigration as it is a culture of assimilation. Bans on same-sex marriage -- a pre-emptive reaction in the face of judicial overreach in places like Massachusetts and New Jersey -- were approved by large margins in liberal Wisconsin and conservative South Dakota, among seven states.

At the same time, South Dakotans rejected a measure that would have banned nearly all abortions, while Missouri voted to endorse stem-cell research by the narrowest of margins, 51% to 49%: Both are useful lessons that Americans remain pragmatic and intelligently ambivalent on these difficult moral issues.

Our one disappointment was voter approval in six states for raising the minimum wage. The minimum wage is not a victimless crime, but it does tend to be an invisible one since it often takes the form of employers simply doing without some of the entry-level positions they might otherwise have filled with the young or unskilled. But with the Bush economy producing jobless figures of 4.4%, we can understand why voters are not on their guard about risks to fuller employment.

What all this tells us is that while voters have delivered a partisan rebuke to a party that likes to describe itself as conservative, they still believe in low taxes, property rights and social conservatism -- so long as it is not extreme. There's a lesson here for the next crop of GOP candidates, assuming they're willing to pay attention.

Michigan Prefers Equality (WSJ)

By Abigail Thernstrom

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

Ward Connerly has done it again: A striking 58% of Michigan voters gave the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative a thumbs up; only three counties voted against it.

The language of the MCRI closely tracks California's 1996 Proposition 209, also led by Mr. Connerly. It amends the Michigan Constitution to "ban public institutions from using affirmative-action programs that give preferential treatment to groups or individuals based on their race, gender, color, ethnicity or national origin for public employment, education or contracting purposes." The political and business establishments, pressure groups like the AARP, labor-union leaders, religious spokesmen, the professoriat, the major Detroit newspapers -- all were opposed to MCRI. But a substantial majority of ordinary voters were thinking for themselves.

Patty Alspach was perhaps a typical supporter. A Democrat, she signed the petition putting the proposition on the ballot. Meanwhile, opponents loudly claimed that the measure was misleading, that voters were being duped, that it should be tossed off the ballot. "I read it," replied Ms. Alpach. "I understood it. I signed it. Now let me vote on it."

While Mr. Connerly is the father of the civil-rights initiatives, in Michigan his role was that of mentor and fund-raiser; Jennifer Gratz, MCRI's executive director, was in charge. She'd been the lead plaintiff in Gratz v. Bollinger, one of the University of Michigan cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in June 2003. The Court agreed that race-driven admissions policies were okay as long as they remained a bit subtle -- but no naked point system for the color of an applicant's skin. The drive for the MCRI was launched immediately after the Gratz and Grutter decisions were announced.

The initiative's opponents enjoyed a five-fold funding advantage, which they used to broadcast a series of scary messages. The MCRI would be a tragedy on the scale of 9/11; it would perpetuate a "culture of inequity," and "endanger access to life-saving health-care services that apply only to women" -- the language of the initiative to the contrary notwithstanding. Opponents even found basketball coaches to tout the importance of seeking "diversity." In response to that last stunt, the tiny band of full-time, young MCRI workers (five on the payroll) sent a staffer -- a very short Korean immigrant, carrying a basketball and dressed for the court -- to the coaches' press conference where he stated his eagerness to add "diversity" to the game.

Such episodes reveal the youthful idealism and commitment of Ms. Gratz, 24, and her staff, so reminiscent of the civil-rights movement in its heyday. They were all 20-somethings, ready to sleep under their desks and work nonstop. Despite the provocative ugliness of the MCRI's opposition, they stuck with an unwavering, positive message -- leavened with wit.

The ban on preferences will affect the state and local government, but the University of Michigan will feel its impact most keenly. In the closing pages of "The Shape of the River," William Bowen and Derrick Bok's celebrated book on preferential admissions, the authors warn that, if barred from using racial double-standards, institutions of higher education will find another way to achieve the desired racial mix on campuses. Straight out of the Bowen and Bok playbook, University of Michigan president Mary Sue Coleman issued a statement on Tuesday night (even before the final results were in): "Regardless of what happens with Proposal 2, the University of Michigan will remain fully and completely committed to diversity. I am determined to do whatever it takes to sustain our excellence by recruiting and retaining a diverse community of students, faculty and staff."

Brave words in the face of utter defeat. To be sure, Supreme Court opinions can often be circumvented behind closed admissions-office doors; that was certainly the story after the 1978 decision in University of California v. Bakke, which (on paper) sanctioned the use of racial identity only as a "plus" factor, one consideration among many in admitting students. But state constitutional amendments are seriously constraining, as the experience in California in the years since the passage of 209 suggests. Racial double-standards in college admissions has been markedly curtailed at the state's flagship schools.

Buried in a lengthy speech to University of Michigan students on Wednesday, Ms. Coleman did say, "of course the University of Michigan will comply with the laws of the state." It was far from her first thought, however, and she has asked the school's attorneys "for their full and undivided support in defending diversity." They'll waste their time. As George Mason University law professor David Bernstein notes, "the chances that the university would ultimately win such litigation approach zero."

Ms. Coleman's other problem is that the much-vaunted "diversity" of the university is something of a sham, as an editorial writer for the very liberal Daily Michigan newspaper has suggested. The campus "is starkly segregated . . . We live in different student neighborhoods. We go to different bars on different nights. We join in different student groups. There are even separate Greek systems." While Ms. Coleman has made the usual noises about building a "community" and "creating a diverse, welcoming campus" -- whom was she kidding? Apparently no one.

Dishonesty has always been the coin of the realm in this country when it comes to race -- from the days of the Declaration of Independence to "separate but equal" and beyond. The use of race as a decisive factor in admissions at selective colleges and universities is no exception.

The modern-day survival of racial preferences depends on sympathetic judges willing to spin dubious arguments and ignore widely available data on the pernicious impact of such preferences. But, this time, the University of Michigan may find itself without judicial recourse. The Supreme Court has never said that universities are constitutionally obligated to institute "diversity" policies. Public universities are funded by taxpayers. And those taxpayers have spoken.

Trade Deficit Narrowed In September (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Mark Whitehouse

U.S.'s Imports Fell 2.1% Amid Oil-Price Decline; Gap With China Worsened

Even as the overall U.S. trade deficit narrowed in September, the country's imbalance with China continued to worsen, pointing to possible new tensions in trade policy making now that Democrats have retaken Congress.

With the price of imported oil in sharp decline, the deficit fell 6.8% to $64.3 billion in September, the Commerce Department said yesterday. A broad easing of imports on the back of the first decline in oil prices in five months combined with a continued strong export performance to improve the trade picture.

Yet there were indications that the trade gap remains a problem. September's deficit, though down from August's revised record of $68.96 billion, was still one of the largest ever. And the rapidly ballooning deficit with China showed no sign of easing.

All that could push the newly Democratic Congress to take a toughened approach to trade policy, one that incorporates worker rights and environmental protections, in addition to the business priorities that Republicans have pushed in recent years.

Michigan Rep. Sander Levin, a senior Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, said the rapidly growing deficit with China underscores the need for a change of direction on trade policy. "The 'hands-off, anything goes' trade policy employed by the Bush administration has not worked," said Mr. Levin, who backs proposals to incorporate worker rights into Washington's trade discussions with other countries.

The U.S. appetite for foreign-made consumer products from China, including televisions and other electronic equipment, remained strong, pushing imports from China to a record $27.6 billion in September. With U.S. exports to China essentially flat for the month, the U.S.'s total deficit with China hit a record $22.96 billion -- by far the largest of any single country -- in September, up $1 billion from the previous month.

Earlier this week, China reported that its overall trade surplus hit a monthly high of $23.83 billion in October, thanks to strong export demand from the U.S. and Europe. Discrepancies between Chinese and U.S. trade data are partly because of differences in how the two governments calculate trade, including shipments through Hong Kong.

According to the Commerce Department, the U.S.'s overall imports fell 2.1% to $187.46 billion for September, the first decline since February. Besides lower oil prices, decreased shipments from abroad of industrial supplies and automotive vehicles also contributed to the decline.

Exports rose 0.5% from August to a record $123.16 billion for September, with increases seen for everything from civilian aircraft and agricultural machinery to raw cotton and chemicals.

Drew Matus, a senior economist at Lehman Brothers, said the September trade data suggest "a slight upward revision" -- perhaps less than 0.2 percentage point -- in third-quarter economic growth.

Other economic data out yesterday showed that despite the continued decline in gasoline prices, U.S. consumers' optimism ebbed slightly in November, according to the latest survey from the University of Michigan.

The survey's index of consumer sentiment dropped to 92.3 in the first part of November, down from 93.6 in October but still the second-highest level since July 2005, said economists who had read the report, which is distributed to subscribers. The drop suggested that the positive effect of lower gasoline prices, which bolstered sentiment in October, has begun to fade. The negative tone of political ads leading up to Tuesday's congressional election might also have taken a toll, economists said.

The average retail price of gasoline was about $2.25 a gallon in early November, compared with more than $3 a gallon in early August.

Consumers' assessments of home-buying conditions improved, though they were wary of making purchases amid falling prices. Long-term inflation expectations -- an indicator closely watched by policy makers at the Federal Reserve -- held steady, with consumers expecting inflation to average 3% over the next five years.

Separately, the number of new applicants for unemployment benefits declined, suggesting that U.S. businesses are still hiring at a healthy pace. The Labor Department said initial jobless claims fell by 20,000 to a seasonally adjusted level of 308,000 in the week ended Nov. 4. Last week, the Labor Department reported that the unemployment rate had fallen to a five-year low of 4.4% in October.

Dow Tumbles 73 Points As Attention Shifts To The Economy, New Congress (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

A day after rising 19.77 points on news that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was out, the Dow Jones Industrial Average pulled back, with investors turning their attention back to the economy.

Amid worries about rising oil futures, flagging consumer sentiment and possible Democratic efforts to restrain drug-company profits, the Dow industrials yesterday fell 73.24 points, or 0.6%, to 12103.30. A day after finishing at a record, the average still is up 12.9% for 2006. Trading activity was heavy.

More broadly, some investors are nervous that stocks may have come too far since midsummer. At its record close Wednesday, the Dow was up 13.4% since July 14.

With the Dow up so much, "we have to be wary of something happening that would cause the market to sell off hard," said Doug Johnston, head of trading at Boston-based brokerage firm Canaccord Adams.

Some big investors appeared to be selling broad baskets of stocks to hedge their market exposure, Mr. Johnston said.

Crude-oil futures, whose declines had helped fuel stock gains, surged back above $61 a barrel amid worries about declining stockpiles and the looming winter heating season. Oil futures rose $1.33, or 2.2%, to $61.16.

That gain overshadowed news that lower oil prices helped to shrink the September trade deficit. Some oil traders believe the price declines were temporary and the commodity is likely to resume its gains.

Investors also were unhappy that the University of Michigan's measure of consumer sentiment came in lower than expected.

Drug and telecom stocks led the declines, with talk that a Democratic Congress could seek to regulate those sectors more closely and hold down prices.

Large technology stocks bucked the trend, rising after Cisco Systems forecast stronger sales than analysts had expected. Cisco jumped 6% and Dell, Oracle and Yahoo all gained. But their coattails didn't reach the broader tech market, and the Nasdaq Composite Index, filled with tech stocks, fell 0.37%, or 8.93 points, to 2376.01. It remains up 7.7% this year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.53%, or 7.39 points, to 1378.33, still up 10.4% in 2006. Neither the S&P 500 nor the Nasdaq is near a record.

Gold futures, which often benefit from economic uncertainty, rose $18.60 to $635, the highest finish in two months.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.07%, or 0.17 point, to 230.63.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.1 billion shares, as 1,359 stocks rose and 1,907 fell.

Bond prices were mixed. The 10-year Treasury note rose 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.630%. The 30-year bond was down 2/32 to yield 4.734%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.94 yen, up from 117.80, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2823 from $1.2760.

Wyoming's Sen. Craig Thomas Has Leukemia (AP-Y)

By Mead Gruver, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Sen. Craig Thomas, hospitalized since Monday with pneumonia, has been diagnosed with a form of leukemia, his spokesman said Thursday.

The Wyoming Republican, who was easily elected to a third term while in the hospital, issued a statement saying he will undergo treatment and plans to return to Congress in January.

Thomas fell ill in church in Casper on Sunday and was taken by ambulance to Wyoming Medical Center. He and his wife, Susan, flew back to Washington later in the day.

Thomas, 73, canceled campaign events Monday and was admitted to the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., that evening, his spokesman Cameron Hardy said Thursday.

While hospitalized, doctors noticed a low white blood cell count and a bone marrow biopsy revealed leukemia, cancer of the blood and bone marrow. Thomas was to immediately begin a four- to six-week course of chemotherapy and will remain at the hospital to reduce his risk of infection, his office said in a press release Thursday.

"I am joining all of the thousands and thousands of other cancer survivors in Wyoming," Thomas said. "I certainly didn't expect this diagnosis, but I will be back by the January session ready for full service in the new Congress."

Thomas was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia, the most common form of the disease.

Dr. Brian Monahan, director of hematology and medical oncology at the National Naval Medical Center, said in the release that the disease usually can be forced into remission in people in Thomas' "great physical condition."

Thomas was elected to the Senate in 1994 after serving five years in the U.S. House.

Foreign Sales By U.S. Arms Makers Doubled In A Year (NYT)

By Leslie Wayne

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Sales of military weapons by United States contractors to foreign governments doubled in the last year, as countries like Pakistan, Australia and Greece stepped up purchases of armaments and the United States government loosened policies to allow more American weapons to be sold on the world market.

A total of $21 billion in arms sales agreements were signed from September 2005 to September 2006, compared with $10.6 billion in the previous year, according to new data compiled by the Pentagon. Foreign military sales agreements have typically ranged from $10 billion to $13 billion a year since 2001.

A number of factors are behind the surge in sales. Since Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration has used arms sales as a way to reward allies and cement international relationships. Middle Eastern countries, flush with oil revenues, have become big buyers.

Countries like India, Pakistan and Indonesia that were once barred from buying American weapons have had those bans lifted, and some have placed big orders.

For military contractors, the sales have provided a welcome source of new revenue at a time when the Pentagon has indicated that the era of record military budgets is ending.

Because many of the weapons sold overseas are mature products, the profit margins to American arms makers are high, since the initial development costs have long been recuperated.

And in the case of some planes, like the F-16 Fighting Falcon fighter jet and the C-17 Globemaster cargo plane, foreign military sales are a way to keep open production lines that might close for lack of Pentagon orders.

“There have been a remarkable number of orders placed,” said Howard Rubel, an analyst at Jeffries & Company. “It’s another arrow in the quiver of military contractors.”

One of the biggest orders was placed by Pakistan, which had been barred from buying most American weapons because of its nuclear program. That ban was lifted last year and the country placed a $5 billion order for advanced F-16 jets made by the Lockheed Martin Corporation.

A similar ban on India was also lifted, opening up a potentially lucrative market to American contractors. India is currently looking to buy up to 126 new fighter jets, and American contractors have been flying to India to show off their wares.

Oil profits are also behind some of the orders. Saudi Arabia said in July that it planned to spend $5.8 billion on American weapons to modernize its National Guard and will also put in more than $3 billion in orders for Black Hawk helicopters, Abrams and Bradley armored land vehicles, new radio systems and other weapons.

In the gulf region, Bahrain, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates have filed plans to buy Black Hawk helicopters — for a total of $1 billion. Oman plans to buy a $48 million anti-tank missile system. The Emirates plans to buy rocket artillery equipment and military trucks for $752 million and Bahrain will purchase Javelin missiles for $42 million.

Bahrain alone has accounted for $1 billion in foreign military sales in the five years since 9/11.

"The rise in oil prices has allowed countries like Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates to increase their arms purchases dramatically," said William Hartung, director of the arms trade project at the World Policy Institute, which is part of the New School in New York.

For contractors, Mr. Hartung added, these sales "are a welcome windfall, not just icing on the cake."

These new big gulf region orders, like the Saudi deal, were not included in the $21 billion tally for 2006. They will be carried over into the 2007 tally and are a sign that next year will be as robust as this one.

"We've got a good start on 2007," said Lt. Gen. Jeffrey B. Kohler, director of the Defense Security Cooperation Agency, which manages foreign military sales.

Besides Pakistan and India, since 9/11, bans on arms sales have been lifted on Tajikistan, Serbia and Montenegro, Armenia and Azerbaijan as these countries have been identified by the State Department as critical allies in the war on terror. They have turned into buyers, although on a much smaller scale than the big Pakistani or Saudi orders.

Armenia, Azerbaijan and Tajikistan had no American arms purchases before 9/11. But as a group, they have bought $32 million in weapons under the foreign military sales program, according to statistics from the Center for Defense Information.

Foreign military sales are negotiated directly between the United States and other governments and are overseen by the State Department, the Pentagon and Congress.

Other strategically situated countries have also stepped up their purchases. Nepal, for instance, bought $1.1 million of American weapons in the full decade before 9/11, and $22 million in the five years since.

Similarly, Yemen, Djibouti and Uzbekistan bought $16.4 million combined in the decade before 9/11, and $73 million of American weapons since.

"Foreign military sales are a good hedge against potential further cuts in Pentagon procurement," said Mark T. Esper, executive vice president for defense and international affairs at the Aerospace Industries Association, a trade group.

In a conference call with analysts, Christopher E. Kubasik, chief financial officer of Lockheed, estimated that foreign sales account for 15 percent — or $5.5 billion — of Lockheed's sales, which were $37 billion in 2005.

"They're valued customers, and we plan to continue to grow in that area," he said.

Foreign sales have importance to military contractors beyond the dollar value of the contract. Once a country buys a weapon system, it will need to continue to buy spare parts or upgrades.

"In the next couple of years," said Cai von Rumohr, an analyst with Cowen & Company, "foreign sales as a percentage of company revenues will be tracking up."

Foreign sales can also keep endangered weapons programs alive.

For instance, when Boeing made some announcements that it might begin to close production of its C-17 cargo line, Canada and Australia quickly stepped in to place orders: Canada's deal is valued at $1.3 billion and Australia's at $2 billion. Orders for the F-16 from Turkey, Greece and Pakistan are pumping $11 billion into that program at a time when the Air Force is phasing out of it.

For that reason, the Aerospace Industries Association has been pressing Congress to relax rules so more foreign deals can be done outside of government scrutiny — an effort that has, so far, been rebuffed in Congress.

Last month, the industry association, along with representatives from the Boeing Company and the Northrop Grumman Corporation, met at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington research group, to outline their plans to pursue this effort.

O'Malley Calls For Slots At Racetracks (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley called upon the Maryland General Assembly yesterday to legalize slot machine gambling at horse tracks, saying he was "sick of this issue" but feared that the state's racing industry could collapse if lawmakers did not find common ground early in his term.

The issue of slots dominated the first three legislative sessions of Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s tenure, producing stalemates that contributed to his rocky relations with the Democrat-controlled legislature.

O'Malley (D) said he is eager for compromise between backers of a more expansive slots plan and those who argue that legalizing machines would be only a first step toward dramatic expansion of gambling in Maryland.

"Hopefully, we can find some room for compromise and address people's fears about this being the camel's nose under the tent, and move forward to other more pressing, important issues," O'Malley said during an interview on WTOP (103.5 FM, 820 AM), one in a series of radio and television appearances yesterday in which he was peppered with questions on the topic.

O'Malley, who is Baltimore's mayor, said slot machines at racetracks would help prop up an industry that provides 18,000 jobs in Maryland and would ensure the survival of the Preakness Stakes, a nationally renowned event at Pimlico Race Course in Baltimore that O'Malley called "the equivalent of having the Super Bowl in Maryland every year."

If legislation is not passed within two years, O'Malley said, "I think you'll see racing just give up and go to other states and the Preakness move on."

Lawmakers, who return to Annapolis in January, offered divergent views on whether a slots bill is more likely to pass a Democrat-controlled legislature under a Democratic governor than under Ehrlich, who made the issue a priority.

"If you're against it, you're against it," said House Speaker Pro Tem Adrienne A. Jones (D-Baltimore County). "I would hope we would not jump on this."

Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), a leading slots proponent, said he was optimistic that lawmakers would pass a tracks-only bill during a "honeymoon" period afforded most new governors.

"I think it will be dealt with in the first year, and I think it will pass in the first year," he said.

Miller acknowledged that there is a key obstacle in the person of House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), who considers the idea of placing slot machines at tracks an "unjust enrichment" of their owners. Busch was unavailable yesterday for comment, aides said.

O'Malley stressed yesterday that slots would not be a priority of his administration, saying, "It's nothing that I've ever made a central plank of my campaign."

In the closing months of a race in which O'Malley led in most polls, several gambling interests hedged their bets and gave money to both O'Malley and Ehrlich. The state Democratic Party received a $50,000 contribution from the Maryland Jockey Club, a horsemen's association controlled by Joseph A. De Francis, who has a minority share of the Pimlico and Laurel Park racetracks.

Aides said it is unlikely that O'Malley will introduce a slot machines bill and that his remarks came in anticipation of lawmakers pressing the matter. "I am so sick of this issue," he said on WTOP. "I hope that we're able to put this issue behind us."

But that may be easier said than done. Del. Peter Franchot (D-Montgomery), who was elected as Maryland comptroller Tuesday, said the bill probably would fail again even with O'Malley's backing. Franchot urged the incoming governor not to waste political capital on "a divisive issue."

"I personally think it's a loser of an issue," Franchot said. "Voters threw out the No. 1 cheerleader for slots, Bob Ehrlich."

During his media appearances yesterday, O'Malley also reiterated his support for construction of the intercounty connector, a position he told WTOP he had stated "four hundred billion times before."

And O'Malley continued to press for state School Superintendent Nancy S. Grasmick to step down.

Grasmick, who has sparred with O'Malley over Baltimore schools, reports to the State Board of Education, whose members are appointed by the governor. It probably will be July, however, before O'Malley has a chance to fill vacancies on the board and a year more before he has a majority.

"I think it would be a great time for a fresh start," O'Malley said yesterday on WUSA (Channel 9). "I think in her heart of hearts, she probably knows that, too."

A spokesman for Grasmick said this week that she has no plans to step down.

Baltimore Celebrates Political Last Hurrah? (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Residents gathered in some of the city's notoriously quirky diners and coffee shops yesterday to crow that the elections Tuesday proved they still live in the nexus of Maryland political power.

"It shows again that Baltimoreans are on top," said Bernie Shephard, a youth sports league director having breakfast at Cafe Hun, a kitschy restaurant in the working-class Hampden neighborhood.

Mr. Shephard had good reason to boast: Mayor Martin O'Malley became governor-elect, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin joined fellow Baltimore Democrat Barbara Mikulski in the U.S. Senate and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat raised in the city's

Little Italy neighborhood, is expected to be the next House speaker. Mrs. Pelosi learned politics at the knee of her father, Thomas J. D'Alesandro Jr., a Democrat with more than 20 straight terms in politics, in including jobs as Baltimore mayor and U.S. congressman.

"It's great [for] someone from our neighborhood, who played on our steps with all the other little girls, to progress like this," said John Pente, who has lived in the same Baltimore row house for each of his 96 years.

Mr. Shephard also acknowledged the growing political influence of Montgomery County, the state's wealthiest and most populous county, but said the county's connection to the District will always alienate its politicians from the rest of Maryland.

Fran Vota, 82, of Little Italy, agreed.

"They're not going to beat us, no way" Mrs. Vota said while leaving St. Leo's Catholic Church where she was making sandwiches for the homeless.

Historically the hub of state politics, Baltimore is the home or birthplace of seven of the past 12 Maryland governors and five of the state's past 10 U.S. senators.

But the city's political strength increasingly has been eroded by Montgomery and Prince George's counties, home to more than a third of registered Maryland Democrats, who dominate state politics.

The election Tuesday sent two Democrats from Montgomery County to statewide offices: Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler rose to attorney general and Delegate Peter Franchot became comptroller.

Mr. Franchot replaces Baltimore's most iconic politician, William Donald Schaefer, a former governor and the Baltimore mayor who in the early 1980s led the city to an urban renaissance. He lost in the September primary.

Mr. Gansler and Mr. Franchot are just the second and third Montgomery County officials to win statewide offices. Blair Lee III, a Democrat from Silver Spring, was the first Montgomery County official to win a statewide office when he was elected lieutenant governor in the early 1970s.

They and Lt. Gov.-elect Anthony G. Brown, of Prince George's County, will hold three of the six statewide offices. The other three belong to Mr. O'Malley, Mr. Cardin and Miss Mikulski, all Baltimore Democrats.

Still, some Baltimoreans quietly concede that the sweep Tuesday might be a last stand in the city's political legacy.

"Baltimore is losing its clout," said Mary Ann Campannella, 65, president of the Little Italy Community Organization. "It saddens me because Baltimore was the political power in Maryland."

Mrs. Campannella, who was wearing pajamas and sipping coffee as she held court yesterday morning at a neighborhood diner called Gia's/Iggy's, said Montgomery and Prince George's are home to a younger generation of state leaders and voters there are better educated and more politically sophisticated than those in Baltimore.

"Our school system proves it," she said. "Graduates can't fill out a job application. How are they going to know who to vote for."

She said Mr. O'Malley is a Montgomery County native "on loan" to Baltimore and noted that Mr. Cardin is 64 and Miss Mikulski is 70.

"I'm racking my brain to think of who is the next strong [leader] in the city," Mrs. Campannella said. "I'm coming up blank."

Don Kennedy, manager of Germano's restaurant in Little Italy, sounded the same melancholy note.

"Barbara Mikulski and Ben Cardin have been in the system a long time," said Mr. Kennedy, 51. "I don't see the new crop coming up."

Democrats May Urge More Contact With U.S. Adversaries (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 10, 2006

The Democratic takeover of Congress will raise the profile of lawmakers who have repeatedly urged the Bush administration to talk to key adversaries such as Iran, North Korea and Syria, increasing pressure on the White House to stop placing restrictions or conditions on such discussions.

The incoming chairmen of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House International Relations Committee -- Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, respectively -- have long argued that the administration's approach to dealing with adversaries has hamstrung diplomacy. Iran and Syria are problematic neighbors of Iraq, and critics have charged that not talking to Damascus and Tehran has hurt efforts to end the violence in Iraq.

Although outgoing Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) is also an advocate of greater engagement, the new Democratic leaders say they are more likely to call hearings and demand explanations from administration officials. Lantos, who has often visited such countries as Libya and North Korea, said he is "passionately committed to having a dialogue with people we disagree with."

Since Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice took office nearly two years ago, some restrictions on dealing with Iran and North Korea have been loosened. On North Korea, the administration has rejected calls for high-level bilateral contacts but allows them within six-nation negotiations focusing on North Korea's nuclear programs.

On Iran, the administration this year offered to join multilateral talks on Iran's nuclear program -- but only if Tehran first suspends uranium enrichment. There has been virtually no dialogue with Syria since its suspected involvement in the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

"This has spelled the death knell of the neo-conservative approach," Biden said. He added that "Secretary Rice is much more open to approaches different than Cheney and Rumsfeld than people think she is," although State Department officials disputed that.

The Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), is also expected to address the issue of whether dialogue with Iran and Syria would aid the war effort. President Bush and Democratic lawmakers have said they are eagerly awaiting the study group's conclusions.

State Department officials said yesterday they are open to ideas, but that the change in Congress will not directly affect administration policies. Officials said criticism of the administration's approach is often misguided. The administration considers talks with adversaries as a particular "card" to play in diplomacy, but merely talking does not represent a policy, one official said. Dialogue with Syria, for instance, has been limited because the administration did not want it to affect the U.N. investigation into Hariri's killing.

Another Rice aide said he does not think Democrats will press too hard at first because they are still vulnerable to charges of being weak on national security. But he acknowledged Congress would raise tough questions, noting that North Korea's recent decision to return to the six-party talks "relieved some of the pressure on us for that."

The nomination of Robert Gates as defense secretary could also change the dynamics of the administration's internal debates. Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is a fierce foe of engaging with enemies, but Gates two years ago co-wrote a Council on Foreign Relations report that called for a "direct dialogue" with Iran.

"The current lack of sustained engagement with Iran harms U.S. interests in a critical region," the report said, arguing the United States should explore "common interests" with Iran as it did with the Soviet Union or China when they were U.S. adversaries. The report suggested that lifting unilateral sanctions and allowing U.S.-Iranian commercial relations to flourish "could be a powerful tool" in dealing with Iran.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter and co-author of the report, said he hopes Gates's presence at Bush administration policy debates will bring a "a degree of rationality, common sense, balance and historical perspective" to the table.

Brzezinski, stressing he was speaking for himself, said the administration's requirement that Iran give up enrichment before talks can start is not a "fair bargain" because Iran has a right to enrich under the nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, and thus would be reluctant to give it up for simply talking. He said lifting trade embargoes or dismantling sanctions would be a greater inducement to start a productive dialogue with Iran on a range of issues.

Asked yesterday about Gates's writings on Iran, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said: "The president and Bob Gates are pretty, pretty confident themselves that they're on the same page on the basic pillars of the president's foreign policy."

Around The Globe, Relief Over U.S. Vote (WP)

Many Welcome Return of Bipartisan Government; Caution Heard in Russia, China

PARIS, Nov. 9 -- For Europe and much of the rest of the world, U.S. voters' repudiation of the Bush administration in midterm elections Tuesday and the dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Wednesday confirmed the widespread view that President Bush and his policies have done more to tarnish America's image abroad and strain its global relations than any other U.S. president in recent history.

The Socialist Group in the European Parliament, the legislative body's second-largest voting bloc, called the election results "the beginning of the end of a six-year nightmare for the world."

The seismic political shift in the United States was greeted in many places less with jubilation than with a sense of relief that Americans had at long last come to their senses.

"It took a while for the Americans to realize who they had elected and the damage he had caused in the world," said Philippe Bas, 56, whose newsstand near a Paris subway stop was stacked with newspapers from across Europe carrying analyses of the election.

That view was echoed in some newspaper editorials and headlines around Europe. In Britain, the headline over the Guardian newspaper's lead editorial read, "Thank you, America."

In many capitals, Rumsfeld's dismissal was as momentous as the prospect of Democratic control of the House and Senate.

"After the Democratic victory, Bush sacrifices Rumsfeld," the French daily newspaper Le Figaro declared in a banner headline Thursday. An editorial in Le Figaro described Rumsfeld as "the symbol of the horrors of the American military intervention in Iraq" and said, "By dismissing the architect of this unpopular conflict, by sanctioning the neocons' idol, George Bush shows that he stopped believing that he could 'maintain the course' in Iraq."

"Rumsfeld never had many friends in Europe," Marcin Zaborowski, who monitors transatlantic relations for the Paris-based European Union Institute for Security Studies, said in an interview. "He exemplified anything that was bad about this administration. He personified the approaches Europeans had the most problems with -- going to war in Iraq on the false premises that it was closely linked to the war on terrorism and directly linked to the events of 9/11."

Political parties, government leaders, pundits and citizens from many countries seized on the return of a bipartisan government in the United States as a harbinger of welcome change in the Bush administration's policy of using the military. But others expressed concerns about the Democratic Party's agenda promoting trade restrictions and human rights.

"I hope the policy will be better balanced regarding the use of armed forces outside the United States," Boris Gryzlov, speaker of Russia's lower house of parliament, told reporters in Moscow. "However, there are fears that the Democrats are more prone to apply double standards in human rights."

"Democrats have traditionally had more complicated relations with Russia," said Tatyana Parkhalina, a senior analyst at the Center for Problems of European Security in Moscow. "And our politicians worry that they will pay more attention to human rights, the democratic development of the country and relations with former Soviet republics. They're not happy about that."

Some Chinese analysts also said the Beijing government is worried about potential changes in the way the United States approaches trade relations, noting that Democrats have traditionally been more attuned than Republicans to labor union complaints about loss of U.S. jobs to low-wage Chinese factories.

Officials and analysts in other nations embraced the prospect of changes in U.S. social policies.

Germany's minister for economic cooperation and development, Heidemarie Wieczorek-Zeul, a Social Democrat, told the Berliner Zeitung newspaper, "There is hope that our concerns in the world -- for peace, development, environmental and climate protection -- will be given more weight on the political agenda in the USA."

On the opposite side of the globe, Mexican officials said they hope Democrats will use their new power to improve Bush's approach to immigration issues, particularly the question of constructing a barrier on the U.S.-Mexico border.

"The electoral strategy that proposed the possibility of building the wall as an element of the electoral battle failed," said RubÃ©n Aguilar, spokesman for Mexican President Vicente Fox.

Some European analysts expressed fear that some pressing issues, including the Iranian and North Korean nuclear programs, could be neglected with a lame-duck leader in the White House.

Britain's Daily Mail newspaper said in an editorial that Bush had received a "richly deserved bloody nose," but the results had "left the free world with a severely compromised leader, stripped of moral authority at home and abroad."

But one of Iran's hard-line newspapers, Kayhan, relished the prospect of a politically diminished White House. "Bush's government will be obliged to take more cautious steps and instead of creating war around the world, it will be obliged to fight politically with Democrats," it said.

Finn reported from Moscow. Correspondents Edward Cody in Beijing, Manuel Roig-Franzia in Mexico City and Kevin Sullivan in London and special correspondents Corinne Gavard in Paris and Shannon Smiley in Berlin contributed to this report.

Bush Discusses Immigration Reform With Mexico's President-elect (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall And Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, November 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush welcomed Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon to the White House on Thursday and got an earful about immigration restructuring and controversial legislation that Bush signed recently to construct 700 miles of wall along the common border.

"I explained our point of view that it isn't - can't - be a solution to the migration problem," Calderon told Spanish-language reporters in a news conference after meeting Bush. He also said he'd try to keep immigration from drowning out other important issues in the bilateral relationship.

Calderon met Bush immediately after the U.S. president had lunched with presumed House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., to mend relations and discuss areas in which they could find common ground.

In the wake of his party's defeat Wednesday, Bush identified immigration revisions as one of those areas, and he repeated that in a photo session with Calderon, noting that "I assured the president-elect that the words I said in the very Oval Office that we sit about a comprehensive immigration vision are words I still believe strongly."

Although Calderon is a conservative who shares many views with Bush and, like Bush, won an election that many in his country questioned, he's been a vocal critic of the Republican-passed legislation that expands existing border-area walls in California and Arizona. Like many Mexicans, he considers it an affront that's reminiscent of the Berlin Wall, dividing families on opposite sides of a border.

"I hope the new composition of the U.S. Congress allows a solution to the (immigration) issues," Calderon told Mexican reporters, noting that Democrats have promoted immigration restructuring that includes some form of legalization for millions of Mexicans who are living in the United States now without legal documents.

Immigration-overhaul advocates celebrated Tuesday's election results, which included the re-election of Arizona's pro-overhaul Democratic governor, Janet Napolitano, and the defeat of Arizona Republican congressional candidate Randy Graf. The Minutemen, a self-proclaimed border vigilante group, had backed Graf heavily.

Several of the loudest anti-immigration voices were quieted Tuesday at the polls. They included the influential Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., and Rep. Gil Gutknecht, R-Minn., who'd wrongly predicted that immigration issues would loom larger on Election Day than the war in Iraq.

"Immigration did not work as a wedge issue," said Celinda Lake, the president of Lake Research Partners, a Democratic polling firm.

Exit polls showed that Latino voters voted Democratic by a 3-to-1 ratio nationally, said Celinda Lake, the president of Lake Research Partners, a Democratic polling firm. This reversed Republican gains with Latinos cultivated by Bush before the more conservative wing of his party pushed border security issues to the fore.

Calderon's predecessor Vicente Fox hands over the presidential sash Dec. 1. Immigration was Fox's central theme in bilateral relations, and he was deeply disappointed when U.S. immigration restructuring fell by the wayside after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Mexico's president-elect is likely to move immigration off the public radar screen, said Andrew Selee, a Mexico expert at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

"He's probably going to try to lower the public emphasis on migration in the relationship and lobby more effectively for passage of some sort of immigration legislation in the United States," Selee said.

Indeed, Calderon said Thursday that he didn't want immigration to overshadow issues such as anti-narcotics cooperation and trade.

He proposed a commission to study a provision of the North American Free Trade Agreement that's causing turmoil in Mexico. Under NAFTA, which took effect in 1994, U.S. exports of corn and beans have been entering Mexico gradually with reduced duties and will be granted duty-free entry in 2008.

As a result, U.S. corn for animal feed and use in food products has supplanted Mexican-grown corn quickly and has worsened the gap between Mexico's rich north and its poor, agricultural south.

The issue of U.S. corn was so controversial in Mexico that it nearly cost Calderon the election. For many Mexicans, corn is a cultural symbol rooted in Mexico's Aztec and Mayan past, and Calderon said Thursday that he wanted this commission "to find a soft landing for the end of this transition period."

Calderon Reassured On Immigration Bill (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

President Bush gave Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon an assurance in the Oval Office yesterday that he will push for a broad immigration bill that includes a new guest-worker program and citizenship rights for many illegal aliens.

"I assured the president-elect that the words I said in the very Oval Office that we sit about a comprehensive immigration vision are words I still believe strongly," Mr. Bush told reporters after meeting with Mr. Calderon yesterday afternoon. The remarks came a day after Mr. Bush pledged to push the issue with the help of the new Democrat-led Congress.

Mr. Calderon said Mr. Bush "was very open to all the arguments that I have presented to him" on immigration.

The two men met face to face for the first time, ahead of Mr. Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration. The meeting comes two weeks after Mr. Bush signed a bill authorizing nearly 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Although he didn't criticize the fence in his remarks to reporters in the Oval Office, Mr. Calderon said at a later press conference attended by Mexican and Spanish-language press that he told Mr. Bush the fence is a mistake.

"I told him our opinion that [the wall] is a mistaken remedy because it doesn't resolve the problem," the president-elect said, speaking in Spanish. "But he explained that this remedy was in response to the concerns of the United States to have a secure border."

He and other Mexican officials have compared the fence -- which will be built in major smuggling corridors -- to the Berlin Wall. But the legislation enjoys widespread support in the United States, having passed both the House and Senate easily and winning an approval rate of more than 80 percent in some polls.

Mr. Calderon is dealing with political upheaval and violence in the state of Oaxaca in southern Mexico, a cause taken up yesterday by demonstrators who marched on Pennsylvania Avenue outside the White House, as the leaders were meeting.

At his Spanish press conference, Mr. Calderon put some of the burden on the United States, saying that Mexico's southern regions need more investment and that the U.S. needs to do its part to fight crime and drug-trafficking, "particularly in the reduction of the demand for drugs."

Both at his press conference and with the president, Mr. Calderon said the U.S.-Mexico relationship includes more than just immigration and border issues.

"We want to foster our trade relationship, our economic relationship even more," he said. "We both understand that the only solution to many of the problems that we have is to create well-paid jobs in Mexico."

Still, with millions of Mexicans living illegally in the United States, immigration is a dominant issue, touching on both countries' security and economy.

Mexicans living in the United States -- legally and illegally -- will send home $24 billion in remittances this year, making it one of the nation's largest sources of income, along with oil sales.

Mr. Bush and outgoing Mexican President Vicente Fox had pledged in 2001 to try to secure an immigration accord that would legalize Mexican illegal aliens, but those efforts stalled after the September 11 terrorist attacks boosted concerns over immigration and border security.

Congressional Republicans, in particular, have balked, arguing that allowing illegal aliens a path to citizenship amounts to an amnesty for bad behavior, and would encourage more illegal entry.

Iran Warns U.N. Against Sanctions (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

LONDON — A defiant Iran, calling the Republican defeat in the U.S. elections a "landmark victory for the Iranian nation," warned Friday that it would reassess its cooperation with international atomic regulators if the United Nations moved forward with comprehensive sanctions on Iran's nuclear program.

The caution came from Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, as he concluded a day of meetings in Moscow aimed at winning Russia's support for weakening or postponing the sanctions, which European and U.S. negotiators hope to bring to the U.N. Security Council as early as the end of the month.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said "the enemy cannot do a damn thing" to divert Tehran's nuclear program — one of many indications Iran might be prepared to endure an initial round of sanctions if diplomacy fails.

"By God's grace, our powerful nation will continue its path," the president said, according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

Shortly after Larijani's meetings in Moscow, Russia proposed significantly scaled-down sanctions amendments that would focus strictly on halting Iran's uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities and prevent the development of missiles to deliver nuclear weapons.

The proposal would leave intact Russia's $1-billion civilian nuclear power plant under construction in the Iranian city of Bushehr, a key focus of Larijani's agenda in Moscow, analysts said.

A draft resolution by Germany, Britain and France demands a ban on goods and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, and a cutoff of financial support to the programs.

It also calls for a travel ban for any officials or students related to the nuclear and ballistic missile programs and a freeze on foreign assets of people and agencies involved in those programs.

But Russian officials made it clear they believed negotiations were a better way to keep Iran engaged. "Sanctions are not going to force anyone to do anything they don't want to do," said Vitaly Churkin, Russia's ambassador to the U.N.

Larijani said Iran remained ready for dialogue and warned against adopting the European group's sanctions resolution.

"We will review our relations with the IAEA" — the International Atomic Energy Agency — "if the U.N. adopts the Eurotroika resolution without taking into account the amendments made by Russia," he said in remarks carried by the Russian news agency RIA Novosti.

The warning carries an implicit threat to halt U.N. inspections at nuclear sites, though Iran could then lose IAEA technical cooperation on issues such as safety at nuclear facilities.

But Tehran appears to be realizing that some form of sanctions is probably inevitable, and the focus of Iran's diplomacy is to delay or at least minimize any embargo and keep the Bushehr project and its future fuel deliveries intact, analysts said.

"Some people in Tehran are resigned to the prospect of some mild sanctions being instituted in the near future. And they're preparing public opinion for that eventuality," said Kaveh L. Afrasiabi, an Iranian-born analyst who has written extensively on Iran's nuclear program.

The reaction to a "mild" level of initial sanctions would probably be largely "symbolic," he said, such as a curtailment of IAEA inspections. But sanctions would quickly strengthen hard-liners in the government, Afrasiabi said, and successive moves to ratchet up the pressure would undoubtedly bring a correspondingly harsher reaction from Iran.

"At the end of the line is Iran's exit from the [Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty] and complete suspension of any cooperation with the IAEA altogether. So there's no bright light, even just talking about the initial sanctions," Afrasiabi said.

The nuclear agency is set to complete a report next week on Iran's compliance with inspectors who returned Friday from Tehran. Officials close to the agency said it would almost certainly confirm that Iran had started enriching uranium in a second cascade of 164 centrifuges. But with inspectors' limited access, little else is likely to be revealed.

"The IAEA is losing knowledge about what Iran is doing," said David Albright, a former weapons inspector who runs the Institute for Science and International Security. "They can see how much uranium is enriched, [but] they don't know how many centrifuges are breaking … they don't know how many are being built, and Iran doesn't have to answer questions."

Meanwhile, Tuesday's elections in the U.S. and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld were greeted Friday by Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, as a victory for Iran and a show of "public opposition to the U.S.'s war-mongering policies."

Though President Bush's nominee to be the next secretary of Defense, Robert M. Gates, is expected to help set a new course on Iraq, he may also push the Bush administration in a new direction on Iran.

Gates has said that relations with Iran should never be normalized unless the regime gives up its nuclear program and its support for terrorism.

But in an influential 2004 report, Gates argued that Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons was largely driven by its "persistent sense of insecurity" vis-a-vis regional rivals and its "paramount adversary," the U.S. Gates said that the United States' lack of contact with Iran fueled this insecurity and that dialogue "need not await absolute harmony between the two governments."

U.S. Presses Russia To Bridge Gap Over UN Sanctions On Iran (BLOOM)

By Ed Johnson

Bloomberg, November 10, 2006

Nov. 10 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has spoken twice in the past week with her Russian counterpart to bridge differences over how to stop Iran developing nuclear weapons, the State Department said.

The U.S. is pressing for United Nations Security Council sanctions on Iran for failing to halt its uranium enrichment program. Russia, a trade partner of Iran, has proposed changes to a draft UN resolution that seeks to block the country acquiring atomic bomb and missile technology.

``She's doing her part to get this resolution over the goal line," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters in Washington yesterday. Rice spoke by telephone with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Nov. 8 and also last week, he said, according to a transcript of the briefing on the department's Web site.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, will visit Moscow today to discuss the issue with Russian officials, the state-run Iranian Students News Agency reported. Larijani plans to meet President Vladimir Putin and National Security Adviser Igor Ivanov to discuss the draft resolution.

Iran, a signatory to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, says its work is designed to fuel power plants and has repeatedly said it will press ahead with its atomic program even though the UN imposed an Aug. 31 deadline to halt enrichment. President George W. Bush's administration says the program is cover for developing a nuclear weapon.

Russian Amendments

Russia, a veto-wielding Security Council permanent member, has proposed changes to the draft circulated by the U.K., France and Germany. It has deleted a travel ban and asset freeze on officials of Iran's nuclear program and exempted from sanctions the Bushehr nuclear plant that Russia is helping build for the Islamic republic.

``We're starting to chip away at some of the issues," said McCormack, when asked if Rice made any progress in her conversations with Lavrov. ``But, you know, this is multilateral diplomacy, it takes a little bit of time."

China's UN Ambassador Wang Guangya said this week the differences may be unbridgeable. China, like Russia, opposes the U.S.-European approach.

Ambassadors of the Security Council's five permanent members, the U.S., U.K., Russia, China and France, met yesterday in New York together with Germany's ambassador to discuss the resolution, Agence France-Presse reported.

``I do think we made progress," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters, AFP said, adding they will meet again Nov. 13.

``We are not yet at the point where we can come to agreement on various issues," AFP cited Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin as saying.

Rice Says US Unfazed By Growth Of China's Global Role (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 10, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice played down concerns over the spread of Chinese influence around the globe, saying it was better for China to have friends in the world than enemies.

"I don't see any of this as zero sum," Rice told the Singapore Straits Times newspaper in an interview, a transcript of which was released by the State Department on Thursday.

Rice was responding to a question on China's growing power and relations with nations from Asia to Africa, notably following a summit of 48 African leaders in Beijing last week that highlighted the Asian giant's deepening economic and political ties with the resource-rich continent.

"I'd like to have China have friends in the world, it's better than having China have enemies in the world," said Rice.

"There have been times when we worried about the opposite -- that China would be a destabilizing factor in the world," she said.

"So I would rather see a China that is trying to reach out, that's trying to have friendships around the world."

Rice visited Beijing two weeks ago and praised the Chinese for their leading role in nudging North Korea back to multilateral negotiations aimed at getting Pyongyang to give up its newly proven nuclear arsenal.

"We have excellent relations with China," she said.

But 10 days ahead of an Asian summit at which President George W. Bush will meet his Chinese counterpart Hu Jintao, Rice said Washington still harbored concerns about China's role.

"China has to be responsible in its engagement with the world because it is a big power, it's not just a developing country," she said.

Rice specifically echoed concerns that China's engagement with African countries can be overly focused on gaining resources and markets without adequately addressing issues of governance and human rights.

"It needs to take responsibility in Africa, not just to seek resources but also to contribute to the development of Africa and so that people's lives are better," she said.

She also said there were "some aspects of China's external policies that are not very positive."

She mentioned difficulties on intellectual property rights, "an outsized military buildup of Chinese forces" that is worrying Beijing's neighbors and human rights concerns inside the country.

"China, of course, needs also in terms of its own domestic transition to respond to the natural desires of people for human rights and for religious freedom," she said.

China: Scapegoat Or Sputnik (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

Shanghai

As I was saying, Mr. Rove, Americans aren't as stupid as you think.

Now that we've settled that, and now that we've had an election that clarified which country is most important in shaping U.S. politics in 2006 — Iraq — I've come to visit the country that's most likely to shape U.S. politics in 2008: China.

The civil war in the Republican Party, which you are about to see, will be all about Iraq — whom to blame and how to withdraw before the issue wipes out more Republican candidates in 2008. But the coming civil war among the Democrats will be all about China.

I still believe that when the history of this era is written, the trend that historians will cite as the most significant will not be 9/11 and the U.S. invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq. It will be the rise of China and India. How the world accommodates itself to these rising powers, and how America manages the economic opportunities and challenges they pose, is still the most important global trend to watch.

It really hits you when you see the supersize buildings sprouting in Shanghai, or when you look at the world through non-American eyes. Kishore Mahbubani, the dean of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, told me the other day that Asia right now "is the most optimistic place in the world." More people have come out of poverty faster there — particularly in India and China — than at any time in the history of the world, and as a result, he notes, more people in Asia than anywhere else in the world today "wake up every morning sure that tomorrow is going to be better than yesterday."

But one person's optimism can be another person's flat wages. And that is why the Democrats and China are almost certain to butt heads. The Bush team's focus on Iraq and terrorism, coupled with the Democrats' lack of control over either house of Congress, has kept China-U.S. relations largely out of the headlines and on a relatively even keel during the Bush II years.

But two things will change that. One is the Democrats' return to control of both the House and Senate — powered by politicians like Nancy Pelosi, who has long taken a hard line vis-à-vis China on both economics and human rights, and Sherrod Brown, the newly elected senator from Ohio, who comes to D.C. with strong protectionist leanings from a state that has lost thousands of manufacturing jobs to Asia.

The other is the mood reflected in a Nov. 2 analysis in The Financial Times, headlined: "Anxious Middle: Why Ordinary Americans Have Missed Out on the Benefits of Growth."

Technology and globalization are flattening the global economic playing field today, enabling many more developing nations to compete for white-collar and blue-collar jobs once reserved for the developed world. This is one reason why growth in wages for the average U.S. worker has not been keeping pace with our growth in productivity and G.D.P.

"Economists call this phenomenon median wage stagnation," noted The Financial Times. "Median measures give the best picture of what is happening to the middle class because, unlike mean or average wages, median wages are not pulled upwards by rapid gains at the top. As the joke goes: Bill Gates walks into a bar and, on average, everyone there becomes a millionaire. But the median does not change."

Many Americans lately have started to get that joke, and it is one reason that with this new Democrat-led Congress we are likely to see a surge in protectionist legislation, more Wal-Mart bashing, a slowdown in free-trade expansion and increased calls for punitive actions if China doesn't reduce its trade surplus — which surged to a record in October.

China, in other words, is inevitably going to move back to the center of U.S. politics, because it crystallizes the economic challenges faced by U.S. workers in the 21st century. The big question for me is, how will President Bush and the Democratic Congress use China: as a scapegoat or a Sputnik?

Will they use it as an excuse to avoid doing the hard things, because it's all just China's fault, or as an excuse to rally the country — as we did after the Soviets leapt ahead of us in the space race and launched Sputnik — to make the kind of comprehensive changes in health care, portability of pensions, entitlements and lifelong learning to give America's middle class the best tools possible to thrive? A lot of history is going to turn on that answer, because if people don't feel they have the tools or skills to thrive in a world without walls, the pressure to put up walls, especially against China, will steadily mount.

U.S. Will Train Latin American Militaries (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin, Usa Today

USA Today, November 10, 2006

Ban lifted to offset trend toward left

WASHINGTON — Concern about leftist victories in Latin America has prompted President Bush to quietly grant a waiver that allows the United States to resume training militaries from 11 Latin American and Caribbean countries.

The administration hopes the training will forge links with countries in the region and blunt a leftward trend. Daniel Ortega, an adversary of the United States in the region during the 1980s, was elected president in Nicaragua this week. Bolivians chose another leftist, Evo Morales, last year.

A military training ban was originally designed to pressure countries into exempting U.S. soldiers from war crimes trials.

The 2002 U.S. law bars countries from receiving military aid and training if they refuse to promise immunity from prosecution to U.S. servicemembers who might get hauled before the International Criminal Court. The law allows presidential waivers.

The White House lifted the ban on 21 countries, about half in Latin America or the Caribbean, through a presidential memorandum Oct. 2 to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The training is conducted in the USA.

A ban on giving countries weapons remains. Commercial arms sales are not affected, said Jose Ruiz, a U.S. Southern Command spokesman.

The training ban had resulted in a loss of U.S. influence in the region. The issue gained urgency after a string of leftist candidates came to power in Latin America.

On a trip to the region this year, Rice said that the impact of the ban had been "the same as shooting ourselves in the foot."

China stepped into the gap. Ruiz said China "has approached every country in our area of responsibility" and has exchanged senior military officials with Ecuador, Bolivia, Chile and Cuba and provided military aid and training to Jamaica and Venezuela.

The ban remains in effect for some countries. Venezuela, whose fiery President Hugo Chávez is a critic of the Bush administration, remains ineligible because it is on a State Department list of countries alleged to have permitted the trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Chávez is up for re-election in December and leads in the polls. Cuba is also off-limits because of a long-standing U.S. embargo against Fidel Castro's regime.

Ruiz said efforts are being made to transfer money this year to begin training foreign officers from eligible countries.

Ortega Redux: A History Smolders On Cold War Embers (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 10 — For most of the world, the cold war ended when the Berlin Wall came down. Not so in the Caribbean basin.

Here the stubbornness of old cold warriors in Washington and the equal tenacity of leftist governments in Cuba and Venezuela have kept a miniature cold war going. Just as it was 20 years ago, Nicaragua now finds itself smack in the middle of the conflict with the election this week of Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist rebel leader, as president.

Mr. Ortega faces a balancing act no politician would envy, both inside the country and on the world stage. On the one hand, to satisfy his supporters, he must fulfill promises to "eradicate poverty," curb "savage capitalism," and remain friendly with his leftist allies, Fidel Castro of Cuba and Hugo Chávez of Venezuela. Venezuela, in particular, could be a source of cheap oil and money for social programs.

On the other hand, he can ill afford to lose more than $50 million a year in United States aid or credit from the International Monetary Fund. Neither can Nicaragua, one of the poorest countries in the hemisphere, jettison the newly approved free trade agreement between Central American countries and the United States. Just to survive economically, this nation of some 5.6 million people needs to continue exporting textiles and fruit to the United States and receiving remittances from Nicaraguans in the north.

"Nicaragua is basically a welfare state that depends on foreign inputs to survive, remittances and foreign aid," said an American diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity.

What is more, Mr. Ortega won with only 38 percent of the vote, and the National Assembly is divided among four parties. Every move he makes will involve negotiation and compromise with conservative lawmakers, who are desperate not to anger the Bush administration.

"The problems facing him make it almost impossible to have a successful presidency," said Larry Birns, the director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington. "He has no arrows in his quiver."

Mr. Ortega's precarious position may explain the careful nuance in his recent speeches. He ran on a rosy and vague promise of "jobs, peace and reconciliation," seldom attacked the United States, avoided Marxist rhetoric and wore his newfound religious convictions on his sleeve. These days he talks more on the stump about God than the proletariat.

For the moment, Mr. Ortega is walking very softly and speaking in dulcet tones. "Today more than ever, the Sandinistas have to be patient," he said to ecstatic Sandinista Party supporters after his victory this week. "We are not going to fall into provocations or insult anyone."

Still, once in a while, the old revolutionary flares in him. He has called President Bush "the Reagan of these times," and asserted that the "Yankee Reagan" wanted "to bring death and destruction to the region." Sometimes, he rails against the havoc the free trade agreement has wrought on small farms.

Since the election, he has taken pains to calm businessmen, assuring foreign investors on Wednesday that he will protect property rights in exchange for help combating poverty. "No one is going to allow the seizure of property big or small," he said. He has also reached out to his political opponents, saying he will keep in place reforms limiting the president's power.

Yet at his victory speech later the same day, Mr. Ortega made it clear that he would not be Washington's lackey. He thanked his leftist "brothers," Mr. Castro and Mr. Chávez, then took a dig at Washington, saying it was not the Sandinistas who broke off relations after the 1979 revolution. "It was the reverse," he said.

He also said he would push the country, which currently sells more than 60 percent of its exports to the United States, to join the anti-United States trade association Mr. Chávez wants to organize. And he said he would seek trade agreements with Europe and South America. "We have to know how to make our economy grow not depending on only one market," he said.

So far, the Bush administration has taken a wait-and-see attitude in the face of what seems like two different Ortegas. A State Department spokesman, Gonzalo Gallegos, said the United States' cooperation with Mr. Ortega would be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

Meanwhile, Mr. Castro and Mr. Chávez have used Mr. Ortega's victory to feed their own propaganda machines.

In Havana, Mr. Castro put out a statement saying the victory "fills our people with joy, at the same time filling the terrorist and genocidal government of the United States with opprobrium." In Caracas, Mr. Chávez claimed he and Mr. Ortega would be "uniting as never before" to construct a socialist future.

The outcome of this tug of war hinges on what steps Washington takes, several experts on the region said. The Bush administration has many high-ranking officials who were involved to one degree or another in the covert war against the Sandinistas and Mr. Ortega in the 1980s, among them Robert M. Gates, the man Mr. Bush put forward to be the new secretary of defense.

So even though Nicaragua is hardly a threat to national security, the memories of the 1980s may influence the Bush administration's policies, some experts say. "One of the big questions is, independent of what Ortega does, what approach will the U.S. take?" said Geoff Thale of the Washington Office on Latin America, an independent research group.

People who know Mr. Ortega worry his temper will get the best of him if Washington tries to put pressure on him.

"The worst thing that could happen is if Daniel Ortega extends his hand to Bush and Bush rejects it," said Sergio Ramírez, who was the vice president in the late 1980s under Mr. Ortega. "What will happen is that he's going to say, 'Fine, I will go with Chávez.' "

White House Watches Ortega (WT)

By Carmen Gentile, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 10, 2006

MIAMI — The Bush administration has adopted a wait-and-see approach toward relations with Nicaragua after the return to power of former White House foe Daniel Ortega.

Some U.S. lawmakers expressed fears before Sunday's vote that a return to power by Mr. Ortega would further embolden Latin America's anti-Washington bloc, led by Cuba's Fidel Castro and Venezuela's Hugo Chavez.

But after Mr. Ortega's clear victory in a crowded field, U.S. officials said they would respect the decision of the Nicaraguan people to re-elect the Sandinista leader who led a protracted and bloody war in the 1980s against the U.S.-backed Contra rebels.

"We ... look forward to establishing positive relations with Mr. Ortega and his new government," said Eric Watnik, a State Department spokesman.

In the days after an election in which the leftist Mr. Ortega handily defeated the U.S.-backed and Harvard-educated Eduardo Montealegre, U.S. officials were unusually reticent about the results.

Some said they were disappointed with the results and feared Mr. Ortega would roll back free-market reforms and Nicaragua's approval of the Central American Free Trade Agreement, designed to end tariffs on trade among Central American countries, the United States and the Dominican Republic.

However, the reforms instituted since Mr. Ortega was defeated 16 years ago have done little to better the lives of most Nicaraguans, about half of whom live on no more than $1 a day. The country remains the second poorest in the hemisphere ahead of only Haiti.

Before the election, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, wrote a letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recommending a termination of the billions of dollars in remittances that flow into Nicaragua from friends and relatives living in the United States.

But administration officials say they are willing to give the benefit of the doubt to the Nicaraguan president-elect. "We will work with [Mr. Ortega] in support of Nicaragua's democratic future," Mr. Watnik said.

Hoping to assuage fears that he might return Nicaragua to the dark days of its Soviet-influenced rule and hyperinflation, Mr. Ortega told business leaders this week that he would respect the reforms implemented by the outgoing Liberal Constitutional Party.

"Sixteen years have passed since the war ended," he said before the election. "I ask God to give us a chance to govern in peace together, without political differences, everyone together so that we can pull Nicaragua out of poverty."

He did say in the campaign that CAFTA was "subject to review" and that poor Nicaraguans had been reduced to "beggars" since it took effect.

Many Nicaragua analysts say Mr. Ortega today is a far cry from the heavy-handed leftist who helped sink Nicaragua into the depths of poverty and despair.

"Ortega is clearly a changed man," said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington, noting the Nicaraguan leader's willingness to accept economic reforms approved by Washington and the World Bank.

Some U.S. leaders "still have old memories of Ortega and the Sandinistas as villains with ties to Moscow," he said.

World Bank officials have expressed cautious optimism about the new administration. "We don't envisage any dramatic shift in policy," said Joseph Owen, World Bank country director for Nicaragua.

Mr. Owen noted that Nicaragua has received $378 million in "soft" loans for 14 development projects, including infrastructure, education and poverty-reduction programs.

Nicaragua hopes that confidence in its ability to manage loan money eventually will pervade White House attitudes as well.

Ortega, Again (NYT)

Nicaragua's top Sandinista is back — and with him international anxiety. Daniel Ortega won the presidency of Nicaragua on Sunday, raising fears that Hugo Chávez and Fidel Castro now have another faithful acolyte.

But while Mr. Ortega's election is bad news, it is not because he is still a Marxist revolutionary. He is an old-style Latin American strongman who, we fear, will further weaken Nicaragua's democratic institutions and retard economic progress. Washington's challenge will be to figure out how to help curb Mr. Ortega's authoritarian impulses without pushing him into Mr. Chávez's arms.

Mr. Ortega, who was voted out of power in 1990, won this time because his opponents could not agree on a single candidate. The 39 percent of the country that voted for him was yearning for any change that could dig the country out of its deep poverty. He still had to use a series of political maneuvers and dirty tricks to ensure his victory.

As leader of the Sandinistas in the late 1990s, he made Nicaragua ungovernable by sending protesters into the streets. In return for peace, Arnoldo Alemán, the president then, allowed Mr. Ortega to pack the Supreme Court and the election commission, and arranged for both Mr. Ortega and himself to be granted lifetime legal immunity. That allowed Mr. Ortega to escape prosecution after his stepdaughter accused him of sexual abuse, beginning when she was 11. (Since stripped of his immunity, Mr. Alemán is serving 20 years for embezzlement.)

Mr. Alemán also agreed to lower the threshold of votes required to win a first-round election — upping the chances of an Ortega victory.

In his last pre-election act of cynicism, Mr. Ortega neutralized the powerful Catholic Church's opposition by backing passage of a bill that criminalizes all abortion. Mr. Ortega was once pro-Marxist, but now he's pro-Ortega. And that's the problem.

The Other Winner In Nicaragua (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'grady

The Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2006

MANAGUA -- It was just past noon here Sunday when I made my way to a polling station in the barrio of La Chureca, a sprawling garbage dump that also happens be home to some of this city's most destitute denizens. I wanted to see how the voting in the presidential election was going in a neighborhood known as a Sandinista stronghold.

The first glimpse of La Chureca, riding along a bumpy dirt road, is heaps of rubbish as far as the eye can see, fermenting under the hot sun and the watchful eyes of circling vultures. Soon more detail comes into view: Emaciated cattle, with feral dogs under foot, are "grazing" through the mounds of trash. Naked toddlers dart in and out of corrugated-tin shacks. On Sunday afternoon, at a small school on the side of the road, the polls were open and locals were voting just as they were all around the capital. Things were calm.

La Chureca is a symbol of Nicaragua's extreme poverty but as it turns out, it's not solely the property of former Sandinista dictator Daniel Ortega, who won the presidential election with 38% of the vote. On Monday afternoon, when I interviewed right-of-center candidate Eduardo Montealegre of the Liberal Nicaraguan Alliance (ALN) -- who came in second with 29% -- I asked him about the place. He said he also campaigned door to door in the neighborhood and that he found some support there.

Mr. Montealegre seems to have done better than expected in a number of traditionally strong Sandinista regions around the country. He got beat in the rural highlands, where third-place candidate José Rizo of the Constitutional Liberal Party (PLC) acted as the spoiler, draining anti-Sandinista votes away from the ALN. He finished with 26%.

Mr. Ortega's victory has demoralized Nicaraguans who were hoping that the days of thuggish Sandinista government might be behind them. Yet despite the disappointment of an Ortega comeback, there are reasons not to paint the country with the broad brush of defeat in the aftermath of the election. Mr. Montealegre's ALN has accomplished something big for Nicaraguan democracy by unseating the corrupt PLC as the country's main center-right party and establishing itself as a credible force against the Sandinistas.

On the question of whether Sunday's vote was fair, it's safe to say that if there was serious fraud it probably occurred before the polls even opened. Complaints of late poll openings and some early closings undoubtedly have merit. In my own narrow sampling, I noted that Mr. Ortega's control of the Supreme Electoral Council made it easy for Sandinistas to slow down the process and even harass opposition-party poll workers.

Yet the bigger problem may have been the structural damage caused by "the pact," a corrupt 1999 agreement between Mr. Ortega and former PLC President Arnoldo Aleman, who is now serving a 20-year sentence for fraud and money laundering. That deal lowered the threshold for a first-round victory to 35%, and by putting the CSE in the hands of the Sandinistas, allowed the Ortega camp to manipulate voter rolls in its favor.

Even so, Mr. Ortega could not have won without help from Mr. Rizo, who was widely viewed here as Mr. Aleman's puppet. While surveys show that Nicaraguans highly disapprove of PLC corruption, it also seems that rural highlanders reasoned that only the traditional PLC machine could keep Mr. Ortega out of office. Mr. Rizo thus became Nicaragua's Ross Perot. It was in highland regions, like Matagalpa, where the Sandinista victory was sewn up.

With the odds stacked heavily against him, Mr. Montealegre might have been trounced. The fact that he was not says much about the hunger here for something other than a choice between a recycled dictator on the left and a right-wing party headed by a convicted crook. The final tallies are also a commentary on Mr. Montealegre's leadership potential.

Two years ago there was no ALN party. Mr. Montealegre broke with the PLC and fast became the symbol of popular disgust with right-wing corruption. As Eduardo Enriquez, managing editor of Nicaragua's daily newspaper La Prensa wrote in a note to me on Wednesday, "In 18 months the ALN has shown a true capacity to organize that we have not seen in the history of Nicaraguan democracy, including the accomplishment of going from zero to 30% of valid votes. This is no less than a major victory that testifies to the leadership of the candidate and the capacity to organize the ALN team. The result is that Eduardo Montealegre is the new leader of the right and the new leader of the opposition."

Mr. Montealegre, who now goes to the congress as representative, has his work cut out. The ALN will have only about 30 seats in the chamber against 37 for the Sandinistas and 18 for the PLC. The ALN will need a strategy to prohibit the authoritarian Mr. Ortega from teaming up with the PLC and steamrolling democracy à la Venezuela's Hugo Chávez. As Mr. Enriquez points out, the ALN might find a way to co-govern with the Sandinistas, as current president Enrique Bolanos has done. But the situation would be very unstable given Mr. Ortega's appetite for power.

Mr. Enriquez, who is no apologist for Mr. Aleman, says the ALN could also try to "govern from below" by forming a coalition with the PLC to keep Mr. Ortega in check. Though this too, he says, is problematic. It might require that the ALN give Mr. Aleman a pardon, a distasteful proposition and also a risky one, since up to now the former president has demonstrated a profound lack of principles.

Still, Mr. Montealegre is not without leverage. Many Nicaraguans feel duped by the dirty tricks that the PLC used to undermine the Montealegre campaign and put Mr. Ortega in office. Both the party and Mr. Aleman are discredited. In that sense, Nicaraguans are in a better position today than they have been for many years. There might even be hope for the people of La Chureca.

Security Council Sets Palestinian Vote (AP)

By Justin Bergman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

The U.N. Security Council will vote Saturday on an Arab-backed draft resolution condemning the Israeli military offensive in Gaza and demanding a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the coastal strip, a European diplomat said.

Members of the Security Council met briefly late Friday afternoon to discuss the draft, which was softened somewhat from a version being circulated earlier this week.

Still, European diplomats said Friday there remained concerns among some of the council members about the language of the draft, making passage uncertain. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because consultations were still taking place.

The U.S. blocked a U.N. Security Council resolution this summer demanding Israel halt its offensive in the Gaza Strip, which it launched in June following the capture of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked Palestinian militants. It was the first Security Council veto in nearly two years.

Palestinians have denounced the Security Council's silence on the offensive this week, increasing its calls for action after an Israeli artillery barrage in the northern Gaza Strip town of Beit Hanoun killed 19 people on Wednesday.

The draft resolution, which was introduced by Qatar, calls for Israel to immediately cease its military operations in the Gaza Strip and withdraw its troops. It also calls upon the Palestinian Authority to take "immediate and sustained action" to bring an end to violence, including the firing of rockets on Israeli territory.

The draft requests the U.N. secretary-general establish a "fact-finding mission" to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, and asks the international community to restart the peace process with the "possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations."

During an open session Thursday on the Gaza situation, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton called for restraint on all sides.

He said Israel must investigate the Beit Hanoun killings and take steps to avoid a repeat of the incident. He also condemned Palestinian militant rocket attacks into Israel, saying Israel has a right to defend itself.

Palestinian PM Offers To Resign For Aid (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Friday he would be willing to sacrifice his job if the international community would lift economic sanctions that have crippled his Hamas-led government.

Haniyeh's statement was the latest indication that the Islamic Hamas group was nearing a deal to form a national unity government with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' moderate Fatah Party that would be made up of independent experts.

Such a coalition would presumably present a more moderate face to the world and convince the West to restore hundreds of millions of dollars in international funding.

"When the issue of the siege is on one side, and my being prime minister is on the other, let the siege be lifted to end the suffering of the Palestinian people," Haniyeh said, referring to the sanctions that have caused widespread hardship in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Haniyeh's comments came a day after Abbas spoke on the phone with his main political rival, Hamas' supreme leader Khaled Mashaal — their first conversation since April. Hamas spokesman Fawzi Barhoum said their discussion indicated the sides were nearing agreement.

The international sanctions, including tax revenues Israel has withheld since Hamas took power in March, has made it largely impossible for Hamas to pay the government's 165,000 employees.

The West, including the United States, has said it will not lift sanctions unless Hamas recognizes Israel, renounces violence and accepts past peace deals, something Hamas has so far refused to do.

The program of the proposed new unity government is vague on the key issue of recognizing Israel, calling for a Palestinian state on only the lands captured by Israel in the 1967 Mideast War. Hamas' charter calls for an Islamic state on those lands as well as Israel.

In addition to the economic sanctions, Palestinians in Gaza have weathered a monthslong Israeli offensive that began after Hamas militants tunneled into Israel and captured a soldier in June.

More than 50 people have been killed in recent days in the Israeli artillery barrage, which aimed at preventing Palestinian militants from firing rockets at Israel. Among them were 19 killed Wednesday in the northern Gaza Strip town of Beit Hanoun when shells landed as residents were sleeping.

The U.N. Security Council will vote Saturday on an Arab-backed draft resolution condemning the Israeli military offensive in Gaza and demanding a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the coastal strip, a European diplomat said.

The draft requests the U.N. secretary-general establish a "fact-finding mission" to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, and asks the international community to restart the peace process with the "possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations."

The U.S. blocked a U.N. Security Council resolution this summer demanding Israel halt its offensive in the Gaza Strip. It was the first Security Council veto in nearly two years.

Meanwhile, thousands marched through Middle East capitals Friday to protest an Israeli offensive, their calls often spilling into a broader outcry against America's policy in the region and its backing of Israel.

In Jordan, some 1,000 demonstrators filed into the streets after Muslim noon prayers, chanting slogans in support of the Palestinians, but also against the sentencing of Saddam Hussein in neighboring Iraq.

In Sudan, about 2,000 people gathered in front of the United Nations mission building and burnt American and Israeli flags. "Down down USA, we won't be governed by the CIA," chanted the crowd, which was prevented by police from approaching the U.N. building.

Similar protests were held in Egypt, Syria and Lebanon.

In an interview with NBC's "Today" show Friday, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert defended himself against critics who said Israel was using too much force against the Palestinians, saying he thinks "we are very, very restrained in using power."

"When someone criticizes us, I say what would you do when rockets fall on the heads of innocent Israelis?" he said.

Berlin Aims To Revive Mideast 'Quartet' (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Germany will try to advance the Middle East peace process next year by reviving the joint diplomatic efforts in the region by the US, European Union, Russia and the United Nations, Angela Merkel, chancellor, said yesterday.

Speaking at a security conference in Berlin, Ms Merkel said Germany would use its EU presidency from January onwards to breath new life into the Middle East "Quartet" involving these four international interests.

"We see the need to start the quartet again and will discuss this with our partners" she said, adding that Berlin was determined to contribute to helping resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, "even if the negotiations involved prove to be difficult".

Officials said the chancellor's comments reflected frustration in Germany and the EU that the quartet had been largely inactive in recent months, despite the tensions and violence in the Middle East.

Germany in January assumes both the six-month EU presidency and the year-long presidency of the G8 group of industrial countries and German diplomats admit that Berlin is under pressure to take a heavyweight leadership role in the Middle East and elsewhere in this period.

"We can't just sit back and do nothing" on the Middle East, said one German official, citing as an example the Israeli shelling in northern Gaza on Wednesday that left 18 Palestinian civilians dead.

In addition, Germany has since last month, and for the first time in its postwar history, been involved in a peacekeeping mission in the region, with several ships patrolling the Lebanese coast to prevent arms being smuggled to the Hizbollah movement. "We have a special responsibility to this region," Ms Merkel said, referring to Germany's commitment to ensure the existence of Israel, arising from its Nazi past.

Ms Merkel's announcement followed repeated suggestions by Frank-Walter Steinmeier, foreign minister, that the quartet structure be revived, in particular to draw Washington into broader international initiatives in the Middle East.

In order to reinforce the quartet's role, its mandate could be expanded to include related regional conflicts, such as that between Israel and Lebanon, Mr Steinmeier has argued. In addition, other countries, such as Egypt, could be drawn into the talks to make them more representative.

The quartet's last big policy decision was in January, when, after a meeting in London attended by Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, it called on Hamas to recognise Israel's right to exist, abide by past agreements and renounce violence.

Some diplomats now fear that Europe and the US could be diverging, particularly if the Palestinians succeed in their attempts to form a national unity government. While the EU would like to recognise and work with such a government, Washington is much less enthusiastic.

Palestinians Mourn Civilians Killed By Israel (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

BEIT HANUN, Gaza, Nov. 9 — Palestinians marched in anger and mourning on Thursday for 18 civilians killed by Israeli artillery — baring for cameras the battered faces of two dead children. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel offered to ease tensions by meeting the Palestinian president “anytime, anyplace.”

“I am very uncomfortable with this event,” Mr. Olmert said at a business conference in Tel Aviv. “I’m very distressed.”

Saying that he had personally investigated the artillery strike, which spurred Hamas to warn that it might resume suicide bombings against Israeli civilians, Mr. Olmert called the shelling Wednesday a “mistake” caused by technical failure. And he urged Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, to meet with him immediately.

“He will be surprised when he will sit with me of how far we are prepared to go,” he said. “I can offer him a lot.”

He did not explain what he meant. But his words seemed to reflect deep embarrassment at the deaths, mostly of women and children. The strike was condemned around the world, but also by many Israelis who are concerned about the number of civilians killed in Israeli operations to curb rocket fire by Palestinian militants into Israel.

Mr. Olmert’s statement also seemed to reposition the deaths — the largest single loss of life among Palestinians in years — into the realm of politics.

Any discussion between the men would invariably center on the difficult question of prisoners. It is unclear, however, how far Mr. Olmert could move from his past insistence that an Israeli soldier captured by Palestinian militants in June must be released before he would free hundreds of Palestinians from Israeli jails.

Mr. Abbas did not immediately respond to Mr. Olmert's offer. But he has refused other such open-ended offers, saying that he wanted a concrete deal first on the prisoners and a meeting of "substance."

On Thursday evening, the Israeli military issued its first detailed explanation of what went wrong with the shelling, saying an aiming radar had malfunctioned, causing the rounds to hit a cluster of civilians' houses.

Maj. Avital Leibovich, an army spokeswoman, said that a first volley of 13 shells had been aimed at an orange grove concealing rocket launchers and landed just under a mile away from the houses. A second barrage of 11 rounds, she said, was "aimed 400 meters away from where they hit."

"What we know from aerial photos is that two houses were hit directly," she said. "Our estimate is that 5 or 6 shells of the 11 hit two houses."

She added that, as is standard practice, the system was tested on targets before being used and that it had functioned properly.

Thousands of Palestinians, waving banners and shooting guns, returned to the shrapnel-scarred houses on Thursday with the bodies of the victims, carried on stretchers and wrapped in the yellow flags of the Fatah Party, led for decades by Yasir Arafat and now by Mr. Abbas. Women wailed and screamed for revenge: "Martyrs by the millions!" they chanted. "We are going to Jerusalem!"

Many of the dead were completely covered. But family members exposed the faces of two toddlers, the youngest victims — sisters named Maisa and Maram Athamnah, — as they held their bodies over their heads for the crowd and cameras to see.

"How was this baby guilty?" asked Kamal Hamdan, 43, after one of the bodies was paraded past him.

The bodies were carried to a new cemetery and buried in a single row, the two girls in the same concrete tomb as their mother, Manal, 25. The mood was furious, with many people saying they believed that Palestinians should intensify their attacks on Israel, civilians included.

"We must continue our resistance, even if the price is as big as this," said Ataa Zania, a paramedic who helped evacuate the dead and wounded on Wednesday. "Whoever wants to liberate his country has to pay the price."

As such, there was much approval for statements from Hamas leaders that they might resume suicide bombings inside Israel.

Several political analysts and experts on Hamas said they did not expect the group to resume a large-scale campaign of suicide attacks. Hamas, they contend, undertook a major shift in direction from militant group to political leadership when it won the Palestinian elections in January, and it stands to risk that by resuming a suicide campaign.

The group seems to remain deeply engaged in politics. On Thursday, the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, met again with Mr. Abbas here in Gaza in talks on a government of national unity, in which the Hamas cabinet would step down in favor of professionals and technocrats. The talks, however, are moving slowly, with many complications and little apparent hope of a deal in the next few days.

But several experts said they did not rule out one large attack by Hamas in specific retaliation against the deaths here.

"As in physics, every action has a reaction," said Mustafah Sawwaf, a journalist and political analyst. "Now there is a lot of pressure" from Palestinians not just on Hamas, but other factions, to retaliate.

But Abu Obaida, a Hamas military spokesman, took pains to clarify a statement that the group's military wing issued the day before warning of "hard lessons" in store for the United States, as Israel's ally. He strongly denied that Hamas was calling for violence against Americans or their interests.

The "only theater of operations is Palestine, its only target is the Israeli occupation," he said. "We have no intention of targeting any other nation or extending our theater of operation beyond the current one at this time.

"Of course," he added, "this does not clear the United States of its moral obligation to try and be even-handed and objective instead of its bias toward Israel."

Olmert: Israel Won't Stop Targeting Gaza (AP-Y)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Israel will keep targeting Palestinian rocket squads in Gaza despite the risk of inadvertently hitting civilians, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Thursday, as tens of thousands of Palestinians buried 18 victims of an errant Israeli artillery strike.

DOJ_NMG_0093681

Women collapsed in grief, gunmen fired in the air and a man hoisted his dead baby aloft during the funeral procession in the northern Gaza border town of Beit Hanoun, where several Israeli shells struck a residential area early Wednesday. All of the dead belonged to a single extended family.

The Israeli military confirmed Thursday evening for the first time that its artillery caused the casulaties, suspending the shelling.

Amid the anguish, moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas picked up the phone and called his main political rival, Hamas' supreme leader Khaled Mashaal — a move that could help prevent the Islamic militant group from renewing attacks on Israel and also pave the way for a moderate Palestinian government.

Abbas and Mashaal, who lives in exile in Damascus, Syria, agreed to meet after agreement has been reached on a new government of experts, to be appointed by Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement, said a senior Palestinian official who sat in on the conversation. Both sides hope that such a government will be acceptable to the West and end a crippling international aid boycott.

Abbas had refused to talk to Mashaal since April, when the Hamas leader harshly criticized the Palestinian president in a speech. However, with violence threatening to escalate further after the Beit Hanoun strike and militants calling for revenge, he contacted Mashaal to try to lock up a coalition deal. A key sticking point is the choice of a new prime minister who has ties to Hamas, but would also be acceptable to the West.

In Jerusalem, Olmert said that while he regrets the latest deaths, Israel will press ahead with strikes against Palestinian militants firing rockets at Israeli border towns.

"The military will continue as long as there will be Qassam shooting," he said, using the name for Hamas' homemade rockets. "We are not going to stop," indicating Israel would keep up its airstrikes in Gaza aimed at militants even with the artillery falling silent for now.

"We will take precautions in order to avoid unnecessary mistakes," he said. "We will do everything in our power to avoid it. I think it would not be serious to promise that it may not happen. It may happen."

Olmert said the artillery was meant to hit an orange grove from which troops saw rockets fired seconds earlier, but instead hit homes in Beit Hanoun, some 500 meters (yards) away.

The military said the results of its inquiry concluded that "the Palestinian civilian casualties were caused by IDF (Israeli army) artillery." The military statement said the inquiry determined the problem was a "technical failure" in the system that directs the fire. It said the army commander ordered a halt to artillery fire at Gaza until a further check is completed.

The Defense Ministry said in a statement that Defense Minister Amir Peretz ordered the military to "re-evaluate its policy of artillery fire in Gaza, including the safety range."

Beit Hanoun has been the focus of a week-long Israeli offensive meant to halt rocket the attacks. Wednesday's shelling came a day after Israeli ground forces pulled out of Beit Hanoun.

The shells landed as residents were still asleep, and witnesses said many were killed as they fled their homes in panic. The 18 dead was the highest Palestinian civilian toll in a single incident since the current conflict erupted in September 2000. The highest toll of Israeli civilians was 29 killed in a Palestinian suicide bombing at a Passover gathering in March 2002.

In Thursday's funeral, the bodies arrived at the cemetery in a convoy of 18 ambulances which drove from the local hospital through the artillery-scarred cluster of apartment buildings. Cries of "God is greater than Israel and America," punctuated by gunshots, rang out as the bodies were brought out on stretchers.

"I will avenge, I will avenge!" screamed one of the victims' relatives as he fired his weapon, voicing a common sentiment among the mourners.

"The Zionist enemy understands only the language of force and therefore I say, 'an eye for an eye, a nose for a nose,'" chanted Abdel al-Hakim Awad, a Fatah spokesman. "The residents of Sderot, the residents of Ashkelon, even the residents of Tel Aviv, are not going to enjoy security or peace as long as you are suffering, our beloved people in Beit Hanoun."

The freshly dug graves were lined up in a single row, each marked by a concrete block. A Palestinian flag fluttered over each one.

Two Israeli unmanned aircraft buzzed overhead.

All of the dead belonged to the al-Athamnas, a prominent family in town that includes several doctors and professionals. Family members said they had fled during the recent Israeli offensive, returning home after Tuesday's pullout.

The U.N. Security Council was to meet in special session later Thursday. Palestinians hoped for a condemnation of Israel, on top of the denunciations Israel absorbed from governments worldwide after the attack.

Israeli police, fearing revenge attacks, stepped up their alert level, mobilizing forces across the country.

Anaylsis: Hamas Has Big Stake In Truce (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0093682

By Steven Gutkin, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 10, 2006

Hamas' threats to resume attacks inside Israel are playing well on the Palestinian street, but the group has a big stake in keeping its truce with Israel as it struggles to end a Western aid boycott and transform itself into a legitimate political power.

Hamas is already moving ahead with efforts to form a national unity government with the rival Fatah Party despite the killing of 18 Palestinian civilians by an errant Israeli artillery barrage. Such a government, made up of independent experts, would presumably project a more moderate face to the world.

However, killings of Palestinian civilians have often led to spiraling violence in the past. And Palestinians, furious over what they see as Israeli brutality and a lukewarm international response, are in no mood for concessions.

"While our children are drowning in their blood in Gaza, their children in Israel should not be any safer," a Hamas spokesman, Fawzi Barhoum, said Thursday as tens of thousands marched through Gaza's streets in funeral processions.

His comments echoed those of Hamas' exiled leader, Khaled Mashaal, who canceled a cease-fire with Israel and said his militants would answer the Gaza deaths with "deeds, not words."

It's difficult to persuade Hamas to share power in a more moderate government "when people are burying their children, burying their women, seeing this massive destruction," said Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat.

Still, a telephone conversation between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Mashaal indicated that Wednesday's bloodshed in Gaza would not derail coalition talks. The two men hadn't spoken for months, and aides to Abbas said their discussion Thursday boded well for progress.

Even Israelis, aware of Hamas' stake in continued calm, didn't seem to be taking Mashaal's threats too seriously. "His language is very often like that. It's nothing new," said Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the artillery barrage in Beit Hanoun was caused by a "technical failure" and said he was "very distressed" by what happened. He also called for an immediate meeting with Abbas.

Previous episodes illustrated how quickly violence can spin out of control. A June 9 explosion at a Gaza beach that killed eight civilians was followed by the capture of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked militants and an Israeli invasion of Gaza. Israel and Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon fought a 34-day war after two Israeli soldiers were seized.

Still, this time there might be enough forces at play to prevent an escalation.

Hamas, which came to power in March after winning legislative elections, was met with a devastating international aid boycott that hindered its ability to pay tens of thousands of public workers whose salaries are the backbone of the Palestinian economy.

Before the deaths in Beit Hanoun, Hamas and Fatah said they were close to forming a national unity government that many Palestinians hoped would be the beginning of the end of the international boycott.

Hamas killed scores of Israelis in suicide bombings before 2005, but has refrained from such attacks for almost two years — even as it kept firing rockets into Israel.

Ahmed Yousef, senior political adviser to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, signaled the group would not resume the sort of attacks that would invite harsh Israeli reprisals and impede Hamas's ability to govern.

"There is no decision to resume suicide bombing in Israel, but I don't rule out that other Palestinian parties would resort to such attacks," said Yousef, apparently referring to the militants of Islamic Jihad, which is not participating in the truce.

In Israel, there is growing criticism of the military's use of artillery against Palestinian militants, saying it subjects civilians to undue danger and ultimately harms Israeli interests.

"Instead of more and more pointless military operations, which will not lead to anything except kindling more hatred, we must try a completely different path," said an editorial in the Haaretz daily.

Israeli politicians and military commanders are under great pressure, however, to stop daily rocket fire from Gaza on southern Israeli towns.

Wednesday's bloodshed was preceded by a weeklong Israeli offensive in Beit Hanoun that killed more than 50 Palestinians. Shortly after Israel pulled out, rocket fire resumed.

Israeli political analyst Yossi Alpher said there's nothing the army can do to halt the rocket fire, which has persisted unabated since Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip more than a year ago.

"We don't have a solution short of reoccupying every single house and every square meter of land and we're not going to do that," he said.

The Perils Of Inaction (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0093683

The New York Times, November 10, 2006

There have never been easy answers for how to broker peace between Israel and the Palestinians. But the horrifying price of ignoring the problem was made clear again this week when errant Israeli tank shells crashed into a Gaza neighborhood, killing 18 people, including seven children, as they slept.

There is more than enough blame to go around. Militants in Gaza constantly lob crude rockets across the border. The Hamas movement — voted into power last winter — is refusing to even implicitly recognize Israel, although doing so would mean resumption of international aid and lessening the desperation of its own people. Hamas's military wing has called for attacks on American targets in retaliation for the Gaza deaths.

And even as he expressed his distress for the deaths in Gaza — and called for an immediate meeting with Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate Palestinian president — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel would continue striking militants, and could not promise that mistakes "may not happen."

Yesterday, analysts were trying to figure out which was the most immediate danger: a new wave of terrorist attacks against Americans, the start of a full scale Israeli-Palestinian war, or a civil war between Hamas and its rival Fatah if talks on forming a unity government fail.

In such times, President Bush's call for "care and restraint" on all sides seems woefully inadequate. That is also how we would describe Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's sterile tour of the region last month. Since her return, the administration has not taken a single step to revive peace talks.

If there is any way out, Mr. Bush needs to pledge his prestige and the full resources of his remaining presidency to negotiating a Middle East peace. Even before Mr. Olmert visits Washington next week, Mr. Bush should send Ms. Rice back to the region to broker an immediate cease-fire.

She needs to insist that the Israelis restrain their offensives into Palestinian territory and cease all settlement construction. And she needs to make clear to the Palestinians that while words are important, there will be no resumption of aid until their security forces move aggressively to halt rocket and terrorist attacks against Israel.

We had hoped Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice would have figured out the cost of inaction and drift after last summer's disastrous war in Lebanon. Perhaps this week's return look into the abyss will stir them.

Under Heavy Police Guard, Gay Rights Advocates Rally In Jerusalem (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 10 — After Supreme Court rulings, criticism from the Vatican and several nights of rioting by angry opponents, Jerusalem's gay community held a small, orderly rally Friday under a heavy police guard.

The police contingent of 3,000 was nearly as large as the crowd, which cheered speeches and danced to music from a stage draped in rainbow banners at Hebrew University's sports stadium.

The venue was changed twice as the police sought a secure area, well away from an Orthodox Jewish neighborhood where youths have rioted in opposition to the event. Friday's rally was much more modest than the original plan, which had called for a large march through the city center, and organizers and participants were divided on whether to declare it a full success.

"I'm disappointed because I believe the religious people won this battle, and the people who believe in democracy and human rights lost," Jonathan Oron, 29, a graduate student at Tel Aviv University, said at the rally.

But Avshalom Vilan, a member of Parliament from the left-wing Meretz Party, said, "This is a success, because we stood up for the basic principle of our right to demonstrate."

Many in the crowd said they were not gay, and had come to show support for civil rights in what has become a contentious annual affair in this religious, conservative city.

Jerusalem Open House, a gay and lesbian group, has held a similar event for the past five years, and the buildup this year was again marked by staunch opposition from Jewish, Muslim and Christian leaders, who rarely find points of agreement.

"If it was up to me, I would send the gay community, who insisted on celebrating in Jerusalem, to Sodom and Gomorrah," said Eli Yishai, one of Israel's deputy prime ministers and the leader of Shas, an Orthodox party that belongs to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's governing coalition.

Noting that Christian and Muslim clerics also opposed the event, Mr. Yishai told Israel Radio, "If we cannot be sensitive to Jewish feelings, perhaps we can listen to those of other religions."

In liberal, secular Tel Aviv, gay-themed events take place without a ripple. But in Jerusalem, there is always friction.

DOJ_NMG_0093684

Last year, a 10-day international gay festival was planned for Jerusalem in August, and faced strong opposition from religious groups. The event was canceled when the Israeli government scheduled the planned withdrawal of Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip at the same time, and Israeli security officials expressed concern that they would be stretched too thin.

Instead, a local march was held last year, when an Orthodox man stabbed and wounded three participants.

This year, some Orthodox leaders again expressed strong opposition in advance of the march. On several nights during the past week, young men in the Orthodox neighborhood of Mea Shearim rioted, throwing stones at police officers and burning garbage in the streets.

"I think there has been a general weakening of the rule of law in Israel, and some people feel they can trample on the rights of others," said Noa Sattath, a leader of Jerusalem Open House.

In recent months, members of a parliamentary committee held two lengthy debates on the event. Israel's Supreme Court rejected several petitions seeking to bar it.

The Vatican on Wednesday urged the Israeli government to cancel the rally, saying it would "prove offensive to the great majority of Jews, Muslims and Christians, given the sacred character of the city of Jerusalem."

With the police serving as mediators, the march was first postponed and moved to a part of the city dominated by government buildings, regarded as a secure area.

But after the Israeli military killed 18 Palestinian civilians in a shelling attack in the Gaza Strip on Wednesday, the Israeli security forces went on a heightened state of alert to guard against a Palestinian attack. The police sought an even more secure location for Friday's rally, and moved it to the Hebrew University stadium. They blocked off streets for a half-mile in all directions.

Orthodox leaders agreed not to stage protests on Friday. However, in a one-man demonstration, Rabbi Yehuda Levin, who flew in from Brooklyn, denounced the rally from the front gate of the stadium.

"They are making a statement against God himself," said Rabbi Levin, of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada. "They are creating bad feelings. They are not being tolerant of our feelings."

Also, the police said they had detained about 30 gay activists who sought to march from a park in Jerusalem, and held five Orthodox men in the same area who were found with knives.

Israeli Gay Rights Parade Called Off (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

JERUSALEM — As the Israeli-Palestinian conflict boiled over this week, it competed for headlines here with a pivotal clash in Israel's culture war between secular and Orthodox Jewish values.

The inflammatory issue: gay rights in the Holy Land.

For days, Israeli television aired images of ultra-Orthodox Jews in black suits and hats, pelting police with stones and setting cars afire in a crusade against a planned gay pride march through Jerusalem.

The battle ended Friday in a setback for Israel's gay community, which bowed to police and rabbinical pressure to take the annual event off the streets and confine it to a stadium. Nearly 4,000 revelers waved rainbow flags and danced to live rock and rap music, but the mood was dampened by a sense of retreat.

"They decided to lock us in a cage," said Ronen Hady-Cohen, a 30-year-old medical student who walked through a protective cordon of 3,000 police officers to get to the rally at Hebrew University's fenced-in sports field. "The ultra-Orthodox interpret this as a victory, and I'm afraid that a lot of Israelis agree."

The flap over the parade reflected a sharp divide in Israeli society.

The country's democracy encompasses an array of secular groups that defend gay interests and have begun a campaign for same-sex marriage. Tel Aviv has a vibrant gay scene. Like nearly every Israeli, gays and lesbians are drafted into the army and given an opportunity to advance up the ranks.

But ultra-Orthodox religious leaders, who consider homosexuality an abomination, wield enormous power. They and their 500,000 followers — about 7% of Israel's population — are especially numerous and influential in Jerusalem, a city sacred not only to Jews but to Christians and Muslims as well.

Ultra-Orthodox clerics lobbied to have the gay parade stopped for the first time since it was first held in 2001 and called for a death curse on the organizers.

They got support from the top Muslim cleric in the Palestinian territories, Jerusalem Grand Mufti Mohammed Hussein, who declared that being gay is a crime. The Vatican and Christian evangelical groups denounced the planned parade as an offense to religious sensibilities.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert weighed in, saying a gay parade would be a "provocative act," even though his lesbian daughter, Dana, of whom he is supportive, planned to take part.

Israel's Supreme Court turned down an appeal to block the march, and the attorney general ordered police officials to meet with organizers to agree on a route. But with ultra-Orthodox groups promising a large counter-demonstration, police feared a repeat of the bloodshed of last year, when three gay marchers were stabbed.

By midweek, Israel's other conflict had complicated the picture: Armed Palestinians were vowing to avenge Wednesday's killing of 18 civilians in Gaza by errant Israeli artillery shells.

Police officials said they could not mobilize the 9,000 officers needed to keep peace between gay marchers and their antagonists and still defend the country from terrorism.

Under a deal worked out by Jerusalem's police chief, the parade was canceled and Orthodox leaders agreed not to hold street demonstrations against the stadium rally.

"Today is a great victory for religious power," said Yehuda Levin, a New York-based ultra-Orthodox rabbi who came here to lobby. "The sodomites are back in the figurative closet. They are not free to provoke."

About 50 gay activists tried to march along the proposed route anyway but were blocked by police, who detained 20. Meanwhile, five young Orthodox men armed with brass knuckles, knives, clubs and a loaded pistol were arrested in a park near the stadium.

In the stadium, police detained a man who rushed the stage shouting antigay slurs.

The crowd at the event included a group of observant Jews from the Reform and Conservative streams of Judaism, who held signs calling for peaceful coexistence.

Hady-Cohen, the medical student, was there representing a small group of gay Orthodox Jews.

"Despite the caustic reactions, the religious community is finally talking about the subject and starting to realize it has homosexual and lesbian members," said Avigail Sperber, a 33-year-old filmmaker who leads an Orthodox Jewish lesbian group called Bat Kol, a term meaning God's female voice.

In a speech to the crowd, rally organizer Elena Canetti said she had rejected appeals to move the event to a more gay-friendly environment.

"Why not leave Jerusalem to the fanatics? Because I will not give up my right to live openly as a lesbian in my city," she said.

"If we flee to another city, to Tel Aviv, or Amsterdam, or San Francisco, we will find ourselves centimeter by centimeter giving way to bullies and violence."

U.N. Delivers Plan For Court In Hariri Case To Lebanon (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 10 — The United Nations delivered a draft document to the Lebanese government on Friday outlining the framework of an international tribunal to try suspects in the assassination of the country's former prime minister, Rafik Hariri.

The killing is being investigated by a United Nations commission. The chief prosecutor, Serge Brammertz, told the Security Council in September that he was developing evidence suitable for presentation to a court.

The investigation has already implicated senior Lebanese and Syrian security officials, though Syria has denied any role.

The draft arrived in Beirut at a moment of heightened political tension. The Syrian-supported Hezbollah militia is seeking more power in the government and is not eager to see the tribunal go forward.

Mr. Hariri was killed along with 22 others in a truck bombing in downtown Beirut on Feb. 14, 2005.

He had been known as a fierce opponent of Syrian domination of his country, and his killing provoked civic outrage and mass demonstrations that led Syria to comply with a Security Council resolution calling on it to withdraw its troops from Lebanon after a 29-year presence.

The Brammertz investigation has concluded that the Hariri killing was highly organized and planned by professionals with past experience in such activities.

The special court will have jurisdiction over suspects in the Hariri killing and in 14 other assassinations that the Brammertz commission has been investigating.

The final draft does not include an earlier mention of the possibility of trials on crimes against humanity. But among the crimes the tribunal can judge, the draft lists acts of terrorism, crimes and offenses against life and personal integrity, illicit associations and failure to report crimes or evidence of conspiracy.

The draft was approved this week by the five permanent members of the Security Council after procedural objections from Russia were met over how the judges and prosecutors were to be chosen.

The draft calls for the judges to be appointed by the secretary general in consultation with a selection panel and the Lebanese government, and most of them to be from outside Lebanon. The lead prosecutor will be international and the deputy will be Lebanese.

The final draft stakes out no clear position on whether top leaders will be liable to prosecution by the court or whether they can claim head-of-state immunity.

The court's location has also been left open. United Nations diplomats said they were looking for a site in the immediate region but outside of Lebanon, which does not want the court on its territory.

The personal representative of Secretary General Kofi Annan, Geir Pederson, gave copies on Friday to Fouad Siniora, the Lebanese prime minister, and other officials in Beirut. Mr. Siniora's office said the cabinet would take it up starting Nov. 20, after he returns from a trip abroad.

If Lebanon signs off on the draft, Mr. Annan will send a report to the Security Council with the agreed-upon language. The court does not need a vote or a resolution to come into being, only the consensus of the 15 Council members.

A Royal Emirati Whose Career Fuels Young Women's Dreams (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

Dubai, United Arab Emirates

FOR Sheika Lubna al-Qassimi, the most memorable moments typically happen in the shopping malls and public gatherings of this rapidly growing nation, not in the halls of power she navigates every day. They come when young Emirati women approach her to take their photograph with her, tell her their dreams or, best of all, ask her for career advice.

During those moments, she says, she realizes how much has changed for women here since she first started out in business, but she also sees how much farther they still have to go.

"I had to prove that stamina and delivering have nothing to do with gender," she told a group of young entrepreneurs recently. "We are the ones who usually discourage ourselves even before anyone else discourages us."

After decades of pushing the barriers in a region where women have traditionally been kept out of the public sphere, Sheika Lubna now towers as one of the country's most influential women. She is the first woman here to be a minister, but no less important, she is the minister of economy and planning, a particularly important position in a nation that is a major oil producer and relies so heavily on foreign investment, and where the economy continues to boom.

On any given day, she may be shuttling between world capitals to sign trade agreements, or between cities in the Emirates to garner support for her policies, or to lend support for a cause. She has pushed for the deregulation of cross-border trade while answering calls for greater oversight over the investment sector and stumping for foreign investment in her country.

But throughout, she has remained conscious of her role in chipping away at the restrictions women face in this region.

"Every day and night, I think about how the girls need to change," Sheika Lubna said emphatically. "Ultimately, I am out there for them."

THE United Arab Emirates have one of the fastest growing economies in the Middle East, and also have one of the most open societies in the Persian Gulf. Women are afforded many freedoms and are encouraged to work and take part in public life. But ultimately this is a traditional society for local women, where marriage and family are still central in a woman's life, where the law favors men in issues of family and where many women opt for reliable government jobs or simply choose to stay at home.

But with the outside world crashing into Emirati homes, and divorce rates on the rise, women must be better prepared to take care of themselves than their mothers' generation, Sheika Lubna and other women here argue.

As a woman who challenged all the societal rules in the 1970s, working her way up the ranks as a computer engineer, then a chief executive and a government minister, she has sought to prove to women here that they, too, must begin assuming a greater role in public life.

Her family is the ruling family of the emirate of Sharjah, the emirate neighboring Dubai; her uncle is the ruler. As royalty, she faced even more traditional demands than most. Moreover, she never really needed to work, and if she chose to, she could have opted for a low-key job in a ceremonial role or as a bureaucrat.

She chose the hard way, however. When other women were staying home in the late 1970s, Sheika Lubna left for California to study computer engineering, becoming one of the first Emirati women to travel abroad for study.

"She has always been a woman in a man's world, and maybe some of these things might not have looked right at the time," said Farouk El-Baz, director of the Center for Remote Sensing at Boston University, who is a confidant of the sheika and a close friend of the family. "She's a person who cannot take 'no' for an answer. She would think about any challenge thoroughly, then begin to tackle it."

When she returned in 1981, she took a job as a programmer for an Indian software firm called Datamation, working as the sole woman on a team of mostly Indian programmers — something virtually unheard of in the day. She parlayed that experience into a job at the Dubai Ports Authority, where she rose to being an information technology manager, developing a documentation system that helped reduce the time needed for paperwork from one hour per ship to 10 minutes.

That led to the creation of an online marketplace for supporting purchase orders for companies in Dubai's free-trade zones, and later led her to start a business-to-business auction site, Tejari, on the eve of the dot-com collapse. That company survived the rout, and today it does business throughout the Middle East.

BUT when she received the telephone call in late 2004 asking her if she was willing to be nominated as a minister, Sheika Lubna was surprisingly ambivalent, she said. She had been planning to enroll in a Ph.D. program at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the high-stress position would have delayed her studies, she said.

"When I got the call I thought, 'I don't want to do this. I want to go to M.I.T.,' " she said. "But the call for the country never goes away. It would be the first time a woman took a powerful position in cabinet. I was a change agent, but I would now become a role model."

This spring, when American senators and representatives got up in arms over the planned sale of some operations at major American ports to DP World, Sheika Lubna's former employer, she traveled to Washington without an entourage and became one of the most public faces of the United Arab Emirates.

As she set out to advocate for the Emirates, people at home, especially young women seeking to break out of the traditional mold, saw a different message: it was time to rise to the challenge.

"We were misunderstood because no one knew anything about us," Sheika Lubna said as she recounted the political firestorm that erupted over the ports deal. "But we have a responsibility to explain ourselves and who we want to be."

She won over many Americans with her folksy, girl-next-door charm, seeking to settle stereotypes and misconceptions about the Arab world and usher the United Arab Emirates onto the world stage.

When an American businesswoman asked her if women could work in the Emirates, she answered, matter-of-factly, "I was the C.E.O. of a company," and continued the conversation.

When another asked her if women could drive in her country, she noted that she had spent years commuting between her home in Sharjah and Dubai, but she admitted wryly that she was glad to now have a driver.

"Women always told me, 'you're a sheika; why are you doing all of this?' " she said with a degree of amazement. "But when you break out of the mold, you can break all the taboos. I had nothing to refer to, but I did have a blind belief that this is the right path."

Poland Sets Referendum On Euro, Further Clouding Stance On EU (WSJ)

By Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

WARSAW -- Poland plans to hold a referendum on whether to join the European Union's common currency, the euro, in 2010, adding to concerns over the commitment level of the EU's biggest new member.

Under terms of its EU membership, Poland is obliged to join in using the euro as soon as it meets certain inflation and deficit criteria. If Poles voted that they didn't want to implement the currency, the government would be under pressure to breach its treaty obligations with the EU.

That would follow a precedent set by Sweden, which has voted not to join the euro despite a legal obligation to do so. But Poland's plan is just the latest move by President Lech Kaczynski and his twin brother, Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski, to put Poland at loggerheads with the EU.

Finance Minister Zyta Gilowska told reporters Friday that she expected Poland to meet the euro entry criteria in 2009 and then to hold a referendum a year later. "Only death and taxes are certain," she said, adding that she expected that President Kaczynski, who has been skeptical of the EU, would campaign on the side of implementing the euro and that Poles would agree.

However, the decision to hold a referendum raises a question about Poland's membership intentions. The referendum would be held in the same year as Polish presidential elections, making the euro issue highly political.

Meanwhile, Poland also has said that it will veto negotiations on a new EU-Russia partnership on Monday if the deal doesn't include measures to open access to oil- and gas-pipeline networks, something Russia has said it won't accept. On Wednesday, Polish officials are expected to clash with the European Commission over the country's budget deficit. The commission is expected to declare Poland's deficit above EU limits, demanding action to bring it down. Poland's central-bank chief has called the government's deficit plans "irresponsible."

The International Monetary Fund has also said the budget-deficit projections should be lower, at a time when Poland is growing by more than 5%.

Ms. Gilowska defended the deficit level, saying she found it "difficult to understand" the commission's position. Poland has introduced radical pension overhauls that will push the deficit up to about 4% next year, above the EU's 3% limit. Ms. Gilowska said she expected the actual outcome to be 3.5%, within the cushion the commission has allowed for pension overhaul.

Cyprus Says Rival's Transit Ban Will Hurt EU Credibility (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The battle of wills over Turkey's European Union membership application heightened yesterday after the government of Cyprus warned that the bloc's credibility was at stake if it tolerates Ankara's ban on Greek Cypriot air and sea traffic.

Foreign Minister George Lillikas termed Ankara's refusal to open its harbors and airports to Greek Cypriot ships and planes a "provocation," which the EU should not tolerate.

Despite a stinging EU report on Turkey's progress on membership earlier this week, the Turkish government reaffirmed its policy of keeping Greek Cypriot traffic out unless the EU ends what Ankara describes as "the economic blockade" of the Turkish Cypriot northern part of the divided island.

The EU has given Turkey a month to liberalize trade links with all 10 countries that joined in 2004, including Cyprus. The latest report also criticized Turkey's penal code, corruption, human rights record and the interference by the military in politics.

"We want Turkey to become a member of the European family, but we don't want Turkey as it is today," Mr. Lillikas said.

Turkey feels that admitting Greek Cypriot ships and planes would be tantamount to recognition of a government that Turkey rejects as not representing all of Cyprus. The northern part of the island, the self-styled Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, is recognized only by Turkey.

Olli Rehn, the EU's expansion commissioner, warned that a one-month deadline given Turkey to change its policy "is likely to be the last opportunity to make real, serious progress for some years to come" on the Cyprus question, which emerged as a major obstacle in Turkey's EU hopes.

But to a number of Turkish officials and commentators, the deadline amounted to an ultimatum prior to the EU's planned summit in mid-December.

With Turkish polls showing a considerable drop in support for EU membership, some editorials wondered whether "Turkey should reject Europe before it is rejected by Europe." The government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has played down the degree of tension in the EU talks, but some officials admitted the precarious nature of the bargaining.

According to Egeman Bagis, a senior adviser to the prime minister, "We can be a prosperous, Western-looking democracy without the EU. Norway has done this, so why can't we?"

Mehmet Dulger, chairman of the parliament's Foreign Affairs Committee, said that if the EU talks collapse over Cyprus, "the West would lose a vital bridge with the Islamic world at a time when having this bridge is more important than ever."

There has been a considerable shift in popular attitudes in the EU toward Turkey, a Muslim nation of 70 million.

After the latest EU report, German Chancellor Angela Merkel, a skeptic on Turkish EU membership, said, "Turkey must meet its obligations by the end of the year. Otherwise the EU will have to draw the appropriate conclusions."

U.S. Criticizes U.N. Rights Council (AP)

By Justin Bergman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

The United States sharply criticized the new U.N. Human Rights Council on Friday, calling it a "disappointment" and saying it has failed to address serious violations in its first few months of operation — particularly in Sudan's Darfur region.

Sudan responded with a harsh condemnation of the U.S. human rights record and said Washington had no right to judge the effectiveness of the U.N. agency.

The barbs came during the Human Rights Council's first annual report to the General Assembly. The U.S. is not a member of the council, which was created earlier this year to replace the highly politicized and much-maligned U.N. Human Rights Commission.

Miriam Hughes, head of the economic and social development section of the U.S. mission to the U.N., criticized the council for a "slow and discouraging start," saying it has "accomplished little that will make a concrete and significant difference in the lives of millions around the world."

Hughes said the council has failed to reach agreement on how to address "egregious violations of human rights in places such as Sudan," where more than 200,000 people have been killed in fighting between the army and rebels in Darfur since early 2003.

Referring to the two special sessions the council has held to discuss alleged human rights violations by Israel, she said some nations view the council "as just another arena in which to play political games."

"Sadly, so far the Human Rights Council, into which was put so much hope and work, has been a disappointment," Hughes said.

The council, which began its work in June, held two special sessions this summer to discuss the Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip and the Israel-Hezbollah war in Lebanon. One of the United States' main criticisms of the former Human Rights Commission was that it spent a great deal of time criticizing Israel.

In his speech to the General Assembly, Sudanese diplomat Idrees Mohamed Ali Mohammed Saeed called the U.S. criticisms "amazing and ridiculous."

"Everybody knows the magnitude of the gross violations of human rights in the United States," said Saeed, the second secretary of the Sudanese mission. He cited as examples the treatment of prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center and detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

"We call upon the United States to address the human rights situation at home first and not to use and abuse the forums of human rights to settle political scores and achieve its objectives," he said.

Sudan is also not a member of the council.

Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. mission to the U.N., said later by telephone that the U.S. "didn't feel the need" to respond to Saeed's statement. "The government of Sudan's record speaks for itself," he said.

The United States has been one of the most vocal critics of the violence in Darfur, which has also left 2.5 million people homeless.

U.N. investigators and rights groups have blamed the worst atrocities on the janjaweed, a pro-government militia that is widely accused of killing villagers and destroying their homes. The government denies supporting the janjaweed.

The United States opposed the establishment of the Human Rights Council earlier this year, saying it did not go far enough to prevent rights abusers from winning seats, and decided against being a candidate for the body. Cuba, Saudi Arabia, China and Russia won seats despite their poor human rights records.

The European Union offered a more positive assessment of the council's work Friday. Speaking on behalf of the EU, Finnish Ambassador Kirsti Lintonen told the General Assembly the council had addressed many important issues since its inception, including the violence between Israel and the Palestinians and the worsening crisis in Darfur.

However, she said the EU "regrets" the council did not adopt substantial decisions on the conflicts and discuss them in a more balanced manner.

The council's report, which mainly deals with the forced disappearances of people and indigenous rights, was to be considered by a General Assembly committee.

Russia Reaches Trade Deal With U.S. (WP)

By Peter Finn, Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

MOSCOW, Nov. 10 -- Russia and the United States on Friday announced a landmark trade agreement, substantially advancing Moscow's pursuit of World Trade Organization membership and cementing the position of the former Communist giant in the global economy.

The deal, announced here by the Russian Economic Development and Trade Ministry, was a victory for President Vladimir Putin, who has chafed at Russia's exclusion from the WTO, a global body that shapes the terms of world trade. The Bush administration, which has been locked in sometimes bitter negotiations with Moscow over the accord, characterized it as a milestone in the evolution of Russia from erstwhile Cold War enemy to a growing trading partner.

"It is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system," declared U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab in a written statement.

Russia is the largest economy still outside the WTO. Its inclusion would be a major advance in the development of a global body devoted to seeking reduction of tariffs and promoting trade around the world. Earlier this week, Vietnam, a country still controlled by the Communist Party, gained the right to join the trading body.

The top trade negotiators for Russia and the United States are planning to sign their accord next week in Vietnam's capital, Hanoi -- a city still draped in homage to Ho Chi Minh -- during a meeting of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum. Presidents Bush and Putin are expected to toast the agreement when Bush stops off in Moscow Wednesday on his way to that meeting.

But the deal will not finalize Russia's decade-old quest for WTO membership. The Kremlin still must finish bilateral negotiations with three other countries, Costa Rica, Moldova and Georgia. The latter two have seen their wine and agricultural products banned here. Russian officials said the wine was unsafe, but the Georgians said the embargo was political retaliation for its courting of the West and its desire to join the NATO alliance.

Georgia, in particular, is likely to try to use Russia's desire for WTO membership as leverage in negotiations. Political tensions between Russia and its southern neighbor are high, and Georgia's small economy has been damaged by the bans as well as a transportation blockade. In addition, the state-controlled Russian energy giant Gazprom recently announced that it planned to more than double the price of natural gas for Georgia and cut off supplies if the Georgians don't pay.

Georgia had negotiated a trade deal with Russia in 2004 and is determined to return to the bargaining table. But officials in the capital, Tbilisi, said they would attempt to block Russian membership unless it lifts the various embargoes.

If Russia satisfies Georgia's objections and reaches agreements with Moldova and Costa Rica, it will still confront further multilateral negotiations within the WTO, giving all countries -- including United States -- another chance to extract trade concessions.

In Washington, now entering a new political era with Democrats taking charge of Congress, the Russia deal could present an early test of the new leadership's inclinations on trade. Some Democrats campaigned on opposition to liberalized trade, accusing Republicans of selling out American workers to corporate interests. Congress cannot block the Russian accord, but it must approve legislation granting Russia what is known as permanent normal trading relations before American companies can be certain of benefiting from Russia's WTO accession.

In a written statement, Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who is expected to chair the Finance Committee, praised the accord as a positive development but signaled skepticism about the details, particularly about Russia's willingness to allow American agricultural products and crack down on the rampant piracy of U.S.-made movies and software.

"Russia must take additional steps to earn a welcome into the WTO," Baucus said. "Russia maintains unacceptable levels of piracy and counterfeiting, and these must be addressed before Congress can endorse Russia's WTO membership."

But in gaining the blessing of the Bush administration, Russia's bid to join the WTO cleared what analysts said was by far the highest hurdle, making Moscow's eventual induction fairly certain.

"This is a big country, and there are big geopolitical interests in getting them in," said Jeffrey J. Schott, a trade expert at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington. "This is really solving some problems that we have had in our bilateral relationship."

The Russian-American trade negotiations have been politically charged while dragging on for years as the two sides tried to resolve differences over the import of American agricultural products, the piracy of U.S. intellectual property, and access to the Russian banking and insurance sectors for American companies.

The exact terms of the agreement were not immediately released by either side. But U.S officials said Moscow had agreed to open the Russian market to American beef, poultry, pork, corn, wheat and fruit while allowing U.S. banks and insurance companies to set up and expand. The American side had to agree to comply with certain Russian food safety standards, a significant sticking point. Russia also agreed to roll back tariffs on U.S.-made machinery.

For now, trade between the two countries remains relatively modest, with the United States last year exporting nearly $4 billion of goods to Russia, according to the Commerce Department, and Russia sending some $19 billion worth of wares to the United States. But the trade accord should lift curbs on U.S. investment in once-sensitive Russian sectors such as telecommunications and banking, said David Tarr, an economist at the World Bank. It should also spur Moscow to open more of its economy to competition, he added. Reformers within the government, now tangling with those armored against change, will have the force of international treaties working for them.

Russian frustration over the failure to reach agreement sooner had seeped into other areas. Analysts here linked the unresolved talks to the recent decision of Aeroflot, the state airline, not to purchase 22 Boeing airplanes and the exclusion of Western energy companies from the development of a giant natural gas field in the Barents Sea.

Russia Near Deal To Join The W.T.O. (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer, Edmund L. Andrews

MOSCOW, Nov. 10 — Officials in Washington and Moscow reached an agreement in principle for Russia to join the World Trade Organization, crossing the final big hurdle in the stop-and-go cycle that has marked the process since Moscow began its application shortly after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

The deal is expected to be signed next Saturday, when both President Bush and President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia will be in Hanoi for an Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting, negotiators from both countries said. The White House also announced this week that President Bush planned to stop in Moscow on Nov. 15 on his way to Vietnam.

"We have agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," the United States trade representative, Susan Schwab, said in a statement. "It is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system."

Mr. Putin has repeatedly said that joining the 149-member W.T.O. was a major foreign policy goal, though Russia's oil-driven economy will get few direct gains from membership in the organization, which sets the ground rules for globalization. But joining would give Russia a voice in world trade talks, with the potential to help set future trade policy.

"Russia today is the only major world economy outside the W.T.O. — the only one," Mr. Putin said at a news conference early in his presidency, in June 2002. "Staying outside this organization, outside this process is dangerous and stupid."

American officials say the countries gradually worked out nagging disputes on issues like agriculture inspections, chicken exports to Russia and intellectual property protection.

The Bush administration has other contentious issues with Russia, particularly its support for Iran and that country's nuclear program. There was no immediate sign of any broader deal involving those issues.

One American official said that Russian negotiators had been a "moving target" back in July, balking on issues that Washington thought had been resolved. But they said Russian officials had become more forthcoming in recent weeks.

"At the bitter end, the issues were quite trivial," said Gary C. Hufbauer, a trade policy expert at the Institute for International Economics in Washington, who has followed the negotiations.

Mr. Hufbauer suggested that Russian leaders might have decided to seal a deal out of worry that this week's elections would mean greater resistance by Democrats to an accord. "I think the Russians read the election returns and realized that if they don't go for it now, they might not get anything," he said.

Russia still must win approval from Moldova and Georgia, countries with deep grievances over a Russian ban on importing wine, ostensibly for health reasons. Those countries could further delay any final deal on W.T.O. membership, which is expected to take place next year. Russian officials have said they want to join in 2007.

Georgia first approved Russia's membership but rescinded it last month, after Russia blockaded its border. Maksim Medvedkov, Russia's chief negotiator, said Friday in remarks carried on state television that he would not negotiate with Moldova and Georgia separately but try to allay their objections during multilateral talks with the W.T.O. in Geneva.

The European Union, China and Japan have already signed off on Russian membership.

American officials said they reached agreement on longstanding disputes about American exports of poultry, beef and pork. Russia is the United States' biggest export market for chicken parts, but American producers have long complained about being hindered by Russian inspection procedures.

The agreement also calls for Russia to offer greater access for foreign services, from construction to overnight parcel delivery and telecommunications. Russian officials also agreed to allow banks and investment firms in Russia to be owned by foreign companies, meaning that foreign banks would not need to team up with Russian partners.

American trade negotiators accepted an unusual restriction on foreign players in the banking and insurance sectors, according to the trade representative office. It will limit foreign investment to no greater than 50 percent of total investments in these businesses. In Moscow, state television reported Friday that Russia was the only country in the W.T.O. to win this concession.

Russia also promised to step up enforcement of intellectual property rights, which had been carried out in spotty fashion.

Russian trade relations with the United States, while forming only a tiny share of both countries' total foreign trade, have gone through some dismal periods. In 2002, President Bush imposed tariffs on steel, a major Russian export commodity, and Mr. Putin retaliated by banning imports of chicken thighs, known as "Bush Legs" because the product first arrived in Russia as food aid under the president's father in the early 1990s.

In contrast to China, Russia's oil-dependent economy gains little from joining the W.T.O. "China is a consumer goods manufacturer and exporter and there was a huge benefit for China," said Peter Westin, chief economist at the MDM Bank. "There will be nothing like that for Russia."

Instead, Mr. Westin and other economists say, the primary benefit for Russia would come in exposing the domestic banking, telecommunications and other sectors to more direct foreign competition. This should increase productivity.

Ford Motor, which produces about 70,000 cars a year in Russia and exports another 50,000 cars to Russia, said it was delighted by the deal. Over the next seven years, Russian duties on foreign-made cars are set to decline to 15 percent, from 25 percent today.

"What all this adds up to," said Stephen E. Biegun, Ford's vice president for international governmental affairs, "is that we will be able to grow as fast as we possibly can in Russia."

Russia's WTO Bid Comes Closer To Fruition (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0093692

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

MOSCOW -- Russia and the U.S. say they will sign a landmark deal in the coming days paving the way for Russia to join the World Trade Organization -- a goal that Moscow has doggedly pursued for the past 12 years and that has been one of the key objectives of Vladimir Putin's presidency.

The breakthrough removes a major irritant in relations between Moscow and Washington that have been strained by disagreements over Iran and U.S. accusations that Russia is backsliding on democracy and human rights and using energy to bully its neighbors.

"We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said. She said the deal "will mark an important step in Russia attaining membership of the WTO."

Russian officials said delegations of both countries were trying to make sure the deal would be ready for signing when Mr. Putin and President Bush meet during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum summit in Hanoi, Vietnam during the week.

The U.S. is the only one of Russia's major trading partners that hasn't signed a bilateral trade deal with Moscow, provoking much frustration in the Kremlin. Russia had hoped to reach such an agreement in time for July's G-8 summit, which it hosted, and the failure to do so cast a pall over the meeting. Both countries set an informal deadline of the end of October, but a week of negotiations in Washington last month ended without progress.

Central to the deal was the resolution of a longstanding dispute over the safety of U.S. beef and pork exports. Russia insisted on inspecting all U.S. exporters' meat-production facilities before it agreed to lift restrictions on such imports. The results of the inspections, which took several months, were positive, according to a person close to the talks.

Meanwhile, the U.S. appears to have made concessions on access to Russia's financial-services market. It had initially demanded that Moscow allow foreign banks and insurance companies to open branches in Russia. According to U.S. trade officials, the final deal allows only insurance companies to open branches. But Russia agreed to allow the total share of foreign investment in the banking sector to rise to 50% from 25%, according to a person familiar with the talks.

Russia also agreed to improve protection and enforcement of intellectual-property rights -- a key issue for U.S. copyright groups that have long complained about rampant compact-disc and computer-software piracy in Russia.

WTO membership would mark a milestone for Russia, demonstrating to the world that it adheres to the rules of global trade, has eradicated the last vestiges of socialism and is fully integrated into the world economy.

But the country faces several more months of negotiations before it can join the WTO. Once the bilateral deal with the U.S. is signed, it must enter multilateral talks under WTO auspices in Geneva, which will set the final rules for its entry into the organization. Analysts say the U.S. has kicked some of the more contentious issues in its trade talks, such as protection of intellectual-property rights, to the multilateral forum, and negotiations there could drag on for months.

Russia also has to wrap up bilateral deals with Costa Rica, Georgia and Moldova, and some officials in the latter two countries have threatened to block Russia's WTO accession in retaliation for trade sanctions Moscow has imposed on them.

In practical terms, WTO membership may have little impact for Russian companies, since the country's main exports -- oil and gas -- are rarely subjected to protective tariffs. But it would safeguard some companies, such as steel producers, from arbitrary sanctions while allowing Western companies greater access to the potentially huge Russian market for agricultural goods, aircraft and finance.

Last month, executives from 13 major U.S. corporations, including Chevron Corp., Citigroup Inc. and Ford Motor Co., wrote to Messrs. Bush and Putin urging them to wrap up a WTO agreement, saying it was in the economic interests of both countries to reach a deal.

Andrew Somers, head of the American Chamber of Commerce in Russia, said the deal would give a huge boost to the U.S.-Russian economic relationship. "This will facilitate the conclusion of major industrial transactions between U.S. and Russian companies, including those in strategic sectors," Mr. Somers said.

Obstacles to Russia's WTO bid still remain. The U.S. Congress must decide whether to approve "permanent normal trade relations," or PNTR, with Russia before it can join the WTO. That would entail removing a Cold War-era trade restriction known as the Jackson-Vanik amendment that linked U.S. trade benefits to the emigration policies of communist countries.

Russia And US Reach Deal On WTO (FT)

By Neil Buckley, Alan Beattie, Eoin Callan

Financial Times, November 11, 2006

Russia and the US on Friday agreed in principle on the terms for Russian entry into the World Trade Organisation, giving a significant boost to Moscow's hopes of joining the 149-nation body after 13 years of talks.

The two countries are set to sign the deal in Hanoi on November 18 at the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation summit, following final consultations in coming days.

"Delegations from both sides have reached agreement on all the principal conditions of this agreement," the Russian economy ministry said in a statement. Susan Schwab, US Trade Representative, said agreement had been reached "in principle".

Russia, which has enjoyed an oil-fuelled economic recovery in the past eight years, is the last big market outside the aegis of the WTO. The US was the last big nation with which Moscow had still to conclude a bilateral entry deal.

Many US businesses, also enjoying rapid growth in Russia, have lobbied hard for a deal. Mr Putin made WTO membership a political priority early in his presidency.

Andrew Somers, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Moscow, said the agreement was a "major positive milestone in relations between our two countries".

Analysts had warned any deal could face difficulties winning approval in Congress, particularly after both houses came under Democratic control this week. Congress must repeal the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which subjects Russia's trading status to annual review, to ensure Russia is granted permanent normal trading relations by the US.

But a Bush administration official characterised meetings with Democratic leaders on Friday to brief them on the deal as "positive".

Senator Max Baucus, Democratic chair of the Senate Finance Committee, welcomed the accord, saying: "Russia's WTO membership on commercially meaningful terms is an important goal."

Russia must still reach a bilateral agreement with Costa Rica and confirm agreements with Moldova and Georgia – which could be complicated by its tense relations with Tbilisi – and complete multilateral talks. That could push the date for Russian entry well into next year.

Talks with the US had stalled over disagreements surrounding the liberalisation of financial services and Russia's commitment to combat counterfeiting and piracy. The two sides hoped to reach a deal at the Group of Eight summit in July, but disagreed over US demands to export beef and pork to Russia, setting an October target for agreement.

USTR officials cautioned that Russia had not yet cleared all hurdles to WTO entry, and they would continue to press the Russian authorities for stronger commitments during the multilateral stage of the accession process.

The US, with some tacit support from Europe and Japan, has insisted that Russia must not only pass laws respecting intellectual property rights, but also ensure they are enforced.

"Our goal is to work with Russia to get them through the multilateral phase by working on issues such as enforcement," a USTR spokesman said.

Sherman Katz, senior associate in the Carnegie Foundation think-tank in Washington, said that previous experience with China, criticised for continuing to allow counterfeiting of music and movies since joining the WTO in 2001, had made American companies and negotiators cautious.

"Both China and Russia were centrally-planned economies with no tradition of private ownership of much of anything, let alone an abstract like intellectual property," he said.

WTO protections on intellectual property could benefit not just the international music and entertainment industry but makers of goods such as prescription medicines and designer clothes – often faked in Russia.

Russia's economy, too, would receive a significant boost from membership, though analysts say the benefits would be less than those experienced by China, with Russian exports heavily dominated by oil and gas.

Russia Moves Closer To WTO Membership (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa, AP Economics Writer

AP, November 11, 2006

A longtime economic goal of Russia — entry into the World Trade Organization — moved a crucial step forward Friday as U.S. and Russian trade negotiators reached agreement.

It took 12 years of negotiations to get to this point, and details are still being nailed down. Both countries are hopeful that a bilateral pact can be signed next week in Hanoi, where President Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin will be attending the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting.

About four months ago, U.S. and Russia had appeared on the verge of an agreement, but it failed to materialize — right before the summit of leaders of the world's wealthiest countries in St. Petersburg, Russia. The collapse strained relations between Washington and Moscow.

Russia is the largest economy still outside the 149-nation WTO, which sets the rules for global trade. Putin's government sees membership as a way to show that his country has regained financial muscle since its economic crisis in 1998.

Even if a formal agreement is signed next week, there are other steps that still would have to be taken before Russia could become a member. Clearing those will take time — perhaps a year or two, some experts say. Others think it could be done sooner.

Membership in the WTO would mean Russia would receive the same favorable tariff rates for its products as other members. Other countries also would have to follow WTO rules in trade disputes with Russia. And, Russia — a big exporter of oil and gas — would have to abide by WTO's trade rules.

In theory, freer trade would give Russian companies more opportunities to sell their goods on world markets, while WTO membership for Russia might make its sizable market of potential customers even more attractive to companies in the U.S. and elsewhere, experts said.

"Businesses would feel more comfortable, more at ease doing business in Russia because there would be rules," said Oscar Gonzalez, economist at John Hancock Financial Services.

Terms of the U.S.-Russia agreement weren't released. But the two sides for years have been working to resolve differences over, among other things, piracy of U.S. goods and intellectual property rights, sales of American agricultural products to the country and U.S. access to the country's banking and insurance sectors.

"We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," said U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab. "It is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system," she said. Schwab said she and her counterpart, Russian Economics Minister German Gref, hope to sign the pact in Hanoi.

Some analysts have said that a deal on the WTO could persuade Moscow to soften its opposition to punishing Iran for refusing to halt sensitive uranium enrichment. The United States and its European allies want to impose sanctions on Iran, but Russia has resisted.

Bush will meet with Putin next week in Moscow. Russia's WTO bid and Iran's nuclear ambitions probably will be discussed, said the Kremlin's deputy spokesman, Dmitry Peskov.

If Russia does eventually win entry into the WTO it won't necessarily mean an end to trade tensions. China was admitted to the WTO in 2001, and the U.S. trade deficit with Beijing has mushroomed since then. The United States complains that China has been slow to honor its commitments to open its huge economy to more U.S.-made goods and to crack down on piracy. On the other hand, U.S. companies have flocked there to have their goods manufactured at a low cost.

"Russia's entry into the WTO would be one more step in the ongoing globalization of the U.S. economy, but I don't think it will mean as much to the United States as China's entry into the WTO did because Russia doesn't have the same vast cheap pool of labor that China does. I don't think we'll see massive direct investment in Russia," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

Congress would still have to pass legislation removing Russia from the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which ties Russia's trade status to whether the country is allowing Jews to freely leave the country. Congressional action is some ways off, experts said.

The newly elected Congress, which convenes in January, will be controlled by Democrats, who are less receptive to free-trade agreements than Republicans.

Associated Press writers Henry Meyer and Alex Nicholson contributed to this report from Moscow.

Russia To Sign Agreement With U.S. On Terms For WTO (BLOOM)

By Mark Drajem And Sebastian Alison

Bloomberg, November 11, 2006

Nov. 10 -- Russia and the U.S. will sign terms for the former Soviet state to join the World Trade Organization next week, clearing one of the last hurdles for an agreement that may add $10 billion a year to the Russian economy.

``We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said in a statement. Schwab and her Russian counterpart, German Gref, plan to sign the agreement when they meet in Asia next week.

Russia, the last major economy not be a member of the WTO, has sought for more than a decade to join the Geneva-based trade body, which sets international trade and investment rules. Membership stands to boost the Russian economy through increased trade and foreign investment.

The two countries resolved long-festering disputes over trade in meat and rules for financial investment, according to details sent out by the U.S. trade office. Lobbyists say they remain at odds over Russia's intellectual property protections, and will negotiate that in the next round of talks between Russia and all 149 WTO members.

Two other obstacles remain: Russia must overcome Georgia's opposition to its entry to the world trade arbiter, and the U.S. Congress must vote to grant Russia permanent, normal trade relations if the two countries are to enjoy all the benefits of the trade opening.

The U.S. had been the last WTO member to sign off on Russia's entry. Then, last month Georgia said it was withdrawing its support after Russia blockaded its borders.

All Must Agree

Every WTO member must agree before a new country can join the trade organization, so Georgia's opposition will still keep Russia out of the WTO. Even after negotiating the individual agreements, Russia must undertake general talks with the WTO members as a whole.

``Both parties have it as their goal to complete the process of Russia's accession to the WTO and intend to take more energetic efforts to that end," the Russian trade ministry said in a statement on its Web site.

With the Bush administration's approval, the debate will shift to Capitol Hill. U.S. lawmakers must vote on a measure to repeal a Cold War-era law that requires an annual review of Russia's trade status. If the Congress fails to approve that measure, the U.S. would have to petition the WTO to be exempt from the tariff cuts and other measures Russia has pledged.

Lawmakers have raised objections to Russia's WTO bid for a variety of reasons, including the country's weak intellectual property protections, its support of Iran's nuclear program and its pricing of natural gas exports.

Lower Tariff

Business groups expressed support for the agreement today.

Russia ``is simply too big to leave it outside" the WTO, said Frank Vargo, vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers. The agreement, which calls for Russia to lower its industrial tariff to an average of 8 percent, meets the major demands of the manufacturing group, he said.

Large banks, insurance companies and other service companies had been skeptical of the Russian talks, because the Putin administration had insisted on a cap in foreign investment. The announcement today got their support ``on balance," said Michael Ducker, chairman of the Coalition of Service Industries.

``We believe that this agreement in principle is much better than the positions that Russia started with on insurance branching," said David Snyder, vice president of the American Insurance Association. ``Years of difficult negotiations have produced much progress."

Area of Contention

Still, intellectual property rights are likely to remain an area of contention. Schwab had said that before it can join the WTO Russia must shut down allofmp3.com, which the U.S. says illegally sells copyrighted music around the world. That Web site remained in operation today.

Russia is also proceeding with a rewriting of its copyright and patent law, and that has drawn criticism from U.S. manufacturers, drug companies and recording companies. The U.S. trade office said those issues remain unsolved.

The agreement sets the stage for further progress with Russia on intellectual property rights issues through the next phase of international WTO negotiations, the trade office said.

``From here on, Russia's deeds -- rather than its words -- are the only thing that matters," said Mitch Bainwol, chairman of the Recording Industry Association of America.

U.S. Pact Paves Way For Russia In WTO (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, November 11, 2006

The United States and Russia have reached a deal that would pave the way for Russia to join the World Trade Organization, the two countries announced yesterday.

"We have an agreement in principle and are finalizing the details," U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab said.

She and Russian Economic Development and Trade Minister German Gref hope to sign the agreement during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit next week in Vietnam.

Russia, the last major economy not a member of the 149-member WTO, has tried for 10 years to join the Geneva trade organization, which sets international trade and investment rules. As a member, the Russian economy stands to grow by $10 billion annually through increased trade and foreign investment.

U.S. and Russian officials resolved issues over U.S. meat and poultry exports, and Russia agreed to cut tariffs on manufactured goods, the trade representative's office said. The cuts are expected to help U.S. sales of civil aircraft and parts, medical and scientific equipment, agriculture, power generation, construction equipment, information technology, and chemicals.

National Association of Manufacturers Vice President Frank Vargo called the announcement a "historic step."

"Russia is the only large economy not yet in the WTO, and it is simply too big to leave it outside," he said.

Russia agreed to help exports in the service industries, including companies in construction, finance and telecommunications services. Settling a long dispute, Russia said it would allow full foreign ownership of banks once Russia has joined the WTO, and will allow foreign insurance companies to operate through subsidiaries, although it may impose limits if foreign investment becomes too high.

The Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association praised the agreement, saying it would "further integrate Russia into the global economy."

"It will create new opportunities for securities firms and their customers, opening Russian markets to American firms and providing American expertise and capital to Russia's economy," association Co-Chief Executive Marc Lackritz said.

Russia also said it would take steps to better protect intellectual property rights, another major U.S. concern.

The agreement, Mrs. Schwab said, "is a clear indication of Russia's efforts to participate fully in and benefit from the rules-based global trading system."

But Russia still has a long way to go toward WTO membership.

Every member country must agree to Russia's membership, and Russia must reach trade deals with each member. It has yet to sign a trade agreement with Costa Rica, as well as with its former Soviet neighbors Moldova and Georgia, with whom relations are strained.

Georgian officials have signaled that they would seek to block Russia's membership after Russia imposed sweeping sanctions against Tbilisi in response to the arrest of several of its military personnel in a spying row.

Observers have suggested that progress over Russia's bid would be linked to concessions from Moscow over how to respond to Iran's disputed nuclear program.

Russia has resisted a push from Europe and the U.S. for sanctions against its trade partner, Iran. But analysts have said that a deal over the WTO could persuade Moscow to soften its opposition to punishing Tehran for its refusal to halt sensitive uranium enrichment.

In the U.S., Congress must grant Russia permanent normal trade relations status for U.S. companies to take advantage of the benefits of Russian WTO membership.

Lawmakers have raised objections to Russia's WTO bid for a variety of reasons, including the country's weak intellectual property protections, its support of Iran's nuclear program and its pricing of natural-gas exports.

Mr. Vargo noted the intellectual property measures in the agreement, saying, "A lesson we learned from China's WTO accession is that we have to see intellectual property enforcement come up to speed before -- not after -- we sign on the dotted line."

Still, intellectual property rights are likely to remain an area of contention. Mrs. Schwab has said that before it can join the WTO, Russia must shut down the Web site allofmp3.com, which the U.S. says illegally sells copyright music around the world. The Web site remained in operation yesterday.

Russia also is rewriting its copyright and patent law, and that has drawn criticism from U.S. manufacturers, drug companies and recording companies. The U.S. trade office said those issues remain unresolved.

The agreement sets the stage for further progress with Russia on intellectual property rights issues through the next phase of WTO negotiations, the trade office said.

Envoy: U.S. Eager For India Nuke Deal (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

A top U.S. official said Friday that Washington is eager to finalize a civilian nuclear pact with India, and urged it to work with neighboring Pakistan in the fight against terrorism when they resume peace talks next week.

The agreement to provide India with much-needed nuclear fuel is seen as a cornerstone of the emerging alliance between New Delhi and Washington after nearly a half-century of Cold War estrangement.

It has strong supporters in both U.S. political parties and was overwhelmingly endorsed by the House of Representatives in July.

The Senate, however, must still approve the deal, and Assistant Secretary of State for South Asia Richard Boucher said he was "very hopeful" the matter would be taken up by the outgoing Senate.

"We want to do it as fast as possible because it is important to the U.S.," he told reporters in New Delhi.

"We made a deal. We want to implement it as agreed as soon as we can," he said. "We are determined to do it. Whatever happens, we will make sure, it happens."

The pact is not expected to be affected by the Democrats' midterm election victory in which they took control of Congress. On Thursday, Democratic leaders in the Senate, including Sen. Joseph Biden, the top Democrat on the Senate foreign relations panel, said they were ready to move ahead with the India bill.

The deal reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy by shipping civilian nuclear technology to India in return for safeguards and inspections at certain nuclear plants. Critics say the deal would ruin global nonproliferation efforts.

Congress must approve the agreement because India has not signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which current U.S. law requires for such nuclear cooperation.

Even if Congress should complete its work, several other steps remain before the plan can be implemented, including approval of the Indian exemption by the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an assembly of nations that export nuclear material.

Boucher, who is on a swing through South Asia and visited Pakistan before heading to India, also said New Delhi and Islamabad must work together against terrorism as they reopen peace talks that were stalled by July's train bombings in Mumbai, which killed 207 people.

The two-day talks begin Tuesday in New Delhi, and Boucher said "we hope they can make progress on some of the big political issues that stand between India and Pakistan."

"I am confident that both sides are getting together to try to achieve progress on issues, to try to work together against terrorism," he said.

The nuclear rivals have fought three wars since the bloody partition of the subcontinent after independence from Britain in 1947.

They began a peace process in 2004, and have since taken several fitful steps to improve relations.

But the process broke down after the Mumbai bombings, which India says were carried out by Pakistani militant groups with links to that country's intelligence service — an allegation Islamabad denies.

However, Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed to resume talks when they met in Havana, Cuba, on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement Summit in September.

Trade Pacific Rim Initiative Gains A U.S. Push (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2006

On the surface, the coming summit of Asian-Pacific leaders in Vietnam is all about North Korea and its nuclear weapons. Kim Jong Il won't be there. But President Bush will be in Hanoi, as will the leaders of the other nations involved in trying to find a way to curtail Mr. Kim's nuclear-weapons program: Japan, China, South Korea and Russia.

But while North Korea will be in the spotlight, some substantive negotiating may be taking place on the sidelines to break another international impasse: how to revive global free-trade talks.

Discussions on how to further free global trade, initiated in Doha, Qatar, in 2001 under the umbrella of the World Trade Organization, collapsed this past summer. The U.S., European Union and various developing countries blame one another for the deadlock, which largely centered on how to eliminate subsidies for agricultural products.

Now, the U.S. is hoping to use the Hanoi gathering of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum on Nov. 17-19 to kick-start discussions on a long-term goal of creating a Pacific-wide free-trade area. Twenty-one nations are to attend the summit. Some, like Japan, have already indicated their cautious approval of the U.S. initiative, which was first proposed a couple of years ago by Chile.

That initial foray foundered. There wasn't enough appetite for a separate free-trade agreement focused on Pacific Rim countries at that time. And the WTO was supposed to be leading the movement toward liberalizing trade.

Since the derailment of the Doha talks, some major trading nations have been seeking an alternative forum to put free trade back on the table. And while major economies such as those of the EU, Brazil and India won't be present at the APEC summit, plenty of other heavy hitters, such as Australia, Japan, China and Russia, will be there. That makes it a useful venue to try to renew momentum for liberalizing trade and call for a resumption of the Doha round. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has already traveled to Vietnam to meet with other Pacific Rim finance ministers and put free trade firmly back in play.

Still, that doesn't mean the U.S. road map for a Pacific Rim bloc will be adopted wholesale in Hanoi. The Asian countries have plans of their own, and they don't necessarily include the U.S.

Earlier this year, Japan proposed a 16-nation free-trade group in East Asia comprising Southeast Asia, China, Japan, South Korea, India, Australia and New Zealand. China, meanwhile, has signaled it hopes to create a free-trade group of its own with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, led by Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand and the Philippines.

In December, Asian leaders are to meet in the Philippines to try to further their own plans on this front. Trade officials in Asia say they believe the U.S. is afraid of being left behind.

US Looking For Compromise On UN Force For Darfur (AFP-Y)

AFP, November 10, 2006

The United States said it was considering compromises on the make-up of an international peacekeeping force for Darfur after Sudan rejected demands for deployment of UN troops to halt one of Africa's worst humanitarian disasters in decades.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Washington still wanted United Nations "involvement" in the Darfur force, but he did not reiterate past US insistence the peacekeepers be deployed formally under the world body's banner.

"We're taking a look at how we can address the various concerns that have come up from the Sudanese government, as well as others in the region, about the nature of this international force," McCormack said.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution in August demanding the deployment of some 20,000 UN troops to Darfur to replace an under-funded African Union (AU) force which has failed to halt the violence.

At least 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million others displaced since a rebellion by Darfur's mainly black African population against the Arab-led Khartoum government erupted in early 2003.

Much of the violence has been blamed on a government-funded Arab militia, known as the Janjaweed.

Sudan President Omar al-Beshir has defiantly rejected the UN resolution, fearing the UN deployment could lead to a partition of his country or arrest government officials on charges of crimes against humanity.

Beshir refused to meet last month with US President George W. Bush's personal envoy, Andrew Natsios, out of anger over a decision to extend long-standing US sanctions against Sudan linked to its human rights record and alleged ties to terrorism.

Natsios first signalled a shift in US policy late last month when he said in an interview that the international force for Darfur did not have to be a "blue-helmeted" UN operation as long as it was big enough and robust enough to halt the violence.

"If it does not have a United Nations helmet, but it is very competent and very aggressive, then we have fulfilled our intention," Natsios said, suggesting the force could be made up of Africa and Arab troops backed by UN or NATO logistical support.

McCormack was more insistent on a UN role in the operation.

"This is not in any way to compromise on the need for this force and the need for an effective international force that would have UN involvement as central to it, as well as AU involvement as central to it," he said Thursday.

Discussions on the potential make-up of the force were continuing at the United Nations and bilaterally with countries in the region, notably Arab states, he said.

By Helene Cooper

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9 — During the cold war, the State Department called on the Harlem Globetrotters to travel as good-will ambassadors to counter hostile images of America around the world. During the Cuban missile crisis, the New York City Ballet was sent to perform in Moscow, where it was received enthusiastically.

And during these troubled times? America's newest good-will ambassador is Michelle Kwan, the figure skater, who, in the words of her new boss, Karen P. Hughes, the under secretary of state for public diplomacy, "combines the power of sports diplomacy with the personal appeal of a unique American story."

On Thursday, flanked by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Ms. Hughes, Ms. Kwan, 26, addressed reporters, giving the group a taste of what she would be telling the youth of the world.

She said she planned to share with young people, among other ideas, "In the reality of life, it's not always smooth sailing, and sometimes you have to pick yourself up and keep on going."

While many of the public diplomacy efforts by the United States in the past few years have been directed toward the Muslim world, it was unclear on Thursday whether Ms. Kwan would be sent to Iraq or Afghanistan. Ms. Kwan, who is of Chinese descent, said her first trip would likely be early next year, to Beijing.

"I've always wanted to somehow serve our country and to contribute and to make a difference," she said.

Afterward, reporters crowded around her with questions. "You said you'd like to share some of the values America represents with the world. What are those values?" one asked.

Ms. Kwan talked about the importance of setting goals and taking life as it comes. She also mentioned that she wanted to empower women. She said the idea of her becoming the United States public diplomacy envoy — her new title — came up in April when she met Ms. Rice at a dinner in Washington for President Hu Jintao of China. When Ms. Kwan mentioned that she would be attending the University of Denver, Ms. Rice, a Denver alumna and former competitive figure skater herself, "just lit up," Ms. Kwan said.

One reporter asked Ms. Kwan how she planned to deal with the hostility that she might meet as the public face of America. Ms. Kwan quickly showed that she was already familiar with the advice, contained in a memorandum from Ms. Hughes, recently published in The Washington Post, that advised State Department employees to hew to government policy while talking to the news media.

"I'm not here to talk about my political views," Ms. Kwan demurred. "I'm here to promote America. This is a place where anything is possible."

Greenhouse Guessing (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

It seems impossible to have an honest conversation about global warming. I say this after diligently perusing the British government's huge report released last week by Sir Nicholas Stern, former chief economist of the World Bank and now a high-ranking civil servant. The report is a masterpiece of misleading public relations.

It foresees dire consequences if global warming isn't curbed: a worldwide depression (with a drop in output of as much as 20 percent) and flooding of many coastal cities. Meanwhile, the costs of minimizing these awful outcomes are small: only 1 percent of world economic output in 2050.

No one could fail to conclude that we should conquer global warming instantly, if not sooner. Who could disagree? Well, me. Stern's headlined conclusions are intellectual fictions. They're essentially fabrications to justify an aggressive anti-global-warming agenda. The danger of that is we'd end up with the worst of both worlds: a program that harms the economy without doing much to cut greenhouse gases.

Let me throw some messy realities onto Stern's tidy picture. In the debate over global warming, there's a big gap between public rhetoric (which verges on hysteria) and public behavior (which indicates indifference). People say they're worried but don't act that way. Greenhouse emissions continue to rise despite many earnest pledges to control them. Just last week the United Nations reported that of the 41 countries it monitors (not including most developing nations), 34 had increased greenhouse emissions from 2000 to 2004. These include most of the countries committed to reducing emissions under the Kyoto Protocol.

Why is this? Here are three reasons.

First: With today's technologies, we don't know how to cut greenhouse gases in politically and economically acceptable ways. The world's 1,700 or so coal-fired power plants -- big emitters of carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas -- are a cheap source of electricity. The wholesale cost is 4 to 5 cents a kilowatt hour, says the World Resources Institute. By contrast, solar power costs five to six times that. Although wind is roughly competitive, it can be used only in selective spots and supplies less than 1 percent of global electricity. Nuclear energy is cost-competitive but is stymied by other concerns (safety, proliferation hazards, spent fuel).

Second: In rich democracies, policies that might curb greenhouse gases require politicians and the public to act in exceptionally "enlightened" (read: "unrealistic") ways. They have to accept "pain" now for benefits that won't materialize for decades, probably after they're dead. For example, we could adopt a steep gasoline tax and much tougher fuel economy standards for vehicles. In time, that might limit emissions (personally, I favor this on national security grounds). Absent some crisis, politicians usually won't impose -- and the public won't accept -- burdens without corresponding benefits.

Third: Even if rich countries cut emissions, it won't make much difference unless poor countries do likewise -- and so far, they've refused because that might jeopardize their economic growth and poverty-reduction efforts. Poorer countries are the fastest growing source of greenhouse gas emissions, because rapid economic growth requires energy, and present forms of energy produce gases. In 2003 China's carbon dioxide emissions were 78 percent of the U.S. level. Developing countries, in total, accounted for 37 percent of greenhouse gas emissions in 2003. By 2050 their share could be 55 percent, projects the International Energy Agency (IEA).

The notion that there's only a modest tension between suppressing greenhouse gases and sustaining economic growth is highly dubious. Stern arrives at his trivial costs -- that mere 1 percent of world gross domestic product in 2050 -- by essentially assuming them. His estimates presume that, with proper policies, technological improvements will automatically reconcile declining emissions with adequate economic growth. This is a heroic leap. To check warming, Stern wants annual emissions 25 percent below current levels by 2050. The IEA projects that economic growth by 2050 would more than double emissions. At present we can't bridge that gap.

The other great distortion in Stern's report involves global warming's effects. No one knows what these might be, because we don't know how much warming might occur, when, where or how easily people might adapt. Stern's horrific specter distills many of the most terrifying guesses, including some imagined for the 22nd century, and implies that they're imminent. The idea is to scare people while reassuring them that policies to avert calamity, if started now, would be fairly easy and inexpensive.

We need more candor. Unless we develop cost-effective technologies that break the link between carbon dioxide emissions and energy use, we can't do much. Anyone serious about global warming must focus on technological progress -- and not just assume it. Otherwise, our practical choices are all bad: costly mandates and controls that harm the economy, or costly mandates and controls that barely affect greenhouse gases. Or, possibly, both.

Kosovo: Final Report On Future Delayed (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

Martti Ahtisaari, the former Finnish president who leads international talks on the future of Kosovo, said he would hold back his recommendations — with independence or autonomy as options — until after parliamentary elections in Serbia, called earlier in the day for Jan. 21. Although technically a part of Serbia, the mainly Albanian province of Kosovo has been run by the United Nations since 1999, and a final status plan for Kosovo was to have been accomplished by the end of this year. But Western diplomats have been concerned that it might increase support for Serbian ultra-nationalists in the elections. A new Constitution passed last month reasserts the country's sovereignty over Kosovo. Kosovo's ethnic Albanian leaders are also uneasy. On Thursday, Agim Ceku, the Kosovo prime minister, said his government might unilaterally declare independence if negotiations fail to give them statehood.

Here Comes Kosovo (WP)

A decision to make the Serb province independent is near. Will Serbia and Russia obstruct it?

THE SERBIAN parliament formally adopted a new national constitution on Wednesday, following its narrow approval by voters in a referendum last month. The document was a necessary replacement of the previous charter, which was adopted during the rule of nationalist warlord Slobodan Milosevic. But it may have won acceptance only because it included a preamble that would have warmed Mr. Milosevic's heart: a declaration that the province of Kosovo, which Serbia in effect lost seven years ago, is an "integral" and "inalienable" part of the country.

In fact, the United Nations, which has governed Kosovo since NATO freed it from Mr. Milosevic's brutal ethnic cleansing campaign, is due to decide the province's future by year-end -- though a decision may be delayed until after a Serbian election scheduled for late January. Serb leaders know what a U.N. mediator will recommend and what all Western governments will support: independence for the territory, perhaps with transitional conditions. Kosovo is populated overwhelmingly by ethnic Albanians; after the ethnic war Mr. Milosevic initiated, there is no chance the province can be returned to Serbian sovereignty. By incorporating a claim to Kosovo into a new constitution, Serbia's leaders staked out yet another of the reckless nationalist stands that have caused their country so much damage in the past 15 years.

They also set the stage for some difficult and potentially dangerous diplomacy between the Bush administration and Russia over the next two months -- negotiations that could settle or destabilize the Balkans and the equally volatile Caucasus region on Russia's southern border. Russia, Serbia's long-standing ally, is the largest potential obstacle to consensus in the U.N. Security Council on a Kosovo solution. Though he knows that independence for Kosovo is inevitable, Russian President Vladimir Putin is hinting that he may support Serbia's obstructionism. He may hope to extract favors from President Bush in exchange for his eventual cooperation -- such as U.S. acquiescence to Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization.

Or Mr. Putin may try to use Kosovo to trigger a showdown with his Caucasus neighbor, Georgia, which has infuriated him by embracing liberal democracy and seeking integration into Western institutions such as NATO. Mr. Putin has said that Kosovo's independence could be a precedent for Moscow-sponsored breakaway regions in Eurasia, including two rebel provinces of Georgia. If Western governments recognize Kosovo's independence, Mr. Putin could respond by recognizing Abkhazia and South Ossetia. This could easily trigger a war that would draw in Russian troops; meanwhile, Moscow's position could encourage Serbs in Kosovo and Bosnia to set up splinter states.

Moscow is no doubt hoping that as the Bush administration contemplates this scenario, as well as its continuing need for Russian help in stopping Iran's nuclear program, it will be bluffed into postponing any decision on Kosovo or will abandon its support of Georgia's democracy and NATO aspirations. Either would be a serious mistake. Putting off Kosovo's independence would only enrage the province's 2 million Albanians and trigger the Balkan meltdown that the West hopes to avoid. It would also encourage Mr. Putin's growing tendency to use threats -- whether of energy-supply interruptions or violence -- to get his way with the West.

Northern Ireland Deal Advances (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Nov. 10 — Britain and Ireland on Friday seized on guarded words of support from Northern Ireland's feuding Protestant and Roman Catholic political parties, saying that enough progress had been made by the first deadline they had set in a timetable for restoring local rule for the province that they could proceed to try to meet the next one.

But a dispute about policing is casting doubt on whether the Democratic Unionist Party, led by the Rev. Ian Paisley, the veteran Protestant leader, and the main Roman Catholic party, Sinn Fein, can reach agreement by Nov. 24, when they are to nominate leaders for the power-sharing government.

A government executive branch that included Northern Ireland unionist leaders and Sinn Fein collapsed in 2002.

The unionists seek to maintain the political tie with Britain; Sinn Fein is considered the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, which has sought to separate the province from Britain.

In a joint statement, the British and Irish governments said that they were satisfied that party statements had indicated support for a government. Last month in St. Andrews, Scotland, the governments proposed a sequence of deadlines, starting Friday, for the Democratic Unionists and Sinn Fein to agree to share power in an executive apparatus that would take over most governmental powers starting next March.

As for the critical issue of policing, they proposed that London would cede full powers to the local executive branch in 2008.

In their joint statement on Friday, the British and Irish governments said that the St. Andrews Agreement remained the basis of reaching their goal, and that preparatory legislation would be worked on before Nov. 24. The foundations of an agreement, the governments said, are "support for power-sharing and the political institutions and support for policing and the rule of law."

Police Issue Stalls N. Ireland Deal (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

Deadline looms on power-sharing plan as differences remain.

LONDON — The first key deadline for implementing a new power-sharing plan in Northern Ireland passed Friday with the parties still at loggerheads, but Britain and Ireland said they were satisfied that the pact "represents the basis for a political settlement" of the long-running conflict.

Both Sinn Fein and the Democratic Unionist Party, or DUP, were to have signaled their acceptance this week of the proposal brokered last month at St. Andrews, Scotland, by the British and Irish prime ministers, under which the two former adversaries would jointly head a new Belfast government.

Instead, both sides only signaled conditional acceptance, apparently stuck on the same issue that has forestalled an agreement from the beginning: the unionist party's insistence that Sinn Fein endorse the local police force — with which its military wing, the Irish Republican Army, was virtually at war for years — before joining the government.

Sinn Fein leaders believe the police force, as it was formerly constituted, was involved in the killings of Roman Catholic residents, either directly or through Protestant paramilitary forces.

The party, which for years has sought union with Ireland, has said it is prepared to accept the police force once it is assured that concrete reforms are in place, a timeframe is established for handing over control of the police to local authorities, and after the party's membership has agreed to take such a step.

The logjam has raised serious questions about whether the two parties will be able to appoint joint heads of government by a Nov. 24 deadline. The British government has said that failure to meet that deadline would result in the shutdown of the National Assembly, now meeting on an ad hoc basis, and in reimposition of British direct rule.

Sources at the DUP, which favors union with Britain, hinted of a strong possibility there would be "slippage" on the deadline.

"Before anything of the nature the government are talking about on Nov. 24 can be done … all those commitments need to be made. We are completely unequivocal on that," said a party source, speaking on condition of anonymity.

But Sinn Fein's chief negotiator, Martin McGuinness, who would be the party's top minister in any new government, said it was crucial that the deadline be met. "I firmly believe that all of the challenges we face can be overcome. On Nov. 24, the Assembly must meet as set out at St. Andrews for the nominations of the first and deputy first minister as joint and co-equal partners in a new power-sharing government," he said in Belfast.

Sinn Fein conditionally accepted the St. Andrews agreement Monday, saying it has the potential to implement the historic "Good Friday" accord reached in 1998 and restore the region's political institutions.

Speaking Thursday night in New York after the U.S. government lifted a ban on Sinn Fein leaders addressing fundraising events, party leader Gerry Adams affirmed his commitment to moving forward. "The time to end this game is now," he said. But he said he would continue to insist on police reforms and local control.

DUP leader Ian Paisley has refused to meet Adams and says he will not form a government with a party that does not uphold basic principles of law and order.

"The foundation stone of any democratic party is that they support the police, the courts, and the rule of law," he said. "Sinn Fein must stand foursquare behind the police service and the justice system."

U.S. Official Offers A Bleak Assessment Of Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 11, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 10 — A senior American military official on Friday painted a dire picture of the escalating tensions in Somalia, but said the United States was at a loss about what to do.

"We do not have a plan to solve the Somalia problem," acknowledged the official, who spoke to reporters in Nairobi only on condition of anonymity. Somalia, once again, is at a crisis point, with rising prospects of a major war between the weak, so-called transitional government and the increasingly powerful Islamic forces that rule Mogadishu, the capital.

Since 1991, Somalia has been synonymous with anarchy, but the senior military official said the current situation was even more explosive because it threatened to drag in Somalia's neighbors.

"If there is a war," the official said, "the fighting ends up protracted and long and spills across the border."

A long-simmering problem is that all of Somalia's neighbors — Kenya, Ethiopia and Djibouti — have significant populations of ethnic Somalis. Some of the Islamic clerics in Mogadishu have vowed to invade these countries to establish a "Greater Somalia."

Another concern is that Ethiopia and Eritrea, bitter enemies that recently fought over a stretch of desert in a war that cost 100,000 lives, are meddling in Somalia, with Eritrea suspected of sending advisers and weapons to Mogadishu to support the Islamists and Ethiopian officials now admitting, after initial denials, that hundreds of Ethiopian military advisers are in Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government. Western experts estimate that the number is actually much higher, maybe as many as 10,000 Ethiopian soldiers, and growing.

Ethiopia is one of the closest allies of the United States in Africa, but the senior military official denied that the American government was using the Ethiopian Army as a proxy force against the Islamists, whom American intelligence agents have accused of cooperating with terrorists from Al Qaeda.

"We don't want them in there," the official said, referring to the Ethiopians.

On Friday, [a news organization] reported that a soon-to-be-released United Nations report accused several Arab countries, including Libya and Syria, of also breaking the 14-year-old arms embargo on Somalia and funneling guns and money to the Islamist forces.

"Things have been increasingly volatile in the past two weeks," the official said, though he did not go as far as saying war was imminent or inevitable. The official and diplomats here in Nairobi have pointed to talks this week between the speaker of the transitional Parliament and top Islamic clerics as a speck of hope.

Sharif Hassan Sheik Aden, the speaker of the transitional Parliament and one of the few politicians from Baidoa respected by the Islamists, spent several days in Mogadishu trying to coax Islamic leaders back to peace negotiations that started in June, though the latest round was broken off because the Islamists refused to negotiate while Ethiopian troops were in the country.

The Islamists, whose support seems to be growing in Mogadishu, were mildly optimistic about Sheik Aden's visit.

"We expect to reach a solution because it is a known fact that if Somalis talk to one another they can make peace," Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, leader of Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts, told The Associated Press this week.

But, Sheik Aweys added, the Ethiopians must first leave.

The United States has 1,800 troops stationed in Djibouti, at the mouth of the Red Sea. Their mission is to prevent terrorists from turning the Horn of Africa into a sanctuary. But the senior American military official said that if Somalia's peace talks failed and full-scale war engulfed the region, American troops would not get involved.

"We'll be watching this one," he said.

Aid Group Quits Darfur, Citing Disruptions (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 11, 2006

OSLO Nov. 10 -- A Norwegian refugee group said Friday that it was closing its humanitarian operations for nearly 300,000 people in Darfur because it was impossible to work in the troubled region of western Sudan.

The Norwegian Refugee Council cited "frequent disruption" of its work, saying it had been suspended five times for a total of 210 days since it started operations in mid-2004.

"We cannot work when the authorities suspend us continuously and do not respond to our repeated requests for dialogue aimed at addressing and resolving underlying reasons for this action," said Tomas C. Archer, the group's secretary general.

More than 3 1/2 years ago, ethnic African rebels accusing the central government of neglect launched a rebellion. The government is accused of responding by unleashing an Arab militia, called the Janjaweed, which has been linked to atrocities. As many as 450,000 people have died from disease and violence and 2.5 million have been displaced since fighting began.

Aid agencies have repeatedly complained about government interference in their work in Sudan. For months after the conflict broke out, Sudanese officials severely limited international aid organizations' access to Darfur. Humanitarian workers were allowed in only after protracted negotiations and international pressure.

Last year, Sudan briefly detained two officials of Doctors Without Borders, after the Dutch branch of the international medical aid group released a report that quoted hundreds of rape victims in Darfur identifying their attackers as soldiers or government-allied militiamen.

Rebels also have been accused of interfering with aid, in some cases by kidnapping aid workers.

The Norwegian group said it was pulling out 12 international and 170 local staff members running one camp for 128,000 people in southern Darfur and another for 100,000 people.

"We coordinated all aid, the fair distribution of food, medical care. Now there are 300,000 people on their own. That's what concerns us most," a spokeswoman, Astrid Sehl, said by telephone. She said the group also had to shut down an educational program for about 19,000 children and stop distributing food to about 52,000 people outside the camps.

"This decision has been the most difficult I have had to make as secretary general of NRC," Archer said. "We are all aware that the humanitarian needs are greater than ever in south Darfur."

A news release said that the Oslo-based group had been promised an answer from Sudanese authorities on the future of its humanitarian effort in Darfur but that no answer had been given.

The Norwegian Refugee Council is a private, independent foundation without religious or political affiliations. It was founded in 1946 to assist refugees after World War II and now has about 1,300 staff members in 20 countries.

Next In Darfur (WP)

LAST WEEK President Bush put a brave face on the killing in Darfur, declaring that the United States was working on a plan to save the victims. The truth is that his administration has offered versions of this claim since 2004, when it first described Darfur's crisis as genocide. Sudan's murderous government, which has provided air cover to the Janjaweed death squads and has magnified civilian suffering by keeping U.N. peacekeepers away, has proved impervious to U.S. pressure. Feeling itself to be an isolated Arab elite in a resentful African country, presiding over a capital city that has absorbed 4 million or more Africans who have fled Sudan's internal wars, the ruling clique in some ways resembles the minority white regime of South Africa circa 1985. Its back is against the wall, and it is prepared to be ruthless -- particularly so long as China, Russia and the Arab states provide diplomatic cover.

Andrew S. Natsios, the president's special envoy to Sudan, visited the country recently and was treated to a characteristic prevarication. He was told that Sudan refused to accept the U.N. Security Council resolution calling for a peacekeeping force in Darfur, even though the professed ground for this refusal -- that U.N. peacekeepers would compromise Sudan's sovereignty -- is belied by the fact that U.N. peacekeepers are already in Sudan to monitor a north-south peace treaty. But Mr. Natsios was encouraged not to lose patience. On the contrary, he was warmly entreated to have hope: Sudan might be open to certain other peacekeeping configurations. The existing African Union force could be supplemented with Arabs, or maybe with Pakistanis, or possibly even with Norwegians. The message to the United States was: Go away and do your diplomatic thing, and if you're lucky we'll talk after that.

The Bush administration should certainly assemble commitments of peacekeeping troops and call Sudan's bluff. But it should also attempt to revive the failed Darfur peace plan negotiated this year, for without peace even a large peacekeeping mission may be doomed. Reviving the peace process means pressuring both the government and the rebels: The last agreement failed because many of rebels refused to sign on and instead resumed fighting, while the government took that as an excuse to bar U.N. peacekeepers, harass western humanitarian workers and launch a military offensive. To pressure the rebels, the United States needs to work through their backers in Eritrea and Chad. To push the government back to the talks, the United States needs to work with Sudan's diplomatic enablers in Beijing, Moscow and the Arab capitals.

The world's leaders may hope that the problem of Darfur will go away if they close their eyes long enough. But the reverse is likelier. Darfur's violence is spilling into Chad and could precipitate the collapse of that country's government. It is also contributing to the risk of renewed north-south fighting. If there is no solution in Darfur, the world will witness Darfur-like atrocities elsewhere on a scale appalling to imagine.

Nigeria's Savior, And Menace (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 11, 2006

OLUSEGUN OBASANJO has done more for Nigeria than any leader in its modern history. Now that legacy is endangered — by none other than Obasanjo himself. Nigerians and the international community should keep the pressure on Obasanjo to step aside.

Nigeria, Africa's most populous nation and the United States' fifth-biggest source of imported oil, was a basket case until Obasanjo was elected in 1999. Since then, he has reformed the nation's chaotic banking sector, battled its endemic corruption and built a foundation for democracy in a nation that has never seen a peaceful transition from one elected leader to another.

But he also is nearing the end of his second and final term as president, and he has shown a worrying reluctance to step down as planned in April 2007. Five months ago, he tried to rewrite Nigeria's constitution to allow for a third term but was rebuffed by parliament. Other recent actions look suspiciously like the machinations of a budding dictator, and they may not only undo most of the good Obasanjo has accomplished but perhaps plunge his country into civil war.

At the core of the troubles is Nigeria's crusading Economic and Financial Crimes Commission, a 3-year-old agency that already has sent about 2,000 people to prison on corruption charges. (According to the commission's chief, Nuhu Ribadu, an estimated $380 billion has been stolen or wasted in Nigeria since independence in 1960.) Yet as the commission has started taking on the country's 36 state governors, many fear that Obasanjo is using it to target his political opponents and disrupt the April elections.

Even if the financial crimes commission isn't on a political witch hunt, there is no way to avoid the appearance of one so close to an election. Obasanjo should suspend the panel until after April. He also should beef up the elections agency. If he doesn't, and voids the elections to maintain power, a bloody civil war is almost certain to follow.

Which course the Nigerian president takes will affect more than his legacy and his nation. An armed insurgency in the country's south cut oil production by 25% this year, playing a key role in the run-up of crude prices that only recently began to ease. Obasanjo has a chance to become a respected elder statesman who could influence continental politics long after leaving office and bring much-needed international attention and aid to Africa. Or he could be another in a long line of Nigerian despots, cursed by his people and forgotten by history.

Don't Count Out Turkey (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 10, 2006

It's too important to Europe, and vice versa, for talks over its entrance into the EU to founder.

BULENT ECEVIT, ONE OF the most important leaders in modern Turkish history, died Sunday in Ankara. His dream may be dying a slow death in Brussels.

"There can be no Europe without Turkey, and no Turkey without Europe," Ecevit said in 1999. A four-term prime minister, Ecevit was by the end of his career a supporter of open markets and greater integration with the West.

On Wednesday, the European Commission released a progress report on Ankara's bid to join the European Union. It was highly critical of the pace of Turkey's reforms on issues such as freedom of speech and its failure to recognize Cyprus.

Cyprus is indeed the stumbling block of the day, but there is a more fundamental resistance across much of Western Europe to the idea that Turkey could join the EU. The EU is still digesting 10 new Central and Eastern European members with a lower standard of living, and there are some understandable concerns about absorbing 73 million Turks on the continent's periphery.

But the genius of Europe's enlargement process has been its ability to raise living standards in new member states while being flexible in phasing in full integration so as to not drag down living standards among richer members. Because of the terms of Poland's accession to the EU, for instance, its farmers have not impoverished French farmers. What's more, given demographic trends, Europe would increasingly benefit from Turkey's large labor pool and its vibrant consumer market.

Opposition to Turkey's candidacy in nations such as France is increasingly about cultural identity. This is unfortunate, as it undermines the idea of a largely secular Muslim Turkey serving as a bridge between West and East. Its successful integration with Christian Europe would demonstrate that the religions need not be at odds and that Western-style democracy is not unattainable in the Middle East.

But confronted with European rejection, many sectors of Turkish society seem intent on derailing integration, making the Turkey-isn't-suited claim a self-fulfilling one. Turkey's Article 301, a vague law that makes it a crime to publicly insult the nation, is a nationalist measure aimed at provoking Brussels.

And then there is Cyprus, which joined the EU in 2004 and thus has the ability to block any new members. Turkey invaded Cyprus in 1974, under Ecevit, and part of the island remains under Turkish control while Ankara refuses to recognize the Cypriot government. Talks to resolve the impasse recently collapsed.

At an EU summit in mid-December, commissioners may decide to suspend accession talks with Turkey for a year or more. That would be unfortunate — for both sides of this courtship.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senate Seen Unlikely To Approve Warrantless Wiretaps. The AP (11/11, Kellman) reports, "Legislation aimed at President Bush's once-secret program for wiretapping U.S.-foreign phone calls and computer traffic of suspected terrorists without warrants shows all the signs of not moving ahead, notwithstanding President Bush's request this week that a lame-duck Congress give it to him." The AP continues, "Senate Democrats, emboldened by Election Day wins that put them in control of Congress as of January, say they would rather wait until next year to look at the issue. 'I can't say that we won't do it, but there's no guarantee that we're going spend a lot of time on controversial measures,' Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois said Thursday. … In Senate parlance, that means no." The AP adds, "Republicans for months have known that no bill accomplishing Bush's goal could get filibuster-proof support from 60 senators. Sealing off any hope was what Democratic leader Harry Reid put on his lame-duck to-do list. The warrantless domestic surveillance bill was conspicuous in its absence. … As for next year, Bush should not expect Democrats to allow such legislation to pass without language establishing considerable congressional oversight of any expansion of warrantless wiretaps. … 'We have been asked to make sweeping and fundamental changes in law for reasons that we do not know and in order to legalize secret, unlawful actions that the administration has refused to fully divulge,' said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the next Judiciary Committee chairman. 'If legislation is needed for judicial review, then we should write that legislation together, in a bipartisan and thoughtful way.' … The Bush administration has a backup plan. In speeches over the next few weeks, the Justice Department will launch a new campaign for the legislation by casting the choice as one between supporting the program or dropping it altogether -- and appearing soft on al-Qaida. .. .Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will make the eavesdropping program the focus of a Nov. 18 speech at the U.S. Air Force Academy. Kenneth L. Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the national security, will make a similar pitch Wednesday to the American Bar Association."

Social Security Databases A Resource For Terror Probes. The Washington Post (11/10, Roig, Kriva, 690K) reports that since "the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Social Security Administration's vast databases of personal information have become a resource for federal investigators, who have asked the agency to check tens of thousands of records for number misuse and identity fraud -- potential precursors to terrorist activity." From "just after Sept. 11 through 2005, Social Security officials sent prosecutors 456 referrals that were classified as terrorism-related, according to statistics compiled by Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse. The review shows that 91 percent of those referrals led to prosecutions." Only the "departments of Justice and Homeland Security have referred more terrorism-related cases for prosecution, according to the Syracuse records, which are based on data compiled by the Justice Department's Executive Office for United States Attorneys. Still, few if any suspects in Social Security cases are ever linked publicly to alleged terrorist activity. Most cases referred to prosecutors in the months after Sept. 11 involved document fraud by Latino immigrants working at airports." Previous studies "by the Syracuse center found that thousands of cases have been referred by all agencies for prosecution under the labels of 'international terrorism' or 'antiterrorism.' However, senior Justice officials instead usually cite the criminal division's much smaller list of terrorism-related cases, which as of June included 441 defendants and 261 convictions. Most on that smaller list were charged with crimes unrelated to terrorism, an earlier Washington Post analysis found."

Judge Rules Al Arian Must Testify In Virginia Islamic Charity Probe. The AP (11/10) reported, "Sami Al-Arian must testify before a federal grand jury despite claims that a plea agreement freed him from cooperating with the U.S. government, a federal judge ruled. U.S. District Judge James S. Moody Jr. ruled Al-Arian must testify in the probe of International Institute of Islamic Thought in Herndon, Va., because Virginia prosecutors have granted him immunity. In his trial, prosecutors said Al-Arian's World and Islamic Studies Enterprise got money from the Va. Institute."

Radical Cleric's Letter Alleges Torture After CIA Kidnapping. The Washington Post (11/10, A23, Whitlock, 690K) reports that in an "an account smuggled out of prison, a radical Muslim cleric has detailed how he was kidnapped by the CIA from this northern Italian city" of Milan "and flown to Cairo, where he was tortured for months with electric shocks and shackled to an iron rack known as 'the Bride.'" Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, "also known as Abu Omar, wrote an 11-page letter describing his 2003 abduction at the hands of the CIA and Italian secret service agents. He somehow transferred the document out of Egypt -- where he remains in custody -- and into the hands of Italian prosecutors who are investigating his disappearance." The document "has been submitted as evidence to defense attorneys representing 25 CIA officers, a U.S. Air Force officer and nine Italian agents who have been charged with organizing the kidnapping of Nasr, an Egyptian national, in February 2003." In Egypt, "his captors offered a deal: They would allow him to return to Italy if he agreed to become an informant. Nasr said he refused. As a result, he said, he was interrogated and physically abused for the next 14 months in two Cairo prisons."

British Intelligence Tracking Nearly 30 Terrorist Plots. ABC World News (11/10, story 3, 1:11, Gibson) reported on an "alarming claim by the head of Britain's domestic intelligence agency. She said British authorities are tracking almost 30 terrorist plots, involving 200 terror cells and keeping tabs on 1,600 people, many of them home-grown British militants." ABC (Ross): "We're told they're talking about six operational plots that reflect advanced planning, with specific targets and recruits already selected for attacks. The speech by the British spy chief also suggested that, for the first time, British authorities believe this is being run by Al Qaeda central, directly out of Pakistan, with Al Qaeda leaders in control." NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 5, Williams) called it "a distressing report," saying Britain's domestic spy agency MI5 "warns young British Muslims are being actively targeted for recruitment by various terrorist networks."

The Washington Post (11/11, A15, Jordan) reports MI5 is "watching 1,600 people in 200 cells believed to be plotting terrorist acts in Britain or overseas." MI5 Director Eliza Manningham-Buller said, "More and more people are moving from passive sympathy towards active terrorism." Manningham-Buller said a "growing number of people are plotting to kill others and damage the British economy. The conspirators, she said, are motivated 'by a sense of grievance and injustice driven by their interpretation of the history between the West and the Muslim world.'" The AP (11/10, Gardiner) adds that Manningham-Buller said MI5 "had foiled five major plots since the July 2005 transit bomb attacks in London."

The New York Times (11/11, A6, Cowell) reports British PM Tony Blair said the "threat from homegrown Islamic terrorism would last 'a generation,'" reinforcing the "highly unusual warning" from Manningham-Buller. In her remarks, the MI5 chief "also asserted that operatives for Al Qaeda in Pakistan were helping to guide some of the plots, reflecting British assessments that Qaeda operatives survived campaigns against them to steer conspiracies in Britain from afar."

"Hundreds" Of Al Qaeda Fighters "On The Move." The CBS Evening News (11/10, lead story, 2:40, Couric) began with an exclusive report saying that "hundreds of al Qaeda fighters are on the move, moving out of Afghanistan and Pakistan. And the question tonight is, where are they headed and what are they planning? This comes as British intelligence is warning that it's tracking nearly 30 terror plots involving hundreds of people." CBS (MacVicar): "Intelligence agencies have been warned al Qaeda may be planning to attack air and rail travel in Europe during the busy holiday travel season. The warnings come from interrogations of al Qaeda suspects who were recently ordered to leave Afghanistan and Pakistan." In the "last six months, in the mountains and battlefields of Afghanistan, al Qaeda has withdrawn well-trained Arab fighters."

On the CBS Evening News (11/10, story 2, 1:50), anchor Katie Couric also interviewed John Brennan, former head of the National Counter Terrorism Center, asking, "I think some people might be confused, Mr. Brennan, because the Bush administration claims that real damage was done to al Qaeda in Afghanistan, and yet it seems to me that there are other reports that al Qaeda and other similar organizations have been empowered and are stronger than ever. So what's the truth?" Brennan: "I think al Qaeda central, the core, which is in Pakistan-Afghanistan, Osama bin Laden and Zawahiri, that core group really has been bloodied badly. But I think the whole purpose of bin Laden was al Qaeda means the foundation. He wanted it to give birth to other group, to other individuals to carry out attacks. And what we're seeing right now is the proliferation of those individuals."

Judge Refuses To Vacate Al Qaeda Backer's Guilty Plea. The Washington Post (11/11, A12, Markon) reports US District Judge Leonie Brinkema "has refused to throw out the guilty plea of a convicted al-Qaeda supporter who argued that he was illegally spied on through President Bush's controversial warrantless eavesdropping program." Truck driver Iyman Faris pleaded guilty in 2003 to "plotting to bring down the Brooklyn Bridge and launch a simultaneous attack in Washington. He asked a judge to vacate the plea, arguing in part that the alleged surveillance violated his rights and that the government could not use it to build a case against him."

Cleric Claims He Was Kidnapped By CIA, Then Tortured. The New York Times (11/11, A7, Povoledo) reports Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, a "militant Egyptian cleric who prosecutors say was kidnapped" by the CIA, said in an account published in the Italian newspaper Corriere della Sera this week that he was "tortured with electric shocks while he lay on a wet mattress in a Cairo prison and was repeatedly beaten and forced to eat rotten bread in a pitch-black cell, while rats and cockroaches ran over his body." Milanese prosecutors "have appended the account to the case they are building against 39 people, including 25 C.I.A. operatives. Prosecutors accuse them of abducting Mr. Nasr and sending him to Egypt for questioning, in the American practice of rendition."

Torture Issue Was Notably Absent From US Campaigns. The New York Times (11/11, B5, Steinfels) runs a "Beliefs" feature on why US candidates declined to discuss allegations of torture during the just-ended campaign season, saying that torture "is such a stain on personal and national character that nothing but appalling photographs could have forced the subject to the fore. … In a season of shameless attack ads, torture is still too shameful to be debated."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats May Have Hard Time Implementing 9/11 Panel Recommendations. The Washington Post (11/11, A3, Eggen, Hsu) reports Democrats "have vowed to push through a host of reforms recommended two years ago by the Sept. 11 commission, such as better port security and improved radio communications for first responders, but many of the most controversial changes are likely to face obstacles even with Capitol Hill in Democratic hands, according to experts and legislative aides." Homeland security experts said Democratic control "will not guarantee implementation of some of the commission's most controversial suggestions, which have languished because of entrenched political and bureaucratic obstacles. A prime example is the commission's call to base the federal government's homeland security funding on the actual risk of terrorist attacks or other calamities -- an approach that would generally benefit large metropolitan areas at the expense of smaller cities and rural regions. Although such an approach would favor regions represented by Democrats, lawmakers have preferred to spread dollars to as many jurisdictions as possible." Center for Health and Homeland Security Director Michael Greenberger said, "It's easy to say they'll implement the 9/11 recommendations. But some of the recommendations have not been implemented because they've been so hard to swallow."

LATimes Says Customs Laptop Searches Go Too Far. The Los Angeles Times (11/11) editorializes, "It was bad enough for international travelers earlier this year when security officials barred laptop computers from carry-on luggage. Now that the ban has been lifted, a new worry has replaced it: the prospect of U.S. customs agents snooping through your laptop -- and even seizing it. … Stopping bad guys at the border is important, and it makes sense to inspect incoming items, including laptops, for explosives and other weapons. But the government has been using the terrorist attacks of 9/11 to redefine 'reasonable.' There's a clear line between checking a laptop for explosives and reading its contents, and agents should have an excellent reason to cross it."

Louisiana Recovery Program Slow To Get Funds To Applicants. The New York Times (11/11, Eaton) reports on its front page that the "$7.5 billion program to rebuild Louisiana by helping residents repair or replace their flooded homes," known as Road Home, "has gotten off to a slow start, frustrating government officials and outraging many homeowners who say they are still in limbo 14 months after Hurricane Katrina hit." Though nearly 79,000 families have applied, "only 1,721 have been told how much grant money they will receive. And just 22 have received access to the cash, which was provided by federal taxpayers and is being distributed by the state."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Will Reevaluate Strategy In Iraq. Coverage of the planned reevaluation of Iraq strategy centered on the perceived need for change and the ability of uniformed officers to push through their ideas in the absence of outgoing Secretary Rumsfeld. NBC Nightly News (11.10, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It didn't take long -- just a few days after American voters spoke with a unified voice at the polls and today there were already indications this nation's Iraq policy is indeed in for a major change. First, a new boss at the Pentagon and now a new definition of what it means to win in Iraq. It's clear a major change is coming, even while this nation's troops are fighting it out on the ground in Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski): "... the Bush Administration is struggling to come up with a new strategy for Iraq and today Joint Chief's Chairman General Pace on MSNBC described victory as simply reducing the violence to an acceptable level. ... At the same time parts of that new strategy are beginning to take shape. Military sources tell NBC News US commanders are working on plans to accelerate the turnover of more Iraqi territory from Americans to Iraqi security forces. But there is a risk. If the transition comes too fast, some areas could easily fall into the hands of sectarian militias. There are also plans to reverse Debaathification and rehire Iraqi servants whom the US fired three years ago because they were members of Saddam's Baath party." Loren Thompson, military expert: "Under Saddam you didn't get a military post unless you were a Baathist. So when you got rid of a Baathist, you got rid of anybody who knew how to run the country." Miklaszewski: "And a widespread amnesty for insurgents but not those suspected of attacking US forces or those Al Qaeda fighters, but many fear this all may be too late." Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution military analyst: "There's a momentum to this insurgency and the civil war now that no good policy can even reverse even if the policy is correct." Miklaszewski: "Advisors to Robert Gates say many of these proposals should have been adopted two years ago but were rejected then by Vice President Cheney and Secretary Rumsfeld."

The Washington Post (11/11, A1, Tyson, 690K) in a front page article reports, "The Pentagon is conducting a major review of the military's Iraq strategy to determine 'what's going wrong and should be changed' to attain U.S. objectives in the war-torn country, the nation's top general said yesterday." JCS chair Gen. Peter Pace "initiated the review this fall after starkly deteriorating security in Baghdad led commanders there to rule out any significant cut this year in the level of U.S. troops in Iraq -- now at about 145,000 -- according to senior defense officials and sources. ... Pace's comments also could foreshadow a reassertion of influence by senior officers in the wake of this week's resignation by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, according to military officers and analysts. Moreover, some military officers have voiced concern in recent days that if they do not assert a greater role in formulating a future course in Iraq, that course will be defined for them by the resurgence of congressional Democrats, many of whom favor a withdrawal of U.S. troops."

Pace is quoted as praising both Rumsfeld ("a strong advocate") and Secretary-designate Robert Gates ("very talented, dedicated patriot [with] a reputation as a man who gets things done, a man who is collaborative and solicits subordinates' opinions").

The New York Times (11/11, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "In a closely held effort, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has assembled a team of some of the military's brightest and most innovative officers and told them to take a fresh look at Iraq and Afghanistan, among other flashpoints. ... Ideas that have been discussed include increasing the size of the Iraqi security forces, along with the American effort to train and equip them, and adjusting the size of the American force in Iraq. ... The review reflects the recognition that military efforts need to be part of an overall approach that includes all aspects of American power, including diplomatic and economic."

BBC.com (11/11) reports, "Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen Peter Pace said commanders were having their own dialogue and would make the changes that were needed. President George W Bush is to meet members of a panel drawing up proposals for ending the conflict on Monday. Iraq was a key factor in the Republican defeat in mid-term polls and US defence chief Donald Rumsfeld's resignation." The Iraq Study Group "is said to have been looking at two options, both of which would amount to a reversal of the Bush administration's stance. One is the phased withdrawal of US troops, and the other is to increase contact with Syria and Iran to help stop the fighting."

Election Seen As Referendum On Iraq. NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 6, 2:13, Williams) ran an "In Depth" report analyzing this week's elections, asking, "Is the political pendulum on the move in this country? Is the nation changing politically or was this simply a one-time referendum on an unpopular war in Iraq?" Analyst Stuart Rothenberg: "It's far from clear that this is a long-term change in the electorate. Rather it's a reaction to the war in Iraq, to the President's performance and to the short-term desire for change." NBC (Reid): "He does say, though, that in certain parts of the country, shifts are clearly occurring. For example, just as southern Democrats were purged from the House in 1994 when Republicans swept to the power in this election nearly all New England Republicans were purged from the House. And in the Rocky Mountain States where four years ago all eight governors were Republicans, now five are Democrats."

The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Richter, McManus) says the Democratic victories are "b oosting pressure for a bipartisan approach to the Iraq war, a rough consensus is emerging that could lead to a new direction and a gradual U.S. disengagement from the costly conflict. There are those on both sides of the aisle who favor giving the Iraqis firm deadlines for meeting a list of political goals, with the possibility of redeploying U.S. troops if the goals aren't met -- a scenario that could lead to withdrawal."

Rep. Jim Moran, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/10, Matthews), said, "We need a change of command at the White House. This election was about one person and one issue: George Bush and the Iraq war. Corruption contributed to it, but it really was sending a message, and that message was sent as much by independents as it was by Democrats. That's what the Congress needs to do, to show some checks and balances, to see to it that the administration comes up with some exit strategy sooner rather than later."

Sen.-elect Bob Corker said on PBS' NewsHour (11/10, Warner), "We need to fix our strategy in Iraq and start moving ahead again so that Iraqi people can quickly secure themselves so that there's a government there that is accountable. And then we need to bring our men and women home as quickly as possible. So I'm glad that James Baker is working on a strategy that hopefully will upgrade our ability to do that. And I'm looking forward to seeing what that is."

Bush Grants Marine Posthumous Medal Of Honor At USMC Museum Ceremony. ABC World News (11/10, story 5, 0:56, Gibson) reported, "Inspiration today as President Bush honored a young Marine who gave his life in Iraq. At a ceremony for the new National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Virginia, the President said the Medal of Honor will be given to the parents of Cpl. Jason Dunham. He threw himself on a grenade to protect fellow Marines. And the President, today, was visibly moved." Bush: "As long as we have Marines like Cpl. Dunham, America will never fear for her liberty. And as long as we have this fine museum, America will never forget their sacrifice. May God bless you. May God bless the Marines. And May God bless the United States." Gibson: "Today is the Marine Corps' 231st anniversary. And it would have been Cpl. Dunham's 25th birthday."

NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 2, 2:14, Williams) reported on the award and profiled Cpl. Dunham, while the CBS Evening News (11/10, story 7, Couric) reported on the ceremony and the presentation of the Medal of Honor as a lead-in to a feature on what it takes "to become a Marine. … There's no question the training is tough. … But does it prepare young men for what they will face in Iraq?"

On the front page of its Metro section, the Washington Post (11/11, Smith, 690K) reports, "Many traveled thousands of miles for this moment, on the 231st anniversary of the Marine Corps, to gather on a grassy promenade near the Quantico Marine Corps Base, to remember and cry and celebrate the opening of the National Museum of the Marine Corps." The Post describes the museum's contents and quotes President Bush's speech.

The Washington Times (11/11, Lively, 88K) reports on its front page that the ceremony was "nearly 20 years in the making." Former Marine and journalist Jim Lehrer said, "The death rate among Marines in Iraq has been more than double that of the other service." The announcement of Dunham's MOH is also noted.

The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A4, Phillips, 2.04M) reports about the "charismatic" Dunham's posthumous award and describes the battle that cost him his life: "When his attacker dropped a live hand grenade, the Marine made the split-second decision to cover the weapon with his own helmet, shielding two of his men from its full explosive force." The Journal recalls, "Cpl. Dunham's life and death were chronicled in a page-one story in The Wall Street Journal on May 25, 2004."

The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports that Dunham "will be the first Marine to receive the nation's highest medal for bravery for combat since the war in Vietnam. The award ceremony will be at the White House at a date to be selected by Bush and the Dunham family."

CNN.com (11/10) reports, "Dunham will be the second American to receive the Medal of Honor from service in Iraq. Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul Ray Smith was the other, honored [posthumously] for action near Baghdad International Airport in April 2003, in which he killed as many as 50 enemy combatants while helping wounded comrades to safety."

Marines In Iraq Mark 231st Anniversary Of Corps. The New York Times (11/11, Chivers, 1.16M) reports from Outpost Viking, Iraq, "The Marine Corps celebrated its 231st birthday on Friday, an event that passes with little notice outside the corps's insular ranks, but is an essential ritual within, especially now, as the policies guiding the war seem certain to change and the reasons that brought the marines here are less clear." The Times says bleakly of the profiled unit's losses and the allegedly changing mission for the war, "Nearly 15 percent of the battalion's marines have been wounded. Five marines and one of their interpreters have been killed and 31 marines have been wounded seriously enough to require evacuation back to the states. ... the list of reasons for fighting has changed. First it shifted from finding weapons of mass destruction to removing a dictator to building a stable, democratic Iraq. ... many of the marines in the battalion, in their quiet times in the weeks before this day, have said they fight for two things: the corps's tradition and reputation, and for the man on their left and right."

Muhajir Claims 12,000 Fighters In Iraq, Says More Attacks To Come. NBC Nightly News (11/10, lead story, 3:00. Williams) opened with a critical report saying it is "clear a major change is coming" at the Pentagon and in US Iraq policy "just a few days after American voters spoke with a unified voice at the polls." In addition to "troops are fighting it out on the ground in Iraq," NBC (Miklaszewski) said there "was also a new tape released today from Al Qaeda, and although it all sounds very horrifying, US Intelligence officials report tonight that this tape is nothing more than pure propaganda. The voice on the audio claims to be that of the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, al-Muhajir. In a chilling diatribe he warns, we haven't had enough of your blood yet and threatens to blow up the White House. He claims Al Qaeda now has 12,000 fighters in Iraq. He also praised Democrats for their election victory that drove Donald Rumsfeld from the Pentagon. The new threats come as the Bush Administration is struggling to come up with a new strategy for Iraq."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/10, Costello) reported, "Al Qaeda in Iraq's new leader is taunting President Bush and Donald Rumsfeld. In a new audiotape posted on an Islamist website, a man claiming to be Abu Hamza al-Muhajer calls President Bush a lame duck and the outgoing Defense Secretary a coward. And that's not all he says. He also threatens to blow up the White House."

Blair Will Give Evidence To Iraq Study Group. The Financial Times (11/11, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair will next week give evidence to the Iraq Study Group led by James Baker, the former US secretary of state, in the first indication Britain is being consulted by Washington over potential change of policy on the war. ... The decision by the Iraq Study Group to interview Mr Blair is an important boost for Downing Street, amid fears that Britain might be excluded from the US reassessment of Iraq policy following the Democrats' victory in the congressional elections." Blair reportedly "is certain to tell Mr Baker that the US and UK must not "cut and run", remaining in Iraq until Baghdad can manage the security situation on its own. Mr Blair has told allies he is confident that the Baker-Hamilton committee will make no such recommendation."

US Office In Iraq Shelled For Second Time. The Washington Times/AP (11/11, Yacoub) reports, "The U.S. government's office in central Iraq came under mortar fire early Saturday, an attack that touched off a blaze in part of the complex, Iraqi police said. There was no immediate word on damage or casualties. ... The mortar attack was at least the second reported in recent weeks against the U.S. office in Hillah, which oversees government and diplomatic interests in the central Euphrates region, about 60 miles south of Baghdad." The mortar "is growing increasingly popular among Iraqi fighters because it can be fired from a secure location several miles from a target and then quickly hauled away or hidden."

Shays Lays Out Steps For Stabilizing Iraq. Rep. Christopher Shays, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/10, Matthews), said, "There's four things we need to do. The first thing is we need to set a timeline to transfer Iraqis to patrol the streets and get our guys from patrolling the streets. The Iraqis need to start doing the police work. … The second thing we need to do is set timelines for the Iraqis -- the Shias and the Sunnis in particular -- to work out their differences on reconciliation, on de-Baathification, on where the oil goes and federalism. The third thing you need to do is we need to get the six…neighboring countries to come together, Iran included obviously, and say: If we fail, Iraq gets divided into three parts; none of you want that. And finally, I think you need a plebiscite. If two-thirds of the Iraqis aren't going to support our being there and our plan to withdraw, then we leave even sooner. They need to start showing some support for our troops. Otherwise, we just need to leave."

Shiite Clerics Urge Speedy Hanging Of Hussein. The Los Angeles Times(11/11, Roug, 850K) reports, "Addressing worshipers for the first time since the conviction of Saddam Hussein, many of Iraq's Shiite Muslim preachers called Friday for the speedy hanging of the former president. Hussein, a Sunni Muslim who long repressed Iraq's Shiite majority, should be executed in public between two of the holiest Shiite sites in Iraq, a cleric demanded during his sermon in Karbala. ... U.S. officials had hoped the trial of Hussein, toppled in the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, would help unite Iraq. But many now believe the verdict is heightening ethnic and sectarian tensions. Shiites in eastern Baghdad and other areas where they are concentrated cheered the decision in mass rallies as angry Sunni Arabs marched in large demonstrations north of the capital."

National Guard Units Face Second Tours In Iraq. The AP (11/11, Baldor) reports, "National Guard combat brigades that have already served in Iraq may be called for a second tour, likely breaking the 24-month deployment limit initially set by the Pentagon, the Guard's top general said. ... the new plans would, for the first time, send entire Guard combat brigades back to the battlefront. Brigades generally have about 3,500 troops." The AP adds, "In a related move, the Pentagon is preparing to release a list of active units — and perhaps reserves as well — scheduled to go to Iraq that would largely maintain the current level of forces there over the next two years, another senior defense official said Thursday. There are about 152,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. That official requested anonymity because the plan has not been made public." It was "not clear whether this week's resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would affect deployment plans." The Los Angeles Times (11/11, 850K) carries an abbreviated version of this story.

Formerly Touted Tall Afar Struggles To Rebuild. The Washington Post (11/11, White, 690K) reports, "A year ago, U.S. officials championed the military's success in pushing insurgents out of this city in Iraq's northwestern desert, reclaiming it for the roughly 250,000 residents and eliminating an insurgent safe haven. President Bush publicly praised the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's effort." However, "The unemployment rate here is nearly 70 percent. Officials estimate that fewer than half of Tall Afar's residents remained here or returned after the last big U.S.-Iraqi military operation in September 2005. Many of the city's buildings are vacant or were destroyed in the fighting last year. Hundreds of millions of dollars was promised to help rebuild and restore Tall Afar, but the money has just started to trickle in through the Iraqi central government's staggeringly slow bureaucracy. And Iraqi forces have only recently taken the lead in providing security, helped in large part by the population drop and lack of attacks." The Post says with guarded optimism, "Still, the Iraqi forces are out front, while U.S. forces hang back more and more."

Crumbling Iraqi Health Care Worsens Death Toll. The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Roug, 850K) reports in a highly critical , 1,712-word front page article, "Thousands of Iraqis are believed to have died from shortages of medicine, vital equipment and qualified doctors, despite an infusion of nearly half a billion dollars from U.S. coffers into this country's healthcare system, Iraqi officials and American observers say. ... In the most sinister reported development, provincial Sunni Muslim doctors charge that Shiite Muslims who control the Health Ministry deliberately withhold medicines and other vital supplies. Privately, some U.S. officials say that hard-line Shiites use the ministry for political and sectarian ends." Iraqi health care "was once the envy of the region. ... Medicine and hospital care were free, doctors well-educated and respected. But neglect by former President Saddam Hussein and years of United Nations sanctions laid waste to the system."

Restored Baghdad Psychiatric Hospital Serving Traumatized City. ABC World News (11/10, story 4, 2:05, Gibson) ran a feature on a Baghdad psychiatric hospital "full of patients traumatized by the violence in their city and what they have seen take place." The report focused on the impact of the war on Iraq's children. ABC (McCarthy): "The good news is that the hospital is functioning at all. Immediately after the war, psychiatric hospitals in Baghdad were looted and patients abandoned. Today, with US funds, these hospitals have been restored and reequipped."

Navy SEAL Is Founder Of Group For Soldiers' Families. NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 8, Fratangelo) ran a feature on the United Warriors Survivors Foundation, created by Navy SEAL Nick Rocha "for the widows of fallen operation soldiers. They meet twice a year, young, vibrant women whose lives one minute revolved around the military and the next, fell apart. … It hits home for Nick. He knows it could have easily been his family left behind." Rocha: "I can't look myself in the mirror if I don't continue to help these people and their children."

Rumsfeld Could Face Abuse Charges. BBC.com (11/11) reports, "Donald Rumsfeld, who quit as US defence secretary this week, may face criminal charges in Germany for alleged abuses in Guantanamo Bay and Iraq. A complaint has been launched by the US-based Centre for Constitutional Rights, representing a Saudi detained in Cuba and 11 Iraqis held in Baghdad." BBC.com adds, "The Pentagon has not yet commented on the issue. The US denies any torture has taken place at Guantanamo Bay and has defended its interrogation techniques."

The New York Daily News (11/11, Meek, 729K) reports that Time magazine originally broke the story of the plan to have Rumsfeld charged, saying, "Retired Army Col. Janis Karpinski is the star witness backing the detainees, who also name ex-CIA Director George Tenet, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, ex-Iraq commander Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez and retired Gitmo commander Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller. Before Bush demoted her from brigadier general because of the abuse, Karpinski commanded the Long Island-based 800th Military Police Brigade that ran all of Iraq's prisons, including Abu Ghraib."

Fox Report with Shepard Smith (11/10, 8:45 p.m.) broadcasted, "Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld may have to worry about more than what to do with his free time. TIME magazine reports a group of former prisoners plan to file charges against Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other American officials for their treatment at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba and Abu Ghraib in Iraq. TIME says the court papers will be filed next week in Germany. Prosecution witnesses will include the woman once responsible for Abu Ghraib, former Brigadier General Janice Karpinksi. No comment from the Pentagon." This story received light coverage in New York, Washington DC, Raleigh, and Durham.

WPIX- TV New York (11/11, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The New York City-based Center For Constitutional Rights plans to file criminal charges against Rumsfeld in a German court. Alberto Gonzales and George Tenet will be named in a complaint that claims US officials okayed the torture and abuse of suspects in Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib. This first reported by TIME plays."

NC8- TV Washington, DC (11/11, 7:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "A lawsuit has now been filed over prisoner abuse allegedly committed by US military members in Iraq and at Guantanamo Bay. Those targeted by the suit include Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and now former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

WNCN- TV Raleigh, Durham (11/11, 9:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "The lawsuit is based in Germany. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former CIA director George Tenet are also named in the suit. According to a TIME magazine report, the plaintiffs in the case include 11 Iraqis who were prisoners at Abu Ghraib."

FT Recalls Rumsfeld's Statements. The Financial Times (11/11, Sevastopulo) in an analysis piece reports, "Always combative, often charming, sometimes a bully, Mr Rumsfeld introduced a style of Pentagon press conference that both entertained and infuriated." Several of the secretary's elliptical statements are quoted; the FT notes that he "made his name as a poet whose rhetorical musings have been compiled in Pieces of Intelligence: The Existential Poetry of Donald H. Rumsfeld."

Scarborough Slams Bush On Timing Of Rumsfeld Exit. On MSNBC's Tucker (11/10, Carlson), ex-Rep. Joe Scarborough, now an MSNBC host himself, said, "I could not imagine how I would feel were I a Republican congressman who had blindly followed George W. Bush as most Republican congressmen have over the past six years and spent my entire campaign on the stump defending this war, and by extension, defending Donald Rumsfeld, when history of this conflict showed that he made several terrible mistakes…and then to have George W. Bush fire him the day afterward and then hear that this was in the works for quite some time, I would blame my political loss and the end of my political career on George W. Bush. And think about all the party chairmen, all the chairmen in the Republican Party in the House and the Senate that are no longer chairmen because of Rumsfeld. A lot of anger on Capitol Hill, and I think we are going to really see some recriminations. And you're going to have a lot of Republicans that are not going to follow George W. Bush blindly anymore."

Peace Remains "Distant Dream" In Afghanistan. AFP (11/11, Briand) reports in a highly bleak article, "Five years after US-led forces drove the Taliban from Kabul, peace remains a distant dream in Afghanistan with militant attacks at an all-time high, a despondent population and widespread corruption. ... In the eyes of many Afghans the situation is worse than it was five years ago: the cost of living has increased, infrastructure remains deficient and security is still not assured, according to the non-governmental organisation Action Against Hunger."

Musharraf's Reconciliation Efforts Said To Suffer From School Strike. In a 1,300-word analysis piece on its front page, the Washington Post (11/11, A1, Constable, Khan, 690K) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's peace and cooperation agreement with North Waziristan tribal leaders had been "a model for curbing domestic Islamic militancy and cross-border insurgent attacks," but "today that model lies in shreds." The "fragile political peace has been shattered by two devastating attacks: a government missile strike that killed 82 people at an Islamic school in the Bajaur tribal district on Oct. 30, and a retaliatory suicide bombing Wednesday that killed 42 army recruits at a training camp in the Malakand tribal district." The Post says Musharraf "has long been caught between conflicting domestic and international pressures," and his "recent attempt at compromise, a series of negotiated settlements with armed Islamic groups and tribal leaders, has been controversial. Critics charge that pacts in North and South Waziristan left both areas under the control of extremists who continue to export violence to Afghanistan."

Female Soldiers "Just Do Their Jobs." In a Veterans' Day-oriented "Editorial Observer" piece in the New York Times (11/11, 1.16M), reporter Maura Casey recalls her mother's service in World War II and writes, "Yet, despite what women in uniform have accomplished, there are critics who want to curtail their military roles. ... reality has overrun critics' arguments. Between Iraq and Afghanistan, 68 women have been killed in action, and 436 have been wounded, according to the Pentagon's Web site. ... Given the ease of modern communication, from cellphones to e-mail, if women were not measuring up in Iraq, that would have become very clear by now."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fastow Deposition Will Help Shareholders Recover In Civil Suit. The New York Times (11/10, Barrionuevo) reports, "No one sold tickets, but the Andrew S. Fastow show cost a small fortune. … And while it was light on laughs, it even featured window washers who moved in the background like shadowy ninjas before a nervous audience of big-name Wall Street lawyers representing some of the largest banks in the world." The Times continues, "For eight and a half days, Mr. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, held some 70 lawyers rapt in a downtown Houston conference room as he delivered the most expansive deposition yet in a spate of lawsuits stemming from Enron's 2001 collapse. His much-anticipated appearance, which ended on Nov. 2, was the first time an Enron insider had sought to help shareholders recover money in the civil litigation. … Lawyers representing Enron investors have already won settlements for $7.3 billion of the $40 billion shareholders claim they lost in Enron's 2001 collapse. On Nov. 1, the latest settlement — an agreement by Arthur Andersen, Enron's former accounting firm, to pay $72.5 million — was disclosed. … But it is far from clear whether the testimony of Mr. Fastow, a convicted felon who masterminded some of the fraudulent transactions that hid the company's poor financial health, will be enough to push the seven banks that have not settled to the negotiating table."

New California AG To Take Fresh Look At H-P Case. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A2, Anders) reports, "The criminal prosecution of former Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia Dunn -- who is due to be arraigned on Friday -- could get a fresh look from one of California's best-known politicians." The Journal continues, "On Nov. 7, California voters picked Democrat Jerry Brown -- the former governor and presidential candidate -- to be the state's next attorney general. Mr. Brown, who is currently mayor of Oakland, will begin his new job Jan. 9." The Journal adds, "As attorney general, Mr. Brown will have ultimate authority in deciding how to proceed with People vs. Dunn, a case filed in state court in San Jose last month by William Lockyer, the current AG. The state's case focused on allegedly improper techniques used by H-P and its agents to gather phone records and other personal data for an investigation of boardroom leaks. … Mr. Lockyer took a negative view of H-P's conduct. 'One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way,' he said in an Oct. 4 briefing about the state's case. 'In this misguided effort, people inside and outside H-P violated privacy rights and broke state law.' … Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said he expects the Dunn case will be "a candidate for review" by Mr. Brown, 'if only to get him up to speed on the evidence we gathered and why we brought the case.'"

Three Qwest Officials Cash In Stock Options. The AP (11/11, Press) reports, "Three executives at Qwest Communications International made more than $43 million by cashing in stock options, according to regulatory filings." The AP continues, "The chief executive, Richard C. Notebaert, made a profit of $18.4 million and the chief financial officer, Oren G. Shaffer, made $18.5 million, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing. .. .The chief legal officer, Richard N. Baer, made a $6.4 million profit, according to documents filed earlier this week. … A Qwest spokesman, Nicholas Sweers, said that Mr. Notebaert planned to donate his after-tax proceeds to charities. Mr. Sweers did not identify the charities. .. .Mr. Shaffer and Mr. Baer have not revealed any plans for their proceeds." The AP adds, "The sales were disclosed about a month after Qwest's founder and largest shareholder, Philip F. Anschutz, contracted to sell 80 million shares through 2010. … Mr. Sweers said the executives retained substantial stock options. With Qwest share prices up by more than 80 percent year-over-year, 'all shareholders have been rewarded by the company's financial and operational performance,' Mr. Sweers said. … Qwest has announced plans to buy back up to $2 billion worth of its stock over two years."

SEC, Accounting Board To Discuss Change To Sarbanes-Oxley Component. The Washington Post (11/11, D1, Johnson) reports SEC and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board members will meet tomorrow to discuss ways to overhaul a section of Sarbanes-Oxley "that business groups have targeted as overly expensive." The component, "which requires companies to review their financial controls and to have auditors pass judgment on them, spilled into public view this week after the release of portions of a letter by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox proposing changes." The "exact language in Cox's letter has not been made public," but "speculation raged after reports suggested that Cox had proposed that small and mid-size companies could avoid reviews of their internal controls altogether or that regulators could render the reviews virtually useless by significantly heightening the standard for what kinds of transactions were important enough for auditors to assess." The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B3, Burns, Smith) reports in a speech Friday, Cox "repeatedly criticized the current regulatory setup as 'antiquated,' 'redundant,' 'needless and often harmful.'"

SEC To Propose Further Hedge Fund Limits. Bloomberg (11/11, News) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission will propose rules next month raising asset requirements for investing in hedge funds after one fund, Amaranth Advisers, lost $6.5 billion on bad natural gas trades." Bloomberg continues, "The changes will be proposed to the S.E.C.'s five commissioners at a December meeting in Washington, the agency chairman, Christopher Cox, said yesterday. He did not specify how the agency might limit the pool of hedge-fund investors. … 'We're going to make it very clear that hedge funds are risky investments that are not for mom and pop by fencing it off with higher standards to accrediting investors,' Mr. Cox said in an interview." Bloomberg adds, "Hedge funds are open to individuals with at least $1 million in assets or at least $200,000 in income for the last two years, and also institutions like insurance companies, mutual funds and pension funds. Since Amaranth collapsed in September, lawmakers have become increasingly concerned that a hedge fund meltdown could put pension fund investments at risk. … Mr. Cox said at the meeting on Dec. 13, the S.E.C. would also propose a hedge fund anti-fraud rule as well as new guidelines to help companies and auditors interpret the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law in a way that saves time and money."

Cuomo May Not Follow Spitzer's Lead In Pursuing Corporate Wrongdoers. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B1, Davies) reports, "Soon, there will be a new sheriff in town. … New York state's departing attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, used the once-provincial job to propel himself onto the national stage: Applying little-known state laws, he crusaded against bad behavior in mutual funds, banking and the insurance businesses, forcing billions of dollars in penalties. He also took on business titans such as Dick Grasso, the former head of the New York Stock Exchange, charging that he was overpaid." The Journal continues, "His successor, 48-year-old Andrew Cuomo, inherits an office that has been transformed. Now everyone is waiting to see how Mr. Cuomo, who was elected on Tuesday in a landslide, plans to wield his power. … In an interview, Mr. Cuomo, the son of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, signaled that he intends to be different from Mr. Spitzer. Unlike the hard-nosed Mr. Spitzer -- who in his office keeps a picture of Teddy Roosevelt, another New York maverick, who famously crusaded a century ago to break up monopoly businesses like Standard Oil -- Mr. Cuomo said he works best 'collaboratively.' Mr. Cuomo said his top priorities are to clamp down on Medicaid fraud, the sale and use of illegal guns, and government corruption. … 'Just the way Eliot exposed corruption on Wall Street, the attorney general has a responsibility to expose corruption in government,' Mr. Cuomo said. He plans to go after big business whenever necessary, but said times have changed since the widespread scandals that erupted after the stock-market bubble burst earlier in the decade. Mr. Spitzer, he said, filled a void left by federal regulators who were slow to respond to questionable business practices."

Korean Probe Of Lone Star Deal Hits Snag. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B2, Santini) reports, "South Korean prosecutors are hitting some stumbling blocks in their investigation of Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and its 2003 acquisition of Korea Exchange Bank, even as a recent assessment by Korean tax authorities almost wiped out the bank's earnings for the latest quarter." The Journal continues, "Tuesday, the Seoul Central District Court rejected prosecutors' second request for arrest warrants for Lone Star Vice Chairman Ellis Short, General Counsel Michael Thomson and country head Paul Yoo, citing lack of evidence regarding warrant petitions for the first two men. Regarding Mr. Yoo, who resides in Korea, the court said he didn't pose a flight risk and wasn't likely to destroy evidence gathered by prosecutors. … Then, Thursday, in an apparent sign of frustration, prosecutors emailed a seven-page document to about 3,000 prominent Koreans, including lawyers, academics and journalists, criticizing the court's rebuff as hampering the investigation." The Journal adds, "Also Thursday, the prosecutors issued a summons to Messrs. Short and Thomson demanding they appear in Seoul Monday. A lawyer for Lone Star described the summons and the mass email as attempts to justify the third application to the court. … It is unlikely that Messrs. Short and Thomson will travel to Korea on short notice, the lawyer said, adding that Mr. Thomson has met with prosecutors in Seoul several times and as recently as last month."

CRIMINAL LAW:

High Court To Consider Missouri Sentencing. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (11/11, Sichko) reports, "Mario Claiborne faced a likely prison sentence of 37 to 46 months as he stood before a U.S. District Court judge in March 2005. … That was the recommended range for a prison term under federal sentencing guidelines. But Judge Carol E. Jackson chose to knock nearly two years off the prison term for the 21-year-old St. Louisan, who had pleaded guilty to two cocaine-related offenses." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Claiborne's case now sits before the Supreme Court, which will answer a central question: How does a judge adequately justify a sentence that's well outside the prison term recommended by federal guidelines? … The court agreed last week to hear Claiborne's case, along with a similar case from North Carolina. That case raises the question of how much weight should be given to the advisory guidelines and whether a sentence within the suggested range can automatically be presumed 'reasonable.'" The Post-Dispatch adds, "Lower courts have divided over those issues since the court decided last year to make the guidelines advisory, not mandatory. While district courts were no longer bound by those guidelines, they were still required to take them into account. … In the 2005 opinion, issued before Claiborne was sentenced, the 5-4 Supreme Court majority said it hoped the changes would help 'avoid excessive sentencing disparities' while maintaining a level of flexibility. But two justices in that majority, swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor and then-Chief Justice William Rehnquist, are no longer on the court. … Now, the court will re-examine that decision for the first time and seek to clarify whether a presumption of 'reasonableness' given to sentencing guidelines actually implies that they're more 'mandatory' than 'advisory.'"

FBI Agent's Article Puts Murder Case At Risk. The AP (11/11) reports, "The man accused of killing a University of Vermont student from Arlington, Va., is asking a judge to dismiss the charges because an FBI agent wrote a newspaper opinion piece about the case that referred to the suspect as 'evil,' a 'sexual predator' and a 'two-legged hyena.'" The AP continues, "In the opinion piece, which appeared Wednesday in the weekly newspaper Seven Days, the agent wrote anonymously and described his personal reaction during the search for the man accused of killing 21-year-old Michelle Gardner-Quinn. … David Sleigh, the attorney for suspect Brian Rooney, filed a motion Wednesday after the article appeared. He said the article made it impossible for Mr. Rooney to get a fair trial. … 'Agents of the state have deliberately disseminated highly inflammatory and prejudicial comments to the press,' Mr. Sleigh said in a three-page motion." The AP adds, "Mr. Rooney has pleaded not guilty to a charge of aggravated murder for the Oct. 7 abduction, assault and killing of Miss Gardner-Quinn after the two met by chance in downtown Burlington. … If convicted, Mr. Rooney, 36, of Richmond, Vt., could be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole."

Judge Declares Mistrial In Online Fraud Case. The Washington Post (11/11, D01, Johnson) reports, "A federal judge declared a mistrial in the fraud case against former PurchasePro Inc. chief executive Charles E. Johnson Jr. after his attorney successfully petitioned to withdraw nearly three weeks into the case, according to court records." The Post continues, "The prosecution of Johnson, an entrepreneur who came under government scrutiny for engaging in questionable last-minute advertising deals with America Online Inc. during the Internet boom, will be separated from the case against three other defendants in the Alexandria trial. Johnson will be tried separately, U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. ruled Thursday." The Post adds, "The exact reasons for the mistrial remained under court seal, although two sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the judge's order said they pertained to allegations of misconduct by Johnson, 45, a tough-talking former college basketball player. Johnson, who is known by his nickname 'Junior,' did not return calls to his cellphone yesterday. … In opening statements to the jury last month, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles F. Connolly accused Johnson of directing subordinates to destroy e-mail messages, computers and other evidence and suggested that Johnson, whose father was a policeman and former security company operator, had threatened employees who failed to bend to his will." The Post notes, "Johnson denied the charges against him and argued that he put his wealth and his health on the line in an ill-fated attempt to save PurchasePro, his Las Vegas software company. … Johnson's former lawyer, onetime Washington federal prosecutor Preston Burton, yesterday declined to comment, citing ethical strictures. Burton, of the law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, appeared in court Thursday morning for sealed proceedings related to the mistrial, according to the court docket."

Former Congressional Aide Discusses Posting Foley Emails On Blog. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Levey, 850K) reports former congressional aide Lane Hudson "had no idea he would bring down a congressman when he sat in his living room and turned on his laptop one Sunday morning nearly seven weeks ago." Lane, "who is gay, had been railing for weeks on his anonymous blog against congressmen who sexually preyed on young people. That day in late September, he decided to post a series of suggestive e-mail exchanges between Rep. Mark Foley and a male former congressional page." Hudson said, "I thought, 'Here we go. Let's see what happens.'" The Times adds, "Within days, he had his answer. Foley, a six-term Florida Republican, resigned in disgrace. And Hudson had launched the biggest Washington sex scandal since Monica S. Lewinsky." Hudson "remained anonymous throughout the fall as the scandal raged and GOP leaders complained of a Democratic conspiracy. Then two weeks ago, he was unmasked by bloggers, who identified him as an organizer for a national gay rights group; Hudson was fired." In an interview, Hudson "fiercely denied a preelection plot. Rather, he said, he was driven by genuine anger at a corrupt environment that protected the powerful on Capitol Hill." Hudson said, "It's the Washington culture that allowed this to happen. Now we know the FBI, a host of media organizations, Republican leadership — all were in possession of this same information. And no one did anything about it." Eleven years earlier, "as an 18-year-old congressional intern, Hudson had been approached by Foley at a Capitol Hill bar, Hudson said. The congressman asked Hudson for his e-mail address and started sending him invitations to drinks and meals."

Four Plead Guilty To Northwest ALF, ELF Arsons. The Oregonian (11/10, Denson) reported that on Thursday, Jonathan Paul, "a leading voice in the nation's radical movement to protect whales, wild horses and wilderness areas, was one of four people to plead guilty to conspiracy for their roles in a five-year campaign of sabotage in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado. The four were snagged by the largest investigation of eco-sabotage in U.S. history, an 18-crime inquiry into arsons and vandalism the government dubbed 'Operation Backfire.'" The Oregonian notes that ALF and ELF "are characterized by the FBI as the nation's leading domestic terrorist threats. … At a press conference in Portland, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut and Robert Jordan, the FBI's special agent in charge for Oregon, declared victory. 'These people claimed they did what they did to protect the environment,' Jordan said. 'Along the way, they destroyed more than $30 million worth of resources. They spent year after year using violence to try to intimidate you and your government into their twisted way of thinking.'"

The Seattle Times (11/10, Bernton) reports the pleas raised "the possibility that the Justice Department's largest-ever prosecution of ecosabotage will wrap up without a trial. Since the first arrests in December, the federal government in Washington and Oregon has obtained 12 guilty pleas," only California violin teacher Briana Waters "still is preparing for a trial" for allegedly "acting as a lookout in the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Urban Horticulture Center." The Times adds that Thursday's pleas "prompted Robert Jordan…to declare victory in a decadelong effort to track down and prosecute the stealthy arsonists of the ELF and ALF. … 'Instead of using reason and logic, they used fire bombs and destruction. Instead of using peaceful, lawful methods they used fears and threats,' Jordan said in Portland."

The Eugene Register-Guard (11/10, Bishop, Steves) reported, "In public statements, two of the defendants expressed their regret for crimes they now consider misguided deeds done out of deep devotion to environmental causes." Defendants Daniel Gerard McGowan, Nathan Fraser Block and Joyanna Zacher "may get eight-year prison terms," while Paul "may get a five-year term." At the Thursday press conference, "Immergut called the four guilty pleas the conclusion of 'the largest case of domestic terrorism in United States history,' later amending that to say it was the largest case of eco-terrorism." The Register-Guard noted, "Jordan disputed a reporter's assertion that it took a long time to solve the case. He noted how the cell took extreme measures to avoid leaving behind any DNA or fingerprint evidence. He also noted their deep commitment to secrecy."

The AP (11/10, Barnard) noted Immergut said the pleas "have effectively dismantled the Northwest cells of the organizations operating loosely under the mantles of ALF and ELF," and Jordan declared, "Today we can declare victory in that fight." The Medford Mail Tribune (11/10, Fattig) reported, "Two months ago, their defense attorneys had asked the federal government whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency had been used against the defendants. Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall denied the NSA surveillance was a factor in the investigation or the plea agreement," but "Amanda Lee, an attorney representing McGowan, said Thursday she believed it was a factor, given the timing of the plea agreements."

Wales Murder Material Witness Failed Polygraph About Gun Barrel. The Seattle Times (11/11, Carter, Miletich) reported, "A Bellevue gun collector questioned in the 2001 slaying of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales has failed an FBI polygraph test about whether he owned two gun barrels that were the same type as the one used in the shooting, his lawyer said Thursday" at a bail hearing. "Albert Kwan agreed to the polygraph test last month after he was indicted and jailed in a different case for illegal possession of a machine gun." US District Judge Thomas Zilly "released Kwan from custody on the condition that Kwan post a $250,000 bond. Zilly also ordered Kwan to wear a location monitor, not possess firearms, and surrender his Hong Kong, British and U.S. passports." The Times notes, "FBI agents do not believe Kwan shot Wales, but want to know if he provided the gun barrel to someone who did." The AP (11/11) also reported on the story, largely drawing from the Times article.

Former LAPD Spokesman Indicted On Child Sex Abuse Charges. The Los Angeles Times (11/10) reported, "Former Los Angeles police spokesman Roderick 'Rod' Bernsen was indicted Thursday on two felony counts of 'abusive sexual contact' stemming from an alleged incident with two 12-year-old boys in a cruise ship sauna." Bernsen "was arrested Oct. 7 after the boys told the FBI that he had tried to talk with them about sex and then touched one boy's penis with his toe and spanked another's bare buttocks, according to an affidavit." The Times added, "Bernsen's attorney, Alan Rubin, said his client was innocent."

Former LATimes Reporter Names Ovitz In Pellicano Suit. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Blankstein, Krikorian) reports, "A former Los Angeles Times reporter has alleged in a civil lawsuit that onetime Hollywood power broker Michael Ovitz participated with indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others to intimidate and threaten her." The Times continues, "The former reporter, Anita M. Busch, originally filed the civil lawsuit in 2004 in which she identified Pellicano, several of his associates and numerous unnamed defendants as responsible for an alleged campaign of 'threats, intimidation, harassment and invasion of privacy for the purpose of deterring ... and retaliating against [Busch] for investigating and writing articles about the entertainment business.' … An amendment to the civil complaint, filed Monday in Los Angeles Superior Court, states that one of those unnamed defendants — identified earlier as 'Doe 4' — is Ovitz, who co-founded one of Hollywood's best known talent agencies, Creative Artists Agency." The Times adds, "Beyond naming Ovitz, Busch's filing does not detail any alleged actions by Ovitz. … The suit says only that he is one of dozens of defendants who were involved in 'directing, organizing, commanding, employing and/or hiring individuals to engage in the unlawful and tortious conduct.' … In a brief statement, Ovitz's attorney, James Ellis, said: 'My client had nothing to do with this. It's unfortunate that Ms. Busch has chosen to involve him in this matter.' … Ovitz has previously acknowledged that his outside law firm hired Pellicano to assist in the defense of three lawsuits filed in 2002 against Artist Management Group, a second talent agency established by Ovitz. Pellicano was paid $75,000 for that work."

Microsoft Targets Piracy In Developing Countries. The Financial Times (11/11, Leahy) reports, "Microsoft needs to do more to crack the consumer market in developing countries, with piracy and affordability holding back sales in regions ranging from Asia and eastern Europe to Latin America, its chief executive told the FT." The Times continues, "Steve Ballmer said the group had launched initiatives such as XP StarterEdition, a Windows software package with reduced features, and Flexgo, a pay-as-you-go PC, but these had not yet signficantly penetrated the middle-income markets in countries such as India and China. … 'On a per-cent basis, it [emerging markets] is the most rapidly growing part of our business but it's still a relatively small percentage. We have two issues: number one is where are the PCs and number two is piracy rates are also high in so-called emerging markets,' Mr Ballmer said in an interview in Mumbai." The Times adds, "Microsoft declined to provide a breakdown of its revenue by region or product. But Mr Ballmer, in Mumbai on a three-day visit to India, said emerging markets globally accounted for roughly 20 per cent of its total business, excluding software sales to hardware vendors, Xbox and other revenue streams such as advertising. .. .Total revenue in the year ended June was $44.282bn. While this was growing rapidly, the company could do better to reach middle-income consumers in developing countries. The company has sold only about 1m copies of Windows XP Starter since it was first piloted in 2004, most of these through government-sponsored programmes."

CIVIL LAW:

US Settles Civil Case Against BetOnSports. The AP (11/11, Leonard) reports from St. Louis, "U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway reached a settlement with online gambling company BetOnSports PLC that permanently bars the London-based company from accepting any bets from the United States." The AP continues, "The lawsuit has been closely watched by the online gambling industry, which generates about $6 billion annually in the United States." The AP adds, "The settlement announced Thursday ends a massive civil case Hanaway filed this summer. It does not affect a criminal case still pending against several BetOnSports employees, including Chief Executive David Carruthers, who remains under house arrest in a St. Louis suburb. … Carruthers faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges. His case is scheduled to go to trial early next year. BetOnSports fired him soon after he was arrested in July. … Hanaway spokeswoman Jan Diltz said the U.S. Attorney's Office would not comment on the civil settlement because the criminal case is ongoing."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Probe Oregon Hospital Where "Cuckoo's Nest" Was Filmed. The AP (11/11) reports from Portland, OR, "Federal investigators are looking into patient care at the hospital made famous in the movie 'One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest,' where there have been reports of abuse, short staffing and overcrowding." The AP continues, "The Oregon State Hospital is one of the oldest and most dilapidated state mental institutions in the nation.

The movie was filmed there in 1975." The AP adds, "Justice Department officials are expected to visit the hospital next week. The department alerted Gov. Ted Kulongoski in June that it would investigate whether patients' constitutional rights were violated. … It's unclear how long the investigation could take. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she could not discuss the timeline or details of the investigation."

El Paso Task Force Targets Human Trafficking. The El Paso (TX) Times (11/11, Gilot) reports, "Photographs of men, women and children filled the screen. But they didn't tell the whole story." The Times continues, "A shy Chinese boy is pictured. He was forced to work in restaurants in El Paso and North Carolina. … A young woman poses on a stationary bike. She was lured into the sex trade from her native Uzbekistan. … Two middle-aged couples smile at the camera. The pair on the left were deaf and mute victims of human traffickers. On the right were the traffickers. … 'You have to look beneath the surface. You'll not know it when you see it,' Brandy Gardes, an assistant U.S. attorney in El Paso, told hundreds of law enforcement officers and social workers at a conference last month in El Paso." The Times adds, "Officials have called human trafficking one of the toughest crimes to tackle. … It is hard to identify and hard to prove. Victims are often too scared to speak out. And the public and juries have a hard time believing slavery still goes on in the United States. … The U.S. Department of State estimated that 18,000 to 20,000 people are trafficked into the United States each year and held by force or coercion for sexual slavery and forced labor. Between 2001 and 2005, the Justice Department prosecuted fewer than 150 alleged traffickers. … There are no figures for El Paso, but it was chosen by the Justice Department as the site of one of 18 new human-trafficking task forces in the nation as part of a far-reaching effort to bring the problem out of the shadows."

Video Shows Two LAPD Officers Beating Suspect. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Winton) reports, "Two Los Angeles police officers were under investigation today for allegedly beating a man during a videotaped arrest in Hollywood that LAPD Chief William J. Bratton called 'disturbing.'" The Times continues, "The video of the Aug. 11 incident, posted on the YouTube website, shows one of the officers holding down William Cardenas, 24, as the other officer places his knee on the man's throat and punches him in the face six times. … Cardenas, who is lying on his back, is heard yelling, 'I can't breathe!' … He was arrested on suspicion of using violence or threats to prevent an officer from performing his duty and was charged with two counts of resisting arrest, said LAPD Lt. Paul Vernon. … Cardenas remains in custody." The Times notes, "The tape was photographed by an unnamed neighbor who gave it to B. Kwaku Duren, a lawyer who represents Cardenas. … Bratton cautioned that the videotape only reflected a part of the struggle with Officers Alexander Schlegel and Patrick Farrell, who is seen punching Cardenas."

The Washington Post (11/11, A02, Geis, Harris) reports, "It was an uncomfortable echo of earlier Los Angeles Police Department scandals, including the videotaped Rodney King beating. The department, which operates under a federal consent decree, has instituted many reforms but has periodically suffered through police brutality embarrassments." The Post continues, "The lawyer for the suspect shown in the video said his client's experience shows little has changed. 'The Los Angeles Police Department needs to make those reforms real, because they have not been made real,' B. Kwaku Duren said at a news conference in front of police headquarters Friday. 'That video speaks for itself.'"

USA Today/AP (11/11) reports, "An FBI investigation prompted by video footage of a man being punched repeatedly in the face by police has demonstrated anew the power of the Internet sensation of the year, YouTube.com. … In addition to being a monumental time-waster around the office, YouTube could also become a tool for keeping police honest, some say." The AP continues, "This week, a clip on the post-it-yourself video website triggered a police-brutality investigation by the FBI. The footage shows the Aug. 11 arrest of alleged gang member William Cardenas, 24. Two Los Angeles officers can be seen holding him down on a Hollywood street; one punches him several times in the face before they are able to handcuff him. … The Los Angeles Police Department is also investigating the officers' conduct. … Cop Watch LA, a police watchdog group, posted the video on YouTube, said organizer Joaquin Cienfuegos. Cienfuegos said the video was shot by a neighbor of Cardenas with a cellphone camera. The neighbor gave it to Cardenas' family, who then gave it to Cop Watch, according to Cienfuegos." The AP notes, "In recent months, videos posted on YouTube have rocked political campaigns, brought fame — or infamy — to previously unknown talents and cast unwanted attention on the gaffes of the famous. YouTube and similar video sites are also increasingly becoming repositories for videos that purport to detail wrongdoing by police."

Texas Landscapers Cause Dispute By Refusing To Do Business With Gay Clients. The New York Times (11/11, Blumenthal) reports from Houston, "Last month, a local landscaping firm prompted a furor here by telling a gay couple in an e-mail message, 'We choose not to work for homosexuals.' … The message quickly made its way around the Internet, and the company, Garden Guy Inc., was bombarded with threats and hate mail. But since then, the company's owners say they have gained far more business than they have lost." The Times continues, "In an interview Friday, Sabrina Farber, 34, co-owner of the company with her husband, Todd, 37, said the company had picked up $40,000 in new business in the past two weeks, while losing only two clients worth about $500 each a year. … 'I'm not saying that to gloat,' said Mrs. Farber, who described the frenzy as ugly and emotionally draining. But she said they would not do it differently and deserved credit for not masking their refusal with excuses. … 'Why can't people handle it when you say the truth?' she said." The Times adds, "One of the two gay clients, Gary Lackey, said, 'We're hoping things would die down' and declined to comment further in a telephone interview. The other member of the couple, Michael Lord, did not return a call. … The law appears to be on the Farbers' side, said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas. … 'The federal law of public accommodations says if you hang out a shingle or open your door you don't get to say, "Only to whites,"' Ms. Graybill said. But sexual orientation is not protected. And while some localities, like Seattle, have adopted ordinances extending antidiscrimination protection to gay men and lesbians, she said, Houston has not."

Massachusetts Legislature Apparently Kills Same-Sex Marriage Ban. The New York Times (11/10, Belluck, 1.16M) reports Massachusetts lawmakers, in "the only state where same-sex marriage is legal, dealt what appeared to be a fatal blow Thursday to a proposed constitutional amendment to ban it." In a "flurry of strategic maneuvering, supporters of same-sex marriage managed to persuade enough legislators to vote to recess a constitutional convention until the afternoon of Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session." On that day, "lawmakers and advocates on both sides said, it appeared likely that the legislature would adjourn without voting on the measure, killing it." Gov. Mitt Romney "said the vote was a 'triumph of arrogance over democracy.' He said that he would 'explore any alternatives' to try to force a vote, but that 'my options are limited.'"

NYTimes, LATimes Concerned About SCOTUS Actions On Abortion. The New York Times (11/11, A14) editorializes, "The Supreme Court unnecessarily returned to the politically charged area of abortion this week, hearing arguments in a case testing some of the core principles of Roe v. Wade and the court's own credibility as an institution removed from politics. At issue, once again, is a deceptively broad ban on so-called partial-birth abortions." Justice Anthony Kennedy "is likely to decide this case. In 2000, Justice Kennedy joined those who would have upheld the Nebraska law. But at oral argument his questions suggested that he may take issue with Congress's assertion that the ban would not put women's health at risk -- an encouraging sign. Even justices who oppose abortion rights need to be concerned about that. They also need to worry about how the court will look if the recent change in its membership produces a starkly different result on an issue so vital to women's privacy and health."

The Los Angeles Times (11/11) editorializes, "Anti-abortionists have been craving a test case to put before the U.S. Supreme Court, in hopes of overturning Roe vs. Wade -- and thought they had it when the South Dakota Legislature passed a ban on abortion. Instead of challenging the law in court, though, pro-choice forces cleverly put the matter to a popular referendum. Even in that socially conservative, anti-abortion state, a decisive majority Tuesday preserved a woman's right to choose. … The voters have spoken resoundingly on abortion and the right to privacy. Those who want to turn government into Big Brother need to heed the message and give it up."

Law Professor Says Election Officials, Not Machines, Are The Problem. In a New York Times (11/11, A15) op-ed, Loyola Law School's Richard Hasen writes, "As election mishaps hindered voting on Tuesday from Cleveland to Denver, some people were already calling for giving up on the new electronic voting machines, which were themselves put in place to prevent another hanging-chad fiasco like that in Florida in 2000. … But this reaction to the bugs and glitches shows that Americans have not learned the right lesson from 2000: the problem is not with the technology of running our elections but rather with the people running them." The US "should join the rest of the world's advanced democracies and put nonpartisan professionals in charge."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ's Antitrust Suit Against NAR Targets 36 Markets. Inman News (11/11, Roberts) reports, "The Justice Department, as a part of its antitrust lawsuit against the 1.3-million-member National Association of Realtors trade group, has identified 36 market areas in which association policy for the online display and sharing of property information has allegedly caused anticompetitive effects, said Laurie Janik, general counsel for the group." Inman continues, "Filed last year, the lawsuit charges that the Realtor group's policies are illegal because they could potentially be used to squelch real estate competition, while the Realtor group has maintained that its policies provide for ample online information about properties. … 'They've identified 36 markets to us where they intend to prove anticompetitive effects,' Janik said Friday during a meeting for multiple listing service executives at a Realtor conference in New Orleans. 'We'll be waiting to see just what types of proof they plan to advance from those marketplaces.'" Inman notes, "Lawyers for the association, meanwhile, are conducting interviews with MLS officials in those markets to gather information for its defense. … Issues of data protection and control are at the core of the legal scuffle, as some brokers have pushed the association to better serve their interests by helping to safeguard control over property information that they say is a vital part of their business. … A major contention in the Justice Department lawsuit is on a policy provision that allows brokers who are members of Realtor-affiliated MLSs to block their listings from display on other MLS participants' Web sites, Janik said. 'We believe it's a very justifiable position, but the government seems to think that once a broker has decided to participate in the MLS then you also must allow your listings to be displayed on a competitors' ... Web site.' … Also, Justice Department officials object to a Realtor policy which requires that Realtor MLS participants must 'actually be engaged in listing or selling the type of property that's listed in the MLS,' while the former policy simply required that an MLS participant possess a broker's license."

Motorola To Purchase BlackBerry Rival. The AP (11/11, Press) reports, "The cellphone maker Motorola said Friday that it would buy Good Technology, a rival of BlackBerry, in a deal that should improve the prospects for its new Q hand-held device. … The financial terms were not disclosed." The AP continues, "The deal underscores efforts by Motorola, a leading maker of handsets, to sell more mobile devices that offer access to e-mail and other business-oriented services. In September, it agreed to spend $3.9 billion to buy Symbol Technologies, a maker of portable bar code scanners and customized hand-held computers. … Motorola said Good Technology, a privately held firm based in Santa Clara, Calif., that provides computing software and services for the Treo and other smartphones, will join its mobile devices unit. That unit has flourished in the last couple of years thanks to the success of the Razr phones." The AP adds, "Ron Garriques, president of the mobile devices division, said Good Technology's services, products and customers all complement its business. … 'This acquisition will continue to strengthen Motorola as a leading provider of mobility devices and solutions both for enterprise customers and consumers,' he said. .. .Hoping to come up with another Razr-like blockbuster in the fast-growing smartphone category, Motorola introduced a Qwerty hand-held device, called the Q, this year to compete against the BlackBerry and the Treo, which also runs on Good Technology software."

Newspaper Mergers Spotlight Cultural Differences. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A1, Ellison) reports, "When Chicago-based Tribune Co. acquired Times Mirror six years ago, it was more than an $8 billion fusion of two media companies. The merger also threw together two competing and incompatible cultures, each rooted in the traditions of their respective flagship newspapers, the Chicago Tribune and the Los Angeles Times." The Journal continues, "Some Tribune executives think the Times is arrogant, spoiled and overstaffed, a paper with global ambitions that has ignored local readers. Some Times people consider the Chicago Tribune an inferior, provincial product. Times denizens, proud of their city's position as the nation's second largest, see the paper's owners as bean counters in business suits. Tribune thinks its Californian charges are too slick and prefer to take pride in the company's Chicago roots." The Journal adds, "Unlike many battles between journalists and corporate bosses, which focus largely on spending, this one is also driven by fundamental differences between the philosophies of the two newspapers. … Across the country, once-profitable newspapers are being ravaged by the Internet in a historic industry shift. The traditionally high margins of newspaper publishers have been squeezed as both readers and advertisers abandon the medium. Investor confidence has plummeted over the industry's uncertain growth prospects. … Even in 2000, some executives saw trouble looming. The solution dreamed up by Tribune and Times Mirror was to merge their operations in a way that allowed them to sell combined packages of newspaper and local TV advertising in the same big, urban markets. The strategy was a dud. In September, Tribune said it was exploring various strategic options, which may include a sale of the entire company or some of its divisions."

ENVIRONMENT:

US Seeks To Fine Florida Man Over Pollution Silence. The St Petersburg (FL) Times (11/11, Weimar) reports, "A Dover (FL) business owner is facing fines of $32,500 a day for failing to comply with requests from the Environmental Protection Agency." The Times continues, "In a criminal complaint, the federal agency accuses Hugh Johnson, owner of Johnson's Oil Service, of ignoring requests for information regarding his alleged involvement in the pollution of what became a Superfund site in Polk County. … The site, 5015 State Road 60 in Mulberry, is the former home of Sadler Drum, which specialized in the washing and reconditioning of chemical drums. The owner abandoned the site in 1997, leaving hundreds of empty containers." The Times adds, "The EPA investigated the site and discovered the presence of dozens of dangerous chemicals. The cleanup cost more than $900,000 and 65 potentially responsible parties were identified, including Johnson, according to court documents. … The EPA sent a registered letter to Johnson in June 2003, requesting more information. Johnson signed for the letter but did not respond, the court documents said. … In June 2006, the Justice Department intervened, sending notice to Johnson he must respond or face judicial enforcement. Johnson did not respond."

DOJ Suit Claims Virginia Family Damaged Wetlands. The Virginian-Pilot (11/11, Harper) reports, "The Justice Department has filed a federal lawsuit seeking fines and restoration of nontidal wetlands in southern Chesapeake that the government says were damaged in 1999. … But the property owners, the Bosher family, said this week that they did nothing wrong and that they were cleaning out existing ditches on their farmland at the time." The V-P continues, "Family members say they have since spent thousands of dollars trying to clarify the issue with federal regulators, to no avail. … 'It's been the most expensive, prolonged and painful experience,' said Kitty Bosher, president and secretary of Sea Bay Development Corp. and Green Sea Farms LLC." The V-P adds, "The two entities, both family-run, are listed as the owners of the site in question, known as the Bosher tract. At 1,560 acres, the tract is one of the largest undeveloped properties left in southern Chesapeake. … The case is another in a series of federal actions in recent years intended to protect nontidal wetlands - low-lying fields and forests found throughout Hampton Roads that filter pollutants, control flooding and provide wildlife habitat."

Global Energy Demand Expected To Jump In Current Quarter. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A4, Swartz) reports the International Energy Agency said global energy demand "will jump in the fourth quarter because of U.S. consumption, while demand" for OPEC-produced oil "will rise to its highest level in four years." The IEA said Friday that global oil demand "will rise 2.6% from the year-earlier period, when demand was crimped by mild weather and the impact of Hurricane Katrina in the U.S., the world's biggest energy market."

Offshore Drilling Bill Appears Dead Under Democrats. The New York Times (11/11, C3, Krauss) reports that legislation that would "open the seas off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to oil and gas drilling" appears to be dead in the wake of Democratic victories this week.

IMMIGRATION:

House To "Revisit" Border Fence Under Democrats. The Washington Times (11/11, Waterman) reports, "Democrats will look again at the legislation mandating 698 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border and might seek to scrap the plan altogether when they take control of Congress next year." Rep. Bennie Thompson, who will head the Homeland Security Committee, "told reporters this week that he expected to 'revisit' the issue."

DOJ_NMG_0093728

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush, Pelosi Vow To Seek Common Ground.

President Bush and House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi met at the White House yesterday. Their vows to seek a bipartisan path are receiving largely positive media coverage. As McClatchy (11/10, Hutcheson) reports, the "bipartisan pledges of cooperation generated considerable skepticism in Washington, a city accustomed to partisan warfare." But Bush "has reached effectively across party lines before, both as governor of Texas and early in his presidency. … Some Democrats who have worked with Bush in the past said Tuesday's elections brought out a side of him that's been missing in recent years. Former Texas state Rep. Paul Sadler, a Democrat who considers Bush a friend, said he was puzzled by the style the president adopted when he moved to Washington in 2000. 'It's almost like he was hijacked,' Sadler said."

The New York Times (11/10, Stolberg, 1.16M), under the headline "On A Shifting Playing Field, A Sense Of Rising Expectations," reports, "It might seem like the…Bush -- or maybe the old one, returning to his Texas governor roots. But, Republicans say, it is really just the same…Bush -- the first M.B.A. president, pragmatic enough to recognize, as he himself might say, that he must adjust his tactics to changing conditions on the ground. 'You're seeing the George Bush who has always been adept at playing the hand he is dealt,' said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist with close ties to the White House." Vin Weber, "a Republican former congressman and lobbyist, put it this way: 'I've never thought that George Bush was a rigid ideologue; I've never thought that he was a hardened partisan. He is a businessman first, and in business you don't spend a lot of time crying about changed circumstances. You figure out quickly how to adapt, and that's what he's doing.'"

The AP (11/10, Kellman) says "both Bush and the Democrats have reasons to mend fences. In the twilight of a wartime presidency, Bush could polish his legacy by reviving his uniter-not-a-divider campaign promise of 2000." Meanwhile, "lawmakers in both parties, some of them beginning what amounts to a two-year job interview for the presidency, also have an incentive to move away from confrontation politics. If they need a reminder, they might look at the 61 percent disapproval rating Congress received in the exit polls this week."

The Washington Post (11/10, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) says that "despite deep philosophical differences and sharp election-year rhetoric from both sides, the White House and congressional Democrats may share some interest in finding common ground on such issues as overhauling the immigration system, education and energy, according to lawmakers and administration officials." Democratic leaders "seem anxious to show they can deliver as a governing party after years in opposition, while Bush is aware that his final two years will be bereft of any significant initiative unless he can work with the party he demonized on the campaign trail." One area where they could be progress in immigration. The New York Times (11/10, Archibold, 1.16M) notes "Democrats will take over leadership of committees in the House and the Senate that could guide new immigration legislation," while Bush and Pelosi "have cast changes to immigration laws as an opportunity to demonstrate bipartisan bonhomie. … Some immigration experts, however, predict a more arduous debate. Although conservative Republicans have led the opposition to accommodating some illegal immigrants, a handful of the newly elected Democrats, including Claire A. McCaskill of Missouri and Jim Webb of Virginia in the Senate, campaigned promising a tough approach to illegal immigration."

Hope for bipartisanship also extends to the relationship between Bush and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid. In a largely complimentary profile of Reid, the New York Times (11/10, Leibovich, 1.16M) says "people who know" him "say he is much more suited to work with Republicans than his partisan reputation would suggest."

ABC World News (11/9, story 2, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) called the meeting "one of the more uplifting traditions of our democracy: political combatants coming together after a bitter election." ABC (Raddatz) added, "These are two people who have said very nasty things to one another in the past. But today, it was all smiles. The President offered his congratulations to Speaker Pelosi after a one-hour lunch today. And both said they are ready to face the challenges the country faces together." Bush: "We don't agree on every issue. But we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country, and that we will do our very best to address big problems." Pelosi: "I look forward to working in a confidence-building way with the President, recognizing that we have our differences. And will debate them. And that is what our founders intended." ABC

(Raddatz) continued, "Differences is putting it mildly." Pelosi was shown saying, "What he says is not in touch with reality," and later, ""The President has been incompetent." And Bush was shown saying, "The Speaker would be a Congresswoman who said catching Osama bin Laden would not make America any safer."

The CBS Evening News (11/9, story 3, 2:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) said the two leader made their statements yesterday "through strained smiles." Bush: "Well, we're going to work together to address those changes in a constructive way." Pelosi: "We've made history. Now we have to make progress, and I look forward to working with the President to do just that." CBS added, "This was a day of images designed to project unity and continuity, to insurgents in Iraq who might take the election results as a sign of reduced US commitment there, and to the same Democrats the President's been slamming as soft on terror. Mr. Bush now says he welcomes their ideas on Iraq." Bush: "Whatever party we come from, we all have a responsibility to ensure that these troops have the resources and support they need to prevail. I'm open to any idea or suggestion that will help us achieve our goals of defeating the terrorists and ensuring that Iraq's Democratic government succeeds."

NBC Nightly News (11/9, lead story, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Voters made clear their desire for middle ground in Washington. One day after ousting Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld, the President appeared with his cabinet soliciting help from the Democrats on the war. … Quite a change in tone for the President."

The AP (11/10, Loven) calls Bush and Pelosi "perhaps the biggest loser and winner on Election Day," and notes they "pledged over lunch Thursday to bury the hatchet and cooperate. When possible. At the White House, where Bush had invited Pelosi for lunch, presidential aides joked that there was no crow on the menu for Bush to eat." Bush "ate a little anyway, and he saluted Pelosi, not only as Tuesday's victor but as the first woman who will ascend to the position of House speaker, next in line to the presidency after the vice president." Pelosi, "like Bush all smiles," said, "We both extended the hand of friendship, of partnership to solve the problems facing our country." She "was accompanied by Rep. Steny Hoyer, the House's second-ranking Democrat. Bush was accompanied by a stony-faced Vice President Dick Cheney."

The Washington Times (11/10, Curl, 88K) also notes Bush's "new conciliatory stance is a far cry from what the president said repeatedly on the campaign trail." But the President, "humbled by losing Republican control of both the House and the Senate, struck a new tone of bipartisanship yesterday after a morning meeting with his Cabinet." The Financial Times (11/10, Sevastopulo, Luce, Kirchgaessner) runs a similar report under the headline "Bush In Overture To Democrats."

"Symbolism" Seen In Bush's Omission Of Cheney. The New York Times (11/10, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports, "It was no doubt inadvertent, but it was hard not to find some symbolism in the moment Thursday in the Oval Office when…Bush seemed to forget that…Cheney was in the room. … 'Both of us recognize -- all three of us,' Mr. Bush said, apparently referring to himself, Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer, 'recognize that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country.'" The Times adds, "The omission of Mr. Cheney, the embodiment of the administration's approach to national security, raised an intriguing question. As Mr. Bush grapples with the loss of his Republican majority in Congress, how far will he go to reinvent himself, and who -- or what philosophies -- is he willing to jettison along the way?" The Times also reports that "there were questions on Thursday about the future of Karl Rove, the political strategist whose divide-and-conquer tactics failed on Tuesday for the first time. Asked what role Mr. Rove would play now, Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, offered little insight. 'That's a good process question,' Mr. Snow said, 'for which I don't have an answer.'"

Bush, Democrats Clash On Bolton, Wiretapping Program. But not all was bipartisanship in Washington yesterday. As the Financial Times (11/10, Sevastopulo) reports Bush "asked Congress to approve John Bolton, his controversial ambassador to the United Nations, for a second term, in the face of opposition from key Democrats. The move comes in spite of conciliatory rhetoric from Mr. Bush on Thursday that he wants to work with Democrats after they routed the Republicans in the congressional mid-term elections." White House spokesman Tony Snow Thursday said Bush "discussed his desire to keep Mr. Bolton at the UN at a breakfast meeting on Thursday with Republican congressional leaders." However, "White House hopes of keeping Mr. Bolton in New York were immediately dashed when Lincoln Chafee, a Rhode Island Republican member of the foreign relations committee who just lost his seat in Tuesday's elections, said he would oppose Mr. Bolton. Joseph Biden, the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee in January, on Thursday said there was no point for the committee to even discuss the appointment." Similarly, NBC Nightly News (11/9, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) noted in a segment on the Democrats' electoral victory, "There are signals tonight from Capitol Hill, the top Democrats will block the re-nomination, really, of John Bolton, the UN Ambassador. He's opposed by lame duck Republican Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island."

The AP (11/10, Flaherty) says Bolton's "prospects for staying on as UN ambassador essentially died Thursday," in "another blow to…Bush." The Washington Post (11/10, A3, Linzer, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (11/10, Farley, 850K) also report the story. And the Washington Times (11/10, Dinan, 88K) notes White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "said it's too early to talk about whether the White House might give Mr. Bolton another recess appointment."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (11/10, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports the Administration "escalated its defense of the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program on Thursday, even as Democrats in Congress vowed to investigate the program aggressively once they assume power." Bush "urged that during the lame-duck session that starts next week, Congress pass a bill effectively authorizing the program. And in San Francisco, the Justice Department told a federal court that public scrutiny of the operation risked 'exceptionally grave harm to national security.'" Democrats, meanwhile, "sounded impatient to begin getting more answers after what they characterized as 11 months of stonewalling by the administration since the program was publicly disclosed last December. 'This administration first hid its domestic spying program from Congress and Americans for years, and when it was discovered, has ducked and weaved on its legal justifications,' said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who is to become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee when Democrats take control."

On ABC World News (11/9, lead story, 2:50, Tapper, 8.78M), Cokie Roberts said, "Some of the people who are taking over Senate committees are no friends of George Bush. And they've made that very clear on several occasions." Leahy, for example, is described as "one of the toughest critics of the President's choices for judges and his controversial NSA wiretap program."

NBC Nightly News (11/9, story 2, 2:30, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "Congressman Henry Waxman is one of the Democrat's most aggressive investigators, targeting Iraq contractors, especially Halliburton. And as chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, he'll have vast new resources and the power to subpoena witnesses."

In an editorial, the New York Times (11/10, 1.16M) was quick to criticize Bush for putting "bipartisanship on hold." After his statements in regard to bipartisanship, the Times said, "without missing a beat…Bush made it clear that, for now, his idea of how to 'put the elections behind us' is to use the Republicans' last two months in control of Congress to try to push through one of the worst ideas his administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have come up with: a bill that would legalize his illegal wiretapping program and gut the law that limits a president's ability to abuse his power in this way." Bush's priorities for the lame duck session of Congress "included one worthy but hardly urgent idea (getting Vietnam into the World Trade Organization) and a series of ideas ranging from bad to truly awful that Mr. Bush has been unable to get through Congress and hopes to ram through in the Republicans' last weeks." The Bolton vote, adds the Times, "can easily wait for the new Congress, and should."

McCaskill Would Vote To Confirm Bolton. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (11/9, Matthews) if the Senate should confirm John Bolton's nomination to be US ambassador to the UN, Sen.-elect Claire McCaskill said, "Yes, probably. I haven't had a chance to review all of Mr. Bolton's record. But I'm a believer that the President has certain picks that he's entitled to, as long as I'm convinced that they are serious about beginning work on diplomacy. Obviously, that's been kind of AWOL in this administration, that emphasis on building alliances. Now is the time to remain committed to the United Nations, not to withdraw. I would want to get those assurances from Mr. Bolton."

Democrats Prepare To Launch Investigations. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Schmidt, Simon, 850K), in a report titled "Democrats Are Set To Subpoena," reports Democratic "Rep. Ike Skelton knows what he will do in one of his first acts as chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the Democratic-led House: resurrect the subcommittee on oversight and investigations. The panel was disbanded by the Republicans after they won control of Congress in 1994." Now, Skelton "intends to use it as a forum to probe Pentagon spending and the Bush administration's conduct of the Iraq war." The Times adds, "With control of every committee in Congress starting in January, the new majority will inherit broad powers to subpoena and investigate. And that is expected to translate into wide-ranging and contentious hearings."

Meanwhile, under the headline "Democrats Poised To Flex New Muscles," the Wall Street Journal (11/10, Dreazen, Solomon, Block, 2.04M) reports "the Democrats' sweep of the House and the Senate gives the party powerful tools for probing certain controversies of the Bush administration's years in office, from its use of faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq to its effort to rebuild New Orleans." In the Senate, "the likely new Intelligence Committee chairman, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, says he will complete an investigation into the White House's case for invading Iraq that Republicans were accused of stalling. Michigan Sen. Carl Levin is in line to take over the most powerful congressional oversight body, the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which routinely sends staffers to Iraq and other overseas countries." Levin "has previously promised to conduct tougher oversight of the administration's use of no-bid contracting in Iraq, where the $21.8 billion U.S.-led rebuilding effort is winding down without having restored prewar levels of water or electricity." In the House, Rep. Bennie Thompson, "expected to take over the House Committee on Homeland Security, is promising to haul Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff before the panel to face questions on issues ranging from the no-bid contracts awarded after Hurricane Katrina to the number of vacancies in the department's senior management."

The New York Times (11/10, Hulse, 1.16M) says and in the Senate, "there are pronounced ideological differences between the incoming leaders and those they will be replacing, as well as other lingering issues." On the Intelligence Committee, Rockefeller "has feuded with Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican chairman, over Mr. Roberts' reluctance to challenge the administration's handling of intelligence preceding the Iraq war." And "in what could be the biggest policy divide on the panels, Senator Barbara Boxer, the liberal California Democrat and environmental advocate, is in line to take control of the Environment and Public Works Committee from Senator James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, who has disputed the existence of global warming."

USA Today (11/10, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Norman Ornstein, "co-author of The Broken Branch, a book about Congress, predicts 'double-barreled investigations' of Iraq war contracts and the conduct of the war, with House and Senate Democrats 'calling in generals left and right' to testify. 'That's a nasty thing for a president to have to deal with,' he says." In the Washington Post (11/10, 690K), columnist Eugene Robinson says "Democrats were restrained during the campaign, which was smart. But now it's time for them to ask those hard questions -- and use their new power to compel answers. Even if they have to be unfashionably partisan about it."

Waxman Weighing Where To Start On Probes Of Bush Administration. The AP (11/10, Werner) reports Rep. Henry Waxman, "who will investigate the Bush administration's running of the government," says there are "so many areas of possible wrongdoing that his biggest problem will be deciding which ones to pursue." Addressing the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, he ticked off "the response to Hurricane Katrina, government contracting in Iraq and on homeland security, political interference in regulatory decisions by the Environmental Protection Agency and the Food and Drug Administration, and accusations of war profiteering." Waxman said, "I'm going to have an interesting time because the Government Reform Committee has jurisdiction over everything. The most difficult thing will be to pick and choose."

Democrats To Seek Additional Domestic Security Spending. USA Today (11/10, Frank, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "Democrats say they will use their majority in Congress to strengthen domestic security by putting millions of dollars into technology at airports and ports and increasing government oversight." But "they also may push policies that aviation officials say could cripple the industry, such as requiring screening of all cargo before it's put on passenger planes." House Democrats "made domestic security a centerpiece of their campaign this year and vowed to fulfill all the 9/11 Commission's recommendations. 'Real security' is the first of six policies Democrats will push when they take control of Congress in January, according to a manifesto they recently published to highlight differences with Republicans."

Dingell Agenda Includes Fuel Efficiency, Health Care Costs. USA Today (11/10, Healy, 2.27M) reports conventional wisdom "says that Democrats, who will control both houses of Congress next year, will somehow cut America's dependence on oil, especially imported, and trim the average American's fuel bill." Dingell says he "wants to cut the U.S. oil habit, promising the committee's help in 'making the United States energy-independent.'" At the same time, "he must represent the interests of the Michigan-based auto industry. Energy-conservation initiatives can cost automakers hundreds of millions of dollars for research and development of fuel-efficiency hardware and software for which new car buyers won't pay extra." Dingell is "not eager to force automakers to improve fuel economy by boosting what's known as CAFE, for corporate average fuel economy." Fuel economy standards, "he said, 'can be addressed very well, automobile or light trucks, within the framework of existing law,' which 'gives an awful lot of freedom to the administration' to adjust the standards to keep up with improving technology." USA adds Dingell is "passionate about overhauling health care by getting cheaper generic dugs to market faster; giving the government the authority to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies; stopping what he says are 'almost certain overpayments' to health insurance companies; and regulating dietary supplements, which, he says, 'are killing people.' He wouldn't name the supplements he considers dangerous."

WPost Urges Democrats To Tackle Ethics Reform First. The Washington Post (11/10, 690K) editorializes, "One of the loudest messages from Tuesday's elections was disgust with the way Washington does business. In exit polls, 42 percent of voters said corruption and scandals in government were extremely important in their decisions -- a greater share than for the war in Iraq, terrorism or the economy. House Democrats have vowed to quickly adopt new ethics rules; their package is good but could be improved. Senate Democrats, who, after yesterday's gracious concession by Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), will control the chamber, say they too have heard the voters' demand for change." The Post urges Congress to fulfill their reform vows before other priorities, adding that "after changing ethics rules, the new Congress needs to pass the lobbying reform legislation that its predecessor neglected to its peril."

Congress Urged To Take Up "Family Friendly" Measures. In a New York Times op-ed (11/10), author Judith Warner says, "While the excitement over Nancy Pelosi, most likely to be our first female speaker of the House, is still fresh, and while those of us who care about these things are still bubbling over the election of the highest number of women to Congress in history, I'd like to issue a challenge: Ladies, step up to the plate on behalf of the rest of America's women — and their families." For "years now, there have been murmurings — and more — from various corners of Congress in favor of change. Representative Lynn Woolsey's Balancing Act bill, which calls for a wide array of measures to reduce the stresses on working families, has been languishing for years. Senators Christopher Dodd and Ted Kennedy have gestured toward legislation on paid family leave and guaranteed sick leave. There was even a much-overlooked bill introduced in the Senate by Hillary Clinton this summer (and in the House by Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut) to provide low-income parents with subsidies to stay at home and care for their infants themselves. It's time to light a fire under these kinds of initiatives."

Democrats Planning Broad Economic Agenda. ABC World News (11/10, story 2, 2:10, Stark) took a look at what economic initiatives might come from the Democrats, with the party bringing "an ambitious agenda on economic issues that could affect the wallets of millions of Americans. If you're an hourly wage worker, there's a good chance you're in for a raise. Democrats want to raise minimum the wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour, which could ripple through to higher wages for those who make more than the minimum, too. … If you're a student or parent trying to pay for college, lower student loan rates could also be coming. Democrats say their goal is to cut federal loan rates from 6.8% to 3.4% interest. … For seniors, and possibly anyone who takes prescription drugs, lower drug costs are high on the agenda. Democrats want to rewrite the Medicare reform bill to let the government negotiate lower prescription drug prices, but face a tough battle."

Democrats Vow To Make AMT Key Budget Issue. The Washington Post (11/11, Montgomery) reports on its front page that Democrats are vowing to "make the alternative minimum tax a centerpiece of next year's budget debate, saying the levy threatens to unfairly increase tax bills for millions of middle-class families by the end of the decade." The "complex and expensive tax…is expected to expand to more than 30 million taxpayers in 2010 from 3.8 million mostly well-off households in 2006."

Rubin Urges Democrats To Raise Taxes. As part of its lead story, ABC World News (11/10, lead story, 2:05, Raddatz) reported that "at least one major division was made clear" between the two parties, "over taxes. A powerful voice urging Democrats to call for tax increases to help bring down the deficit." Ex-Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin: "You can not solve the nation's fiscal problems without increased revenues." Raddatz: "The White House today rejected Rubin's suggestion." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow: "Tax increases are bad for the economy." The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A5, Solomon) reports on Rubin's remarks at the Economic Club of Washington, adding that "raising taxes is a message many Democratic lawmakers are unlikely to utter aloud -- at least for now."

WSJournal Says Minimum Wage Increase Would Hurt Disadvantaged. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A6) editorializes, "A hike in the national minimum wage seems all but certain to become one of the first fruits of the Democrats' victories this week. … It is implicit in the logic behind raising the minimum wage that if we squeeze employers just a little, they won't even notice. Another argument, this one made explicitly, is that jobs are destroyed, but the wage gains more than make up for the reduced number of jobs. But this is only true if it's not your job that is destroyed. If you are a young black male, you are slightly more likely than the general population to be paid minimum wage, but you are almost 10 times as likely not to have a job at all. And if you're unemployed, raising the minimum wage not only doesn't help you find a job; it probably hurts. Welcome to Speaker Pelosi's idea of progress." The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A5, Nassauer) also examines some of the issues and questions surrounding a minimum wage increase.

Democratic Wins Could Stymie Bush Free Trade Agenda. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A1, Hitt, King) reports on its front page that the new Democratic domination of Capitol Hill "is set to deliver a blow to President Bush's free-trade ambitions and could hamper impending trade deals both big and small. Democrats' stances against free trade helped build the party's success at the polls and could tip the balance on trade matters." But that "new dynamic could put a definitive end to the already troubled" Doha round effort to reduce tariffs and open markets.

The Financial Times (11/11, Luce, Remtulla) writes that many of the newly elected Democrats "are economic populists who are deeply suspicious of free trade and quick to blame China and other developing countries for the loss of US jobs." The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Hennessy-Fiske) reports, "One of the first battles could be over the president's authority to get trade deals approved quickly." Sen.-elect Rep. Sherrod Brown, "a foe of free trade while in the House," and a "slate of new lawmakers plan to block fast track unless it's amended to include protections for domestic and foreign workers."

In his Washington Post (11/11, A27) column, Harold Meyerson writes, "Looking at the Democrats who picked up formerly Republican House seats, Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch tallies 27 who defeated (or replaced resigning) free-trade Republicans and who campaigned against the kind of trade deals that Congress has ratified. The fair-trade 27 insist instead on deals that stress labor rights and environmental standards. … In the incoming Senate delegation, the contrast is even sharper. The Democratic pickups -- Missouri's Claire McCaskill, Montana's Jon Tester, Ohio's Sherrod Brown, Pennsylvania's Bob Casey, Rhode Island's Sheldon Whitehouse and Virginia's James Webb -- all unseated free-trade incumbents with campaigns that stressed the need to pay far greater attention to the downward leveling that globalization entails."

Unions Reemerge As Democrats Take Control. The New York Times (11/11, A13, Greenhouse) writes that the labor movement, which has been "on the outs" with Capitol Hill since 1994, is readying its comeback. Unions, "eager to be treated as an important force," have "worked overtime since Election Day reminding Democrats about all that organized labor did to help put them over the top, including spending more than $100 million and dispatching more than 100,000 volunteers to help get out the vote."

Choice For Intelligence Chair Seen As First Challenge For Pelosi. The New York Times (11/10, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "Her boss may want her gone, but Representative Jane Harman happens to think she is good at her job. And she has no intention of leaving it without a fight." Harman "argues that her role as the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee makes her the logical candidate to become chairman when the new Congress begins in January." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, "the party's leader and presumptive House speaker in the next Congress, has indicated she has other plans. The two women, both from California, have long had a frosty relationship, and Ms. Pelosi has been angry with Ms. Harman for not using her position on the Intelligence Committee to attack the Bush administration aggressively." Pelosi "has told colleagues she plans to replace Ms. Harman on the Intelligence Committee, possibly with Representative Alcee Hastings of Florida, although she has given no public indication of her choice for the post since the election." The Times adds, "Many Democrats are closely watching the decision for signs of two things: how the speaker-in-waiting will chart her party's course on national security issues and how she will handle her first postelection test in dealing with the often fractious Democratic caucus.

'This is the battle that nobody wanted,' one senior Democratic strategist said. 'For Nancy to start off her speakership with a fight is a great shame.'"

Pelosi-Reid Relationship Could Be Key To Democratic Success. The Washington Post (11/10, A12, Banington, Weisman, 690K) reports, "After two days of watching Rep. Nancy Pelosi hailed as a political pioneer and the toast of her party, Sen. Harry M. Reid joined her yesterday atop the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years thanks to a razor-thin election in Virginia. … The Democrats' success in the Bush presidency's final two years will depend largely on the compatibility and forcefulness of the two barely tested leaders, according to some lawmakers and political experts. Reid, a former boxer from Nevada, is a camera-averse Senate insider who has used rear-guard tactics to bedevil Senate Republicans on Social Security, nominations and other issues in recent years." Pelosi "is a wealthy San Franciscan who grew up in a Baltimore political family and now has reached the highest elected post of any American woman." Yesterday, Reid "echoed Pelosi's earlier assertion that Democrats will push an agenda to help middle-class families and reduce the deficit while also treating Republican lawmakers more generously than the GOP had treated Democrats during their years in the minority."

Reid Described As Able Legislator With An Eclectic Personality. Under the headline "Harry Reid, An Infighter With A Sharp Jab," the New York Times (11/10, Leibovich, 1.16M) profiles Senate Democratic Leader Harry Leader. In a generally positive feature, the Times reports Harry Reid "began Election Day with 50 situps and 80 push-ups (very red state of him) and 40 minutes of yoga (very blue state of him). … Just after 2 p.m., he finally heard some actual news: Britney Spears was filing for divorce. 'Britney Spears,' Mr. Reid said, shaking his head. 'She loses a little weight, and now she's getting all cocky about things.' He added, 'Britney has gotten her mojo back.'" The Times adds, "Few would peg Mr. Reid, 66, as someone with anything to say about Britney Spears or, for that matter, someone who would ever use the word 'mojo.'" But "he is a tricky figure to pigeonhole or predict, a Democrat who is a Mormon opposed to abortion and who looks more like a civics teacher than someone set to become the most powerful person in the Senate. He makes an unlikely front man." The Times adds, "People who know Mr. Reid say he is much more suited to work with Republicans than his partisan reputation would suggest." Reid "is often credited with outmaneuvering his predecessor, Senator Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee, who had relatively little legislative experience when he became majority leader in 2003." He is "nothing if not battle-worn and realistic, friends say."

Pelosi's Liberalism Said To Spring From Her Father's Politics. The Washington Post (11/10, C1, Duke, 690K) reports, "Critics deride Pelosi, 66, for a presumed lightweight liberalism they attribute to her latter-day home in San Francisco. But her liberalism -- and the keen political instincts and skill at the inside parry of the game -- can be traced more deeply and more precisely back to Albemarle Street," in Baltimore, "to the political empire that grew there when her father held court through decades of an intensely political life. The Post adds, "In that brick rowhouse on the corner of Albemarle and Fawn streets, politics was a family business that became a local dynasty."

Pelosi Learned How To Count Votes From Father. In the Financial Times (11/11), Holly Yeager profiles Pelosi, "a workaholic and self-confessed chocoholic" who "has long been a vocal cheerleader and effective fundraiser for her party (she raised more than $100m for Democrats in the past four years – a feat matched only by the Clintons). But that this mother of five who first ran for public office 20 years ago is also a keen political strategist should not come as a surprise. Her late father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr, spent 10 years in Congress, then a dozen as mayor of Baltimore. Known as 'Old Tommy', he kept a 'favour file' in the living room of their Little Italy home, tracking good deeds that he and the Baltimore Democratic machine had done for people – in case they needed to ask for something in return. Mrs Pelosi – 'little Nancy' back then, the youngest of six children and the only girl – says she also learnt from him to count votes. 'Going into an election, they'd sit around the table and they had these yellow legal pads and they'd say, 'How many votes does it take to win?' and it's still the same thing.'"

Murtha Thinks He Has The Votes To Be Majority Leader. Asked about his run for House Majority Leader on CNN's The Situation Room (11/9, Blitzer), Rep. Jack Murtha said, "At this point I think I have the votes. We've been going over it today and we're pleased at the outcome, we're pleased at the response we're getting and we've been working hard." Murtha pointed out that he was Nancy Pelosi's "campaign manager when Steny Hoyer ran against her for minority leader. So I do have a fairly good relationship."

The Washington Times (11/10, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Though Mr. Murtha is otherwise a fairly conservative Democrat, his position on the war appeals to many liberals in his ranks and, say Democratic staffers, he has the private blessing of Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the caucus's head and the presumed next House speaker." The Times adds, "Within minutes of Democrats' capturing the 15th seat needed to take control of the House, Mr. Hoyer tried tightening his grip on the majority leader position by reminding fellow Democrats that he had been a central figure in their caucus during their darkest times." Murtha "reminded colleagues that his strongest voice in recent years came in opposition to the Iraq war, which strategists on both sides credit in part for Democrats' enormous victories this week."

Emanuel To Forgo Whip Race. The Chicago Tribune (11/10, Dorning, 617K) reports Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "the Chicago Democrat who led his party's successful campaign to take over the House, announced late Thursday that he would forgo a bid he had been considering for the influential third-ranking leadership post, majority whip. Instead, he will run for a post one rung down the leadership ladder, Democratic Caucus chairman." The Tribune adds, "A Democratic source said Pelosi had urged Emanuel not to make a bid for the whip post in order to avoid a divisive internal fight with the Congressional Black Caucus, which is strongly backing the only declared candidate for the post, Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.). Clyburn is currently Democratic Caucus chairman and the only African-American in the party leadership."

Some Democratic Leaders, Lawmakers Touched By Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, Mullins, 2.04M) reports that after "winning an election shaped by corruption as much as Iraq, Democrats are about to elevate a set of leaders in the House and Senate that will include lawmakers who have had their own brushes with scandal." Sen. Harry Reid (D., Nev.), "who is expected to be elected to majority leader in the Senate, has come under attack for his relationship with Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a profitable land deal, and whether he inappropriately used campaign funds to give Christmas bonuses to employees at his condo complex." In the House, West Virginia Democratic Rep. Allan Mollohan, "whose conduct is being investigated by the Justice Department, is in line for a senior position on the Appropriations Committee. Meanwhile, Rep. Alcee Hastings, a Florida Democrat, is vying to become chairman of the Intelligence Committee. Once a federal judge, Mr. Hastings was impeached by Congress more than a decade ago after he was charged with -- and acquitted of -- taking a $150,000 bribe. Mr. Hastings declined to comment." Democratic Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana, "under Justice Department investigation for accepting bribes, came out ahead of 12 other candidates vying for his seat on Election Day, but faces a December runoff under Louisiana's unique election system." Democratic leaders "in both chambers say they will make it a top priority to approve an ethics-reform package that tightens rules for lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists. Republicans made the same promise a year ago after a Justice Department corruption probe garnered guilty pleas from a pair of one-time aides to former Republican Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as well as from Mr. Abramoff, who was close to Mr. DeLay and other Republican lawmakers."

Dodd Likely To Chair Senate Banking Committee. USA Today (11/10, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports Sen. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, "a second-generation senator exploring a 2008 presidential bid, is in line to be chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, now that Democrats have a majority in that chamber." Dodd has been "a strong advocate for the insurance and financial services industries in his state. Such firms as Bear Stearns, Lehman Bros. and Goldman Sachs are atop Dodd's list of political action committee donors, according to the Center for Responsive Politics."

Defense Contractors Relieved McCain Will Not Get Armed Services Chair. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A8, Karp, Pasztor, 2.04M) reports many defense contractors are relieved that Sen. John McCain, "a strident critic of Pentagon weapons-buying practices, won't become chairman of the Armed Services Committee." Likely chairman Carl Levin "brings his own longstanding skepticism of the industry and some of its prized weapons programs, particularly missile defense. Yet the soft-spoken Mr. Levin is likely to change the tone and focus of the committee's oversight efforts." Unlike McCain, "whose investigations into Boeing Co.'s ethical lapses laid the path for the panel to examine weapons-contract details and contractor profit margins, Mr. Levin has signaled that his priority will be the war in Iraq."

Paulson Emerging From "Shadows" Untainted By Partisanship. The New York Times (11/11, Weisman) writes on its front page that while Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson spent his first months in office in "the shadows while cabinet colleagues were campaigning for a Republican Congress," he is now "set to plunge in. Untainted by the harshly partisan rhetoric of the past, he hopes to use his prowess as the former head of Goldman Sachs not just to pursue critical economic deals with China and other American trading partners but -- equally important for the weakened administration -- to explore deal-making with Democrats in Congress, as well." The White House "says it is counting on the best from Mr. Paulson." However, the Times says, "the chances for real cooperation are limited."

UN's Bolton Could Be Next Victim Of Democratic Wave. The New York Times (11/11, A12, Cooper) reports that now that President Bush "has pledged to be a bipartisan consensus builder," the question "is whether Mr. Bush is ready to junk all of his make-nice pledges in order to keep John R. Bolton at the United Nations. Officially, administration officials say they plan to make all the necessary calls to Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to try to persuade them to confirm Mr. Bolton for a new term." But with defeated Sen. Lincoln Chafee's Thursday announcement that he would "deny Republicans on the committee the last vote needed to send Mr. Bolton's nomination to the full Senate, some administration officials privately acknowledge that Mr. Bolton's chances of confirmation are 'nil,' one State Department official said."

Rangel Apologizes To Mississippians Over Comment. The New York Times (11/11, B3, Ramirez) reports Rep. Charles Rangel apologized for a comment that he says was "uttered with regional pride rather than rancor." On Wednesday, the incoming House Ways and Means chairman "talked about winning back more of the tax revenue that New York State sends to the Treasury. He said, 'Mississippi gets more than their fair share back in federal money, but who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?' Apparently, a lot of people do, and they are not shy about saying so." One colleague, Rep. Chip Pickering "reacted as if he and his state had been slapped with a glove." On Thursday, Rangel said in a statement, "I certainly don't mean to offend anyone. I just love New York so much that I can't understand why everyone wouldn't want to live here."

Pelosi's Office Clarifies Stance On House Vote For D.C. Delegate. The Washington Post (11/11, B1, Woodlee) reports a spokeswoman for Rep. Nancy Pelosi said the likely incoming speaker supports voting rights for the District of Columbia's House delegate. The statement "clarified her position after heated discussion on Washington Post Radio about her position on the issue. On Thursday, Pelosi said she would change House rules on the first day of the new Democratic-controlled session in January" so that D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton "could vote on proposed changes but not final approval of legislation on the House floor." In a related item, the Washington Times (11/11, Emerling) reports District voting rights advocates "are encouraged by the recent Democratic takeover of Congress, but would prefer a bill giving their representative a full vote in the House be considered before the end of this legislative session."

With Elections Done, Dow Could Continue To Soar. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B1, Browning) reports, "Now that the stock and bond markets have shrugged off the major shift of political power in Washington, investors are beginning to wonder how much higher the stock market can go." The markets "seem to have welcomed the end of the divisive political campaign. Now, people's attention is turning back to more fundamental issues -- notably strong recent corporate profits and low interest rates." The Dow Jones "put in a gain of 122.39 points, or 1%," for the week, finishing at 12108.43, "just short of the record close of 12176.54 that it achieved Wednesday." The New York Times (11/11, C6) reports on the week's numbers as well.

Allen Concedes Senate Election. NBC Nightly News (11/9, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Democrats have taken over the Senate. As you know, it all hinged on the Virginia Senate race and that is all over. In the end Jim Webb won by about 7,000 votes and with that election went control of the Senate." Sen. George Allen was shown saying, "The people of Virginia, who I always call the owners of the government, they have spoken. And I respect their decision." And Webb was shown saying, "I would like to also today call on our President to publicly denounce the campaign tactics that have divided us."

On CNN's Larry King Live (11/9), Webb said, "I had a strong feeling when I entered this race that we could win, if things went our way. We were down 33 points at that time, but I always believed we could win. … I was very strongly concerned about the Iraq war. I was an early voice warning against going into Iraq. But I also have strong feelings about what has been happening to our country economically, with the breakdown along class lines, in a way that we probably haven't seen since the 1880s. And that's an issue that got an enormous amount of traction."

Asked on MSNBC's Tucker (11/9) how Webb is going to get along with "real liberals, legendary liberals," in the Senate, Democratic strategist Steve McMahon said, "He's going to get along fine with them. He's a Vietnam veteran who I'm sure had some strong views about what was going on in the country while there were people over fighting the war. But at the end of the day…he's a patriot, he's a moderate, he's a centrist, he matches Virginia beautifully, and he's going to be a great US senator."

The CBS Evening News (11/9, story 4, 2:25, Atkisson, 7.66M) reported that Democratic control of the Senate "means if there's an opening on the Supreme Court, it will be tougher for President Bush to push through a conservative Supreme Court nominee and it's less likely 'Roe v. Wade' will be overturned. But even with a majority, Democrats can't count on steamrolling through everything they want. As a minority, Republicans can always filibuster in the Senate, and the President has his veto pen."

The AP (11/10, Barakat) reports "Webb's supporters roared when he took his Marine son's battered combat boots from a bag and held them high above his head at a rally. Webb, whose son is fighting in Iraq, had worn the boots throughout what he called 'an unnecessarily brutal campaign.'" Allen "chose not to demand a recount when initial canvassing of the results failed to significantly alter Webb's lead."

The Washington Post (11/10, A1, Shear, MacJillis, 690K) reports, "Webb, 60, was a Republican for most of his life and for a time served under the godfather of the modern GOP, former president Ronald Reagan. But his election to the Senate delivered a final blow to the Republican Party."

The Washington Times (11/10, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) says "Allen's loss -- the third consecutive top office lost by state Republicans -- leaves the Virginia Republican party in disarray. 'George Allen is the patriarch of the modern Republican party in Virginia,' said Lt. Gov. William T. Bolling, one of several Republicans jockeying to be the new leader. His win last fall buoyed depressed party loyalists after their candidate Jerry W. Kilgore lost the gubernatorial race to Democrat Timothy M. Kaine." Now, "conservatives can choose to unite behind former leaders with an anti-tax message -- such as James S. Gilmore III, the last Republican chief executive -- or centrists such as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, who work with the opposing party. Mr. Davis won re-election Tuesday in a changing and growing Northern Virginia district that favored Mr. Webb." A Washington Post story (11/10, Shear, Craig) also says Allen was "the one who revitalized Virginia's Republican Party," adding he was also "considered a front-runner for the White House, with his folksy, football-and-cowboy charm." The New York Times (11/10, Broder, 1.16M), Los Angeles Times (11/10, Neuman, 850K) also report on the end of the Virginia campaign.

Webb Begins Transition As Allen Team Absorbs Stunning Loss. The Washington Post (11/11, B1, Shear) reports Sen.-elect Jim Webb "spent the day after clinching his victory by thanking his staff and beginning the process of making the transition from first-time candidate to freshman lawmaker." Webb told supporters Thursday that he "agreed to have lunch next week" with Sen. George Allen, but so far, "a time and place have not been determined" and Webb is waiting to hear from his defeated rival. Meanwhile, "aides to Allen said they were stunned by the loss, despite knowing for weeks that the race against Webb was very close. Members of Allen's Senate staff, many of whom are young, cried Thursday when they found out he had decided not to seek a recount of the ballots."

The New York Times (11/11, A12, Kornblut) writes that while "the most spectacular defeat" this week was Allen's, "who won the prize for most breathtaking downfall, not only losing his Senate seat to help hand power of the entire body to the Democrats, but also tarnishing a once-golden reputation in under three months flat," less obvious "but no less real was the damage to Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, a strategist once celebrated as the 'next Karl Rove.'"

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/10), host Dobbs gave Sen.-elect Jim Webb very favorable treatment during an interview, telling his "highly decorated Marine Vietnam veteran" guest that "you have the capacity, the experience and the character" to succeed in the Senate. Webb said, "One of the committees that I will be on, I can guarantee, will be one that deals with defense or foreign policy," and "I want to be on the Veterans' Committee. I've spent a good part of my life, as you know, either serving or working with veterans. And I feel a special obligation to the people who are serving."

Burns Concedes Defeat. The AP (11/10, Gouras) reports, "US Sen. Conrad Burns conceded defeat to Jon Tester on Thursday, acknowledging that a tight election had gone to the Democrats' favor, Burns' campaign told The Associated Press." Burns, "a three-term senator whose campaign was troubled by verbal gaffes and voter discontent, congratulated Tester, a farmer and state legislator. 'I stand ready to help as Montana transitions to a new United States Senator,' Burns said in a statement provided to the AP."

Tester's Move To Washington Will Be First Time Off The Farm. The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Verhovek) visits Big Sandy, Montana, home of Sen.-elect Jon Tester, "a wheat and lentil farmer who also has done stints here as a custom butcher, soil conservation board member, high school basketball referee and music teacher at Big Sandy Elementary School." Tester's Western roots "are genuine and about as deep as can be: He has never lived anyplace other than the family farm, which his grandparents homesteaded here in 1916."

King Glad To See Burns Go. In his Washington Post (11/11, A27) column, Colbert King writes, "Election night in the nation's capital was a pretty tame affair, given that most of the important local races were decided in the September primary. But for some of us who live in the District, the real action on election night took place far beyond city limits." Montana Sen. Conrad Burns "lost his seat, in part, because of his ties to corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff. But Burns hit rock bottom with some of us 12 years ago when we learned about his slur against the District's African American population."

Lieberman Says He Is Still A Democrat. The Los Angeles Times (11/11) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman affirmed he wants to be known as a Democrat in his new Senate term. Lieberman said this week that "he was reassured by Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid that he would retain his seniority in the new Senate."

Exit Polls Show Significant Narrowing Of Parties' "God Gap." The Washington Post (11/11, A1, Cooperman) reports on its front page that in the aftermath of this week's elections, "religious leaders across the ideological spectrum found something they could agree on: The 'God gap' in American politics has narrowed substantially. Religious liberals contended that a concerted effort by Democrats since 2004 to appeal to people of faith had worked minor wonders, if not electoral miracles, in races across the country." However, religious conservatives said the GOP "lost religious voters rather than the Democrats winning them." Either way, exit polls "told a dramatic story of changing views in the pews: Democrats recaptured the Catholic vote they had lost two years ago . They sliced the GOP's advantage among weekly churchgoers to 12 percentage points, down from 18 points in 2004 congressional races and 22 points in the 2004 presidential contest. Democrats even siphoned off a portion of the Republican Party's most loyal base, white evangelical Protestants."

Rove Said Impact Of Corruption Issue Was Greater Than Anticipated. Time.com (11/10, Allen) talks with Karl Rove about this week's elections. Rove said, "The profile of corruption in the exit polls was bigger than I'd expected. Abramoff, lobbying, Foley and Haggard added to the general distaste that people have for all things Washington, and it just reached critical mass." Rove "does not believe his data let him down." Rove said, "My job is not to be a prognosticator. My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, 'We're going to lose.' I'm looking at the data and seeing if I can figure out, 'Where can we be?' I told the President, 'I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control.'"

Chafee May Leave GOP. The AP (11/10, Smith) reports, "Two days after losing a bid for a second term, Sen. Lincoln Chafee said he was unsure whether he would remain a Republican." Yesterday "he was asked whether he would stick with the Republican Party or become an independent or Democrat. 'I haven't made any decisions. I just haven't even thought about where my place is,' Chafee said at a news conference. When pressed on whether his comments indicated he might leave the GOP, he replied: 'That's fair.'"

GOP Leads Most Still-Undecided House Races. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) "Washington Wire" reports Republicans "lead in most House races that remain undecided." Narrow margins for some "make recounts likely. But 'it's very unusual for recounts to alter races,' says Carl Forti" of the NRCC.

Mehlman To Step Down As RNC Chairman. The Washington Times (11/10, Hallow, 88K) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, "whose party just lost both chambers of Congress, will leave his position in January, and the post as party chief has been offered to Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele." Asked "about reports last night that he would resign," Mehlman said, "It is true. It's something I decided over the summer. No one told me I needed to. In fact, folks wanted me to stay." Mehlman said he "'told the White House over the summer it was my decision' to leave the RNC post, 'win, lose or draw.'" The Times adds Republican officials "told The Times that Mr. Steele, who lost his bid for the U.S. Senate on Tuesday, has been sought out to succeed Mr. Mehlman as national party chairman. Those Republican officials said Mr. Steele had not made a decision whether to take the post, as of last night." Other Republican Party officials "said some Republican National Committee (RNC) members, including state party chairmen, have mounted a move to have Mr. Steele succeed Mr. Mehlman. But they said that President Bush's political adviser Karl Rove, who is Mr. Mehlman's mentor, would rather see Mr. Steele serve in the president's Cabinet, perhaps as secretary of Housing and Urban Development."

The AP (11/10, Sidoti) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, "whose party lost both chambers of Congress in the midterm elections, will step down from his post when his two-year term ends in January, GOP officials said Thursday." The officials "said Mehlman made the decision not to run for a second term more than a month or two ago — well before the election."

The New York Times (11/10, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Mehlman said, "This has been a great ride, but at the same time I have a lot of interests in addition to politics." The Times adds Mehlman "ruled out going to work for any of the 2008 presidential candidates." Mehlman said, "My intention is to focus on identifying a platform that will be professionally rewarding for me for the next decade, that will include politics but not be related to politics." The Times adds Mehlman's "time in office has been marked by strong fund-raising — the committee spent $77 million on candidates this year — as well as the pioneering of sophisticated voter identification and turnout technologies that Republicans and Democrats said helped account for his party's successes in 2002 and 2004." Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts said, "I'd love to have him come work for me. He has revolutionized American politics." Romney "said Republican setbacks this year came about despite the advances Mr. Mehlman made in fund-raising and voter turnout operations." The Times adds the "praise from Mr. Romney was echoed in an unsolicited call from James Carville, a veteran Democratic operative who is married to Mary Matalin, a veteran Republican strategist." Carville said, "The R.N.C. did a better job than the D.N.C. this year."

The Washington Post (11/10, Balz, 690K) reports White House officials "are trying to recruit a successor, but it was not known last night whether there was a leading candidate. One name that has emerged as a possible chairman is that of Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who just lost a bid for the Senate. But a GOP source said Steele is not likely to become chairman." Others "mentioned publicly as possible successor include Maria Cino, a former RNC official and now deputy secretary of transportation, and Mary Matalin, former communications director for Vice President Cheney and one of the party's most visible advocates. But a GOP strategist said, 'From what I understand, all these names are not on the table.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (11/9, King) reported, "It is almost certain now, all but certain, we are told by a number of Republican sources, that" RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman "will step down and leave that post by the end of the year. We want to make clear none of these sources are saying that there's any blame being assigned to Ken Mehlman. In fact, most Republican strategists at the White House and in the party across the country think that he did more than the best he could and that the damage would have even been worse in the mid-term elections if not for the RNC operation. He had told some close associates he planned to lave after the election anyway. … The number two at the Department of Transportation, Maria Cino, she's a veteran political strategist…is under consideration if Ken Mehlman steps down."

GOP Remap Strategy May Have Backfired. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A6, Cummings, 2.04M) reports gerrymandering was "supposed to cement Republican control of the House of Representatives, offering incumbents a wall of re-election protection even as public opinion turned sharply against them. Instead, the party's strategy of recrafting district boundaries may have backfired, contributing to the defeats of several lawmakers and the party's fall from power." Republican leaders "may have overreached and created so many Republican-leaning districts that they spread their core supporters too thinly. That left their incumbents vulnerable to the type of backlash from traditionally Republican-leaning independent voters that unfolded this week." That "helps to explain why three of four Republican incumbents in the Philadelphia area were beaten this week, while the remaining incumbent hung on by just a few thousand votes." In Florida, meanwhile, "state lawmakers had shifted some Republican voters from the secure district of former Rep. Mark Foley in an attempt to shore up the re-election chances of Rep. Clay Shaw without risking the Foley seat. Instead, Democrats took both."

Evangelical Leader Dobson Blasts GOP. The AP (11/10, Talhelm) reports, "Conservative Christian leader James Dobson accused the Republican Party of abandoning values voters in the midterm elections — and paying the price by losing control of Congress." In a statement, Dobson said, "What did they do with their power? Very little that values voters care about." The AP ads, "Finger-pointing abounded in the days after Democrats seized control of Congress after 12 years in the minority. Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family, issued a statement railing against the Republicans for letting their majorities slip away." The "cybersex scandal involving former Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida and the fall of Ted Haggard, the evangelical pastor who was fired amid allegations of gay sex and drug use, left some values voters dispirited." More than "four in 10 evangelicals said corruption and scandals were extremely important, and those who felt that way were more likely to vote for Democratic candidates than other evangelicals."

Schwarzenegger Says He Is "Heartened" By Election Results. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Nicholas, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, in Mexico City, said "that he was heartened by Tuesday's election resulting in a Democratic takeover of Congress, welcoming what he described as 'new blood coming to Washington.'" Schwarzenegger "said he was hopeful that the changes will jump-start a political system that was paralyzed." After a meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox, Schwarzenegger said, "I think it's good that there are new ideas and new blood, because Washington was stuck. They could not move forward. Not much was accomplished. I think it was terrible." The Times adds Schwarzenegger said "he was hopeful that the results would usher in a new era of bipartisan cooperation — similar to what he said he is bringing about in Sacramento." But soon after "the governor finished speaking, one of his aides, communications director Adam Mendelsohn, told reporters that Schwarzenegger was not saying he was necessarily pleased to see Congress under Democratic control. Rather, Schwarzenegger was making the point that 'it's good there is an infusion of new ideas and desire for bipartisanship,' Mendelsohn said."

Schwarzenegger Urges GOP To Join Him In Center. The Washington Post (11/11, A6, Pomfret) writes, "In his victory speech Tuesday night to a confetti-swamped crowd at the Beverly Hilton, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had a message for the rest of the Republican Party after its worst defeat in decades. Follow 'the California way,' he said. 'We are proving to the nation that there is another way to go, a better path to solve problems.'" His "landslide victory in a largely Democratic state illustrates the growing power of moderate candidates and the electoral appeal of bipartisanship, and it could contain important lessons for Republicans and Democrats as they seek to position themselves in the future, analysts and politicians said." University of Southern California political analyst Sherry Bebitch Jeffe said, "If I was a Republican National Committee chair, I would hire Arnold out and teach Republicans what is necessary to put together a winning campaign. He really is the poster boy of what Republicans have denied for so long. Elections are won from the center."

Gingrich Sees Hope For Conservatives. The Washington Times (11/10, Hallow, 88K) reports Republicans, "suddenly a minority in both houses of Congress and led by an unpopular president, need to restore their image as the party of small government but at the same time avoid the image of blind obstructionism, party leaders and analysts said yesterday." Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said, "We have to recognize that this was a defeat for Republicans, not for conservatives." Gingrich said there is "hope to advance a conservative agenda" if House Republicans "can find allies among conservative Democrats." Gingrich said, "The balance of power in the House is now 50-plus blue-dog [conservative] Democrats." The Times adds it "won't be easy for Republicans to recover from Tuesday's defeat, because the party has 'completely lost its brand as the party of limited government and low spending,' said former Rep. Pat Toomey, president of the conservative Club for Growth."

Flake Says GOP Needs To Return To Fiscal Responsibility. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/10, A16), Rep. Jeff Flake says, "As Republicans, we have a choice to make, and we need to make it soon. The factions of the party must decide: Are we going to re-emerge as the party of ideas -- or be content as assistant hirelings of big government? We might begin by asking why we lost. Taxes, first, is the easy one, and there is no need for a Republican mea culpa here. We've cut taxes, and Americans and the economy are better off for it. But recently we've been satisfied with putting Democrats 'on record' supporting higher taxes. We need to do more." Second, "spending. This one is more difficult because it requires not just a mea culpa but abject apology. Not the politician-style – 'I'm sorry if you were offended by spending that our opponents have misinterpreted as offensive' -- but rather: 'We've overspent, badly, and it was offensive to you as well as our conservative principles. We're sorry, and we're going to do better.'" Of "immediate concern to Republicans in the House of Representatives is deciding who will be our standard bearer. Can those who have been a part of the current leadership team convince the other members that they've had an epiphany? It's possible, I suppose. But I think we'd be best served with some fresh faces, congressmen like Mike Pence and John Shadegg, who haven't had to travel that road to Damascus."

WSJournal Urges Republicans To Dump Current Leaders. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "As they lick their wounds, Republicans are no doubt wondering what went wrong and what to do now. The answers aren't all that complicated: Revive the reform convictions that earned them power in the 1990s, and start that process in the House of Representatives by electing a new slate of leaders. Twelve years ago, the Newt Gingrich-led Republicans swept into power as reformers who ran against corruption and pledged to make government 'smaller and smarter.' Somehow, across the years, that conviction was replaced by Tom DeLay and the quest for permanent incumbency, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis and the 'earmark' brigade, and a retinue of Beltway retainers symbolized by Jack Abramoff. The current leadership let it all happen, and if Republicans want a shot at regaining control in 2008 they'll turn to a new generation to lead them." House GOP leaders "should be returned to the backbenches." Republicans "might also recall what happened to Democrats when they tried to regain the House in 1996 by running with the same leadership and agenda that had been ousted in 1994. Those Democrats failed, despite Bill Clinton's victory at the top of the ticket, because too many voters saw the same old story. If Republicans lose again in 2008, they could be in the minority for a long time." The "good news is that a younger generation does seem to be stepping forward. Mike Pence, of Indiana, has already declared for minority leader, and John Shadegg of Arizona is seeking the number two job as whip. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, Jeb Hensarling of Texas and Jeff Flake of Arizona are among the other Members who have tried to put ideas above mere incumbency."

Some Democrats Want Ford To Replace Dean As DNC Chair. The New Republic Online (11/10, Lizza) writes that "some big name Democrats want to oust DNC Chairman Howard Dean, arguing that his stubborn commitment to the 50-state strategy and his stinginess with funds for House races cost the Democrats several pickup opportunities. The candidate being floated to replace Dean? Harold Ford." James Carville said, "Suppose Harold Ford became chairman of the DNC? How much more money do you think we could raise? Just think of the difference it could make in one day. Now probably Harold Ford wants to stay in Tennessee. I just appointed myself his campaign manager."

Steele Mum On Talk Of RNC Chairmanship. Meanwhile, on Fox News' Big Story (11/10, Gibson), Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele declined to say much about rumors he might succeed Ken Mehlman as RNC chair. Steele said, "I woke up on a Wednesday morning to blogs talking about this. This is a call of the President of the United States. This is a call of the leadership of the party. I'm flattered by it. But Ken Mehlman just announced his resignation, which he had made clear very early on that it would happen. Let us enjoy this moment and celebrate his achievements. And then the President and the White House will decide who the next head of the party will be and they'll move forward from there."

The Washington Times (11/11, Hallow, Ward) says Steele "is being pulled in several directions -- to take over as the national leader of the Republican Party in two months, to take a Cabinet post in the Bush administration or to go into the private sector. … Top national Republican leaders" have told Steele they want him to succeed Mehlman, according to the Times.

Democrats' Business Donations Neared Parity With GOP. USA Today (11/10, Davidson, 2.27M) reports Democrats "won the most expensive midterm election in history with stronger financial support from big business." Democratic congressional candidates "amassed $616 million vs. $632.2 million for Republicans in the 2005-06 election cycle, according to figures through Oct. 18 from the Center for Responsive Politics." Corporate donors "traditionally favor Republican candidates. In the last midterm contest in 2002, Democrats raised $248.6 million vs. Republicans' $342.2 million." While Democrats "attracted money from longtime supporters, such as trial lawyers and labor unions, they also drew a greater share from industries that lean Republican, such as pharmaceuticals. Some businesses may have been hedging their bets as a Democratic victory appeared more likely late in the campaign." The "total cost of the 2006 federal election was an estimated $2.8 billion, a 27% jump over 2002, the center says." Topping the "list of Democratic donors was the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which funneled 97% of its $2.2 million in contributions to Democrats. The union supports such Democratic-backed causes as raising the minimum wage." The Association of Trial Lawyers of America "kicked in $2.1 million, 95% to Democrats. The group is battling Republican efforts to limit big payouts in personal-injury cases."

GOP Lost Ground With Hispanic Voters. USA Today (11/10, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Republican gains "among Hispanic voters evaporated in Tuesday's elections, and some party leaders are blaming harsh rhetoric on immigration for the reversal." Cutting into "the Democrats' traditional advantage among Hispanic voters was a key to both of President Bush's election victories. In 2004, when Bush was at the top of the ticket, 44% of Hispanics surveyed after they cast their ballots said they voted Republican. This year, the figure dropped to 29%." The decline "is significant because Hispanics are fast becoming a crucial voting bloc. Census figures show Hispanics make up at least 10% of the population in 11 of the 28 U.S. House districts that switched from Republican to Democratic hands on Tuesday." Strategists from both parties say the vocal opposition of some Republicans to a proposed immigration bill that would give many of an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship drove Hispanics back to the Democratic camp."

Predictions Of Hispanic Voter Surge Said To Be "Just Premature." In a USA Today op-ed (11/10), Dallas freelance writer Marisa Treviño says, "Exit poll results from Tuesday's elections show an increase in Hispanic voting from 2002. Those results appear to confirm a pre-election report by the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO), which predicted that Latinos would make up about 6% of the vote. That's at least one percentage point up from 2002, but hardly enough to get excited about." So are "all the predictions of Latino voting clout to be dismissed? No. They're just premature. The coupling of Hispanic youth and technology just might change the equation." The "non-partisan Voto Latino, which aims to increase Hispanic voter participation, has targeted young Latinos by entering their world of cellphone text messaging and online social networks, such as MySpace."

WSJournal Says GOP's Hard Line On Immigration "Fools Gold." In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/10, 2.04M) says, "Republicans on Tuesday managed both to lose their majority in Congress and alienate a fast-growing bloc of Latino swing voters. Other than that, the House GOP strategy of trying to save itself by bucking President Bush and using immigration as a wedge issue worked pretty well." Republicans "can't say they weren't warned. Like trade protectionism, the immigration issue is the fool's gold of American politics. Voters like to sound off to pollsters about immigrants, yet they pull the lever with other matters foremost in mind. Elections seldom if ever turn on immigration, and the GOP restrictionist message so adored by talk radio, cable news and the nativist blogosphere once again failed to deliver the goods. … We hope" the Republican Party lets Bush address the issue, "having learned the hard way not to follow Lou Dobbs, Bill O'Reilly and the editors of National Review magazine down the garden path to defeat."

Voting Machines Backed By Harris May Have Malfunctioned In Her District. The AP (11/10, Davis) reports the "touch-screen voting machines Katherine Harris championed as secretary of state after the 2000 presidential recount may have botched this year's election to replace her in the U.S. House, and it's likely going to mean another Florida recount." More than "18,000 Sarasota County voters who marked other races didn't have a vote register in the House race, a rate much higher than the rest of the district, elections results show." Florida Secretary of State Sue Cobb "sent a team to Sarasota County on Thursday to observe the expected recount and audit the county's touch-screen voting machines. The county's elections supervisor, Kathy Dent, had requested the team after one of the candidates reported complaints about voting machines malfunctioning." Republican Vern Buchanan "declared victory in the race with a 373-vote lead over Democrat Christine Jennings — less than 0.2 percent."

The New York Times (11/10, Goodnough, 1.16M) reports Jennings "is seeking a recount after dozens of people reported problems using Sarasota County's touch-screen

voting machines and a significant number of ballots had no recorded votes in the high-profile race." Jennings lost to Buchanan "by just 373 votes out of a total 237,861 cast — one of the closest House races in the nation. More than 18,000 voters in Sarasota County, or 13 percent of those who went to the polls Tuesday, did not seem to vote in the Congressional race when they cast ballots, a discrepancy that Kathy Dent, the county elections supervisor, said she could not explain." In comparison, 'only 2 percent of voters in one neighboring county within the same House district and 5 percent in another skipped the Congressional race, according to The Herald-Tribune of Sarasota. And many of those who did not seem to cast a vote in the House race did vote in more obscure races, like for the hospital board." A "preliminary review by The Herald-Tribune found that if Ms. Jennings had won the same percentage of the 18,000 missing votes as she did among counted votes in Sarasota County, she would have won the race by about 600 votes instead of losing by 373."

Voters Approve 88% Of $76.6 Billion In Borrowing Authority. USA Today (11/10, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports, "Voters were in a borrowing mood this week. State and local governments won approval for more than 88% of the $78.6 billion they asked to borrow in Tuesday's election, according to i-Deal, a New York company that tracked the results." The money "will be spent on schools, roads, sewers, fire stations and other projects." California voters "approved the biggest chunk of debt: $43 billion for five bond issues for roads, schools, flood control, parks and affordable housing."

Vilsack Kicks Off "Long Shot" Presidential Bid. The New York Times/AP (11/10, Glover) reports Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, "a centrist Democrat seeking an early edge in an all-but-certain crowded presidential field, launched a long-shot bid for the White House Thursday." Fifteen months "before his own state holds caucuses — the first step in the nominating process — Vilsack announced his candidacy, filed documents with the Federal Election Commission and heralded a multistate tour beginning Nov. 30." Overshadowing the "announcement is the upheaval in Washington as Democrats captured control of the House and Senate in Tuesday's elections. But Vilsack, a little-known Midwest governor, needs all the attention he can get — and the first infusion of campaign cash." In polls, Vilsack "has trailed the other potential candidates, among them front-runner New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards. Earlier this year, the governor even was behind in a survey of Iowans." Vilsack will "begin his tour in his hometown of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and will make stops in New Hampshire, Nevada, Pennsylvania and South Carolina. Vilsack was born in Pittsburgh, and the other states hold key early tests in the nomination process." Vilsack has not "been the only Democrat campaigning in Iowa. Several potential, more familiar candidates have traveled to the state, including Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama." When Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin "sought the Democratic nomination in 1992, rivals decided to cede the state to him, but Vilsack is unlikely to get such a break, strategists say."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/9, Blitzer) reported, "Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is getting a jump-start on the 2008 presidential race. He's now the first Democrat to throw his hat into the ring. The outgoing Vilsack announced today he's filing the necessary paperwork to run for president. He may have an edge in the lead-off presidential caucuses. That would be in his home state of Iowa. But polls show him way behind other better-known Democrats weighing presidential bids."

ABC World News (11/9, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Now that the 2006 vote is decided, here comes 2008. Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack, declared today that he's running for the presidential nomination. Iowa is where the caucuses that begin the nomination processes will be held in 15 months. There's one Republican presidential candidate so far. California congressman Duncan Hunter has taken the first steps towards running."

NBC Nightly News (11/9, story 9, 2:25, Faw, 9.87M) reported, "If you think Britney Spears, cavorting the same day she announces she's getting divorced, if you think she's getting ahead of herself, fasten your seatbelts because the presidential campaign of 2008, a mere 727 days from now, is also off and running. Today Iowa's two-term governor filed papers to run for President. Another household word, Duncan Hunter, yes the Republican from California, recently set up his exploratory committee." Rep. Duncan Hunter: "Preparing to run for President of the United States in 2008." Faw: "There is precedent, of course, for getting a head start. More than 30 years ago a relative unknown Jimmy Carter started running when almost no one was looking and look what happened to him. So it makes a certain amount of sense to start now or at least say one might." Tim Russert: But it's fair to say you're thinking of running for President in 2008?" Sen. Barack Obama: "It's fair, yes." Faw: "Early birds aren't foolhardy, especially unknowns who need what the anointed frontrunners already have, name recognition and money." But to "all this gearing up so early, some say enough already."

Yepsen Rates Vilsack's Chances. On MSNBC's Hardball (11/9, Matthews), David Yepsen of the Des Moines Register discussed the 2008 Iowa caucuses, saying that if Vilsack runs, he has "a real problem, because I don't see how he wins anything here. He's expected to win. If he does, people like you are going to shrug it off as expected. And if he loses, and he's running fourth place in the polls out there, then it's going to be a big hit." Sen. Barack Obama has "sure acted like a candidate. He's made three or four visits to the state and got huge crowds." As for Sen. John Kerry, Yepsen said, "I think he's finished." On the GOP side, Gov. Mitt Romney "has started early. He's organizing. He's reaching out to lots of different people. He's got religious conservatives. He's also got party moderates. … Romney, I think, has got himself in a good position."

McCain To Create Presidential Exploratory Committee. NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 4, 2:55, Williams) reported, "The week is ending with yet another political development and this one didn't take long." Sen. John McCain "will set up an exploratory committee for a 2008 presidential run. Senator McCain will talk about his plans this Sunday when he will be Tim Russert's guest on 'Meet the Press.'" The New York Times (11/11, A13, Kornblut) reports McCain advisers say the Senator has "not made up his mind whether to run, although he has acknowledged that he is strongly considering doing so. 'There's not going to be a formal announcement this year,' John Weaver, an adviser to Mr. McCain, said. The senator, who appears at or near the top of public opinion surveys about who should run for higher office, will wait until the Christmas holidays, when his children are home, to make a final decision." The AP (11/10) also reports on McCain's early move.

Clinton Has No Plans To Shut Down Campaign Apparatus. The New York Times (11/11, B1, Healy) reports that while Sen. Hillary Clinton's re-election run may be over, she is "hardly closing up her campaign shop or worrying about deep debts. Advisers to Mrs. Clinton say she has more than $10 million left in her political bank account, not to mention a priceless reservoir of speeches, issue research, and financial networks nationally for any future use. Her advisers also say that she does not intend to disassemble her campaign apparatus and staff, as many candidates do when an election ends, nor does she plan to immediately close her New York City and Washington campaign offices. Indeed, the Clinton camp has spent months building a re-election team that could easily shift into gear for a 2008 presidential bid."

More Than Two Dozen Potential Candidates In The Wings. A CQ Weekly (11/10, Crawford) piece that exceeds 10,000 words examines the prospects of more than two dozen possible presidential candidates. On the Democratic side: Sen. Evan Bayh, Sen. Joseph Biden, Wesley Clark, Clinton, Tom Daschle, Sen. Christopher Dodd, John Edwards, Sen. Russ Feingold, Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry, Sen. Barack Obama, Gov. Bill Richardson, and Gov. Tom Vilsack. On the Republican side: Sen. George Allen, Sen. Sam Brownback, Sen. Bill Frist, Newt Gingrich, Rudy Giuliani, Sen. Chuck Hagel, Gov. Mike Huckabee, Rep. Duncan Hunter, McCain, Gov. George Pataki, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Gov. Mitt Romney, and Rep. Tom Tancredo.

Denver Hopes To Land 2008 Democratic Convention. USA Today (11/10, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports, "The Mile High City is hoping that a rising Democratic tide in Colorado and the West will lift its chances of hosting the party's 2008 convention." Officials "involved in Denver's bid for the convention say their prospects against rival New York City improved on Tuesday as Colorado voters put a decidedly Democratic stamp on the state." Democrats in Colorado "this week reclaimed the governorship after eight years of GOP rule, captured a House seat that had been Republican since 2002 and strengthened their majorities in the state House and state Senate. Colorado Democrats will hold four of seven U.S. House seats, a U.S. Senate seat and, for the first time since Dwight Eisenhower was president, control both the Legislature and governor's office."

Gingrich Emerging As "Top Conservative" For 2008. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) "Washington Wire" reports that the "ebbing fortunes" of Sens. George Allen, Bill Frist, and Rick Santorum have left ex-House Speaker Newt Gingrich the "top conservative prospect" for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. "'He can win some primaries,' says Bush ad-maker Mark McKinnon," who is with Sen. John McCain's likely campaign.

WSJournal Says Conservative Values Triumphant In Referenda. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A6) editorializes, "Republicans took a drubbing in Tuesday's elections. But judging by the results of various referendums nationwide, some of the ideas they used to stand for are alive, well and popular among voters. The most significant moral victory comes in Michigan, where voters approved by a surprisingly lopsided 58-42 margin Proposal 2, which bars discrimination and preferential treatment 'in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting.'" In California, "four measures that would have raised taxes in an already overtaxed state went down in flames. … Also encouraging were the nine states that passed anti-Kelo referendums. … What all this tells us is that while voters have delivered a partisan rebuke to a party that likes to describe itself as conservative, they still believe in low taxes, property rights and social conservatism -- so long as it is not extreme. There's a lesson here for the next crop of GOP candidates, assuming they're willing to pay attention."

US Commission on Civil Rights Vice Chair Lauds Michigan Vote. In a Wall Street Journal (11/11, A7) op-ed, US Commission on Civil Rights Vice Chair Abigail Thernstrom writes, "Ward Connerly has done it again: A striking 58% of Michigan voters gave the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative a thumbs up; only three counties voted against it. … The modern-day survival of racial preferences depends on sympathetic judges willing to spin dubious arguments and ignore widely available data on the pernicious impact of such preferences. But, this time, the University of Michigan may find itself without judicial recourse. The Supreme Court has never said that universities are constitutionally obligated to institute 'diversity' policies. Public universities are funded by taxpayers. And those taxpayers have spoken."

Trade Deficit Narrows. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A2, Hitt, Whitehouse, 2.04M) reports, "Even as the overall US trade deficit narrowed in September, the country's imbalance with China continued to worsen, pointing to possible new tensions in trade policy making now that Democrats have retaken Congress. With the price of imported oil in sharp decline, the deficit fell 6.8% to $64.3 billion in September, the Commerce Department said yesterday. A broad easing of imports on the back of the first decline in oil prices in five months combined with a continued strong export performance to improve the trade picture." Yet "there were indications that the trade gap remains a problem. September's deficit, though down from August's revised record of $68.96 billion, was still one of the largest ever. And the rapidly ballooning deficit with China showed no sign of easing."

Stocks Down Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (11/9, story 8, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today the Dow was off more than 73 points [to close at 12,103.30]. Nasdaq was down almost nine points [to close at 8.93] in today's trading." The Wall Street Journal (11/10, C1, Browning, 2.04M) notes "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.53%, or 7.39 points, to 1378.33, still up 10.4% in 2006."

Wyoming Senator Hospitalized With Leukemia. The AP (11/10, Gruver) reports Republican Sen. Craig Thomas of Wyoming, "hospitalized since Monday with pneumonia, has been diagnosed with a form of leukemia, his spokesman said Thursday." Thomas "who was easily elected to a third term while in the hospital, issued a statement saying he will undergo treatment and plans to return to Congress in January." While hospitalized, "doctors noticed a low white blood cell count and a bone marrow biopsy revealed leukemia, cancer of the blood and bone marrow. Thomas was to immediately begin a four- to six-week course of chemotherapy and will remain at the hospital to reduce his risk of infection, his office said in a press release Thursday."

US Arms Makers Doubled Foreign Sales In One Year. The New York Times (11/11, Wayne, 1.16M) reports in its Business section, "Sales of military weapons by United States contractors to foreign governments doubled in the last year, as countries like Pakistan, Australia and Greece stepped up purchases of armaments and the United States government loosened policies to allow more American weapons to be sold on the world market. A total of $21 billion in arms sales agreements were signed from September 2005 to September 2006, compared with $10.6 billion in the previous year, according to new data compiled by the Pentagon." The foreign sales "have provided a welcome source of new revenue at a time when the Pentagon has indicated that the era of record military budgets is ending."

O'Malley Backs Racetrack Slot Machines In Maryland. The Washington Post (11/11, B1, Wagner)

reports Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley called upon the state legislature "to legalize slot machine gambling at horse tracks, saying he was 'sick of this issue' but feared that the state's racing industry could collapse if lawmakers did not find common ground early in his term."

O'Malley Is Latest Baltimore Politician To Move On. The Washington Times (11/11, Miller) takes a sentimental look at Baltimore reign as "the nexus of Maryland political power" as its mayor prepares to head off to Annapolis.

Democratic Congress To Push For Shift In US Foreign Policy. The Washington Post (11/10, A7, Kessler, 690K) reports the Democratic takeover of Congress "will raise the profile of lawmakers who have repeatedly urged the Bush administration to talk to key adversaries such as Iran, North Korea and Syria, increasing pressure on the White House to stop placing restrictions or conditions on such discussions." The Post notes that incoming chairmen of the Senate and House Foreign Relations Committees -- Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, respectively -- have "long argued that the administration's approach to dealing with adversaries has hamstrung diplomacy," particularly in the cases of Iran, Syria and North Korea. State Department officials "said that yesterday they are open to ideas, but that the change in Congress will not directly affect administration policies."

Global Outlook Upbeat In Response To Election, Rumsfeld Resignation. In a separate article, the Washington Post (11/10, A6, Moore, Finn, 690K) reports, "For Europe and much of the rest of the world, US voters' repudiation of the Bush administration in midterm elections Tuesday and the dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Wednesday confirmed the widespread view that President Bush and his policies have done more to tarnish America's image abroad and strain its global relations than any other US president in recent history." The "seismic political shift" in the US was "greeted in many places less with jubilation than with a sense of relief that Americans had at long last come to their senses." The Post adds that "political parties, government leaders, pundits and citizens from many countries seized on the return of a bipartisan government in the United States as a harbinger of welcome change in the Bush administration's policy of using the military."

Bush Reassures Calderon On Immigration Reform. McClatchy (11/10, Hall, Bachelet) reports President Bush "got an earful" from Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon "about immigration restructuring and controversial legislation" that Bush signed authorizing construction of a fence along the US-Mexican border. However, Calderon said he would "try to keep immigration from drowning out other important issues," such as anti-narcotics cooperation and trade. He also expressed hope that "the new composition of the US Congress allows a solution to the (immigration) issues."

The Washington Times (11/10, Dinan, 88K) says Bush gave Calderon "an assurance…that he will push for a broad immigration bill that includes a new guest-worker program and citizenship rights for many illegal aliens." The Times also notes that "although he didn't criticize the fence in his remarks to reporters in the Oval Office," Calderon said "at a later press conference attended by Mexican and Spanish-language press that he told Mr. Bush the fence is a mistake."

Iran Says Tough Sanctions Could Force End To Nuclear Inspections. The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Murphy) reports, "A defiant Iran, calling the Republican defeat in the U.S. elections a 'landmark victory for the Iranian nation,' warned Friday that it would reassess its cooperation with international atomic regulators if the United Nations moved forward with comprehensive sanctions on Iran's nuclear program." Chief nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani was in Moscow trying to win "Russia's support for weakening or postponing the sanctions." He "said Iran remained ready for dialogue and warned against adopting the European group's sanctions resolution." Moscow "proposed significantly scaled-down sanctions amendments that would focus strictly on halting Iran's uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities and prevent the development of missiles to deliver nuclear weapons." The Russian "proposal would leave intact Russia's $1-billion civilian nuclear power plant under construction in the Iranian city of Bushehr, a key focus of Larijani's agenda in Moscow, analysts said."

Rice Urges Russia To Bridge Gap Over UN Sanctions On Iran. Bloomberg (11/10, Johnson) reports Secretary Rice "has spoken twice in the past week with her Russian counterpart to bridge differences over how to stop Iran developing nuclear weapons," Assistance Secretary Sean McCormack said Thursday. Noting that the Secretary has spoken by telephone with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Nov. 8 and also last week, McCormack said, "She's doing her part to get this resolution over the goal line."

When asked if Rice made any progress in her conversations with Lavrov, he said, "We're starting to chip away at some of the issues, but…this is multilateral diplomacy, it takes a little bit of time."

Rice Says US Unfazed By China's Growing Global Role. AFP (11/10) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "played down concerns over the spread of Chinese influence around the globe, saying it was better for China to have friends in the world than enemies." In an interview with Singapore's Strait Times newspaper, Rice said, "I'd like to have China have friends in the world, it's better than having China have enemies in the world. There have been times when we worried about the opposite -- that China would be a destabilizing factor in the world So I would rather see a China that is trying to reach out, that's trying to have friendships around the world." As President Bush prepares to meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao at next week's APEC summit, Rice "said Washington still harbored concerns about China's role."

Friedman Says China To Dominate US Politics In 2008. New York Times (11/10, 1.16M) columnist Thomas Friedman says China is "the country that's most likely to shape US politics in 2008." The rise of China and India, he says, will be the "trend that historians will cite as the most significant" of the current era, and "how the world accommodates itself to these rising powers, and how America manages the economic opportunities and challenges they pose, is still the most important global trend to watch." And while "the Bush team's focus on Iraq and terrorism, coupled with the Democrats' lack of control over either house of Congress, has kept China-US relations largely out of the headlines and on a relatively even keel during the Bush II years," the Democrats' return to control of both the House and Senate "will change that."

US To Resume Training Of Latin American Militaries. USA Today (11/10, Slavin, 2.27M) reports on its front page that "concern about leftist victories in Latin America has prompted President Bush to quietly grant a waiver that allows the United States to resume training militaries from 11 Latin American and Caribbean countries. The administration hopes the training will forge links with countries in the region and blunt a leftward trend."

In "Precarious Position," Ortega Said To Balance Competing Demands. In an analysis of Daniel Ortega's election as president of Nicaragua, the New York Times (11/11, A3, McKinley) reports that, in Latin America, "the stubbornness of old cold warriors in Washington and the equal tenacity of leftist governments in Cuba and Venezuela have kept a miniature cold war going. Just as it was 20 years ago, Nicaragua now finds itself smack in the middle of the conflict with the election this week of" Ortega. He "faces a balancing act no politician would envy, both inside the country and on the world stage." While he must "satisfy his supporters" and "remain friendly with his leftist allies," Ortega "can ill afford to lose more than $50 million a year in United States aid or credit from the International Monetary Fund. Neither can Nicaragua, one of the poorest countries in the hemisphere, jettison the newly approved free trade agreement between Central American countries and the United States. Just to survive economically, this nation of some 5.6 million people needs to continue exporting textiles and fruit to the United States and receiving remittances from Nicaraguans in the north." His "precarious position may explain the careful nuance in his recent speeches," with the Times saying Ortega "is walking very softly and speaking in dulcet tones." He "has taken pains to calm businessmen, assuring foreign investors on Wednesday that he will protect property rights in exchange for help combating poverty," but he has "made it clear that he would not be Washington's lackey." The Administration "has taken a wait-and-see attitude in the face of what seems like two different Ortegas."

White House Adopts "Wait-And-See" Approach With Ortega. The Washington Times (11/10, Gentile, 88K) reports the Bush administration has "adopted a wait-and-see approach toward relations with Nicaragua after the return to power of former White House foe Daniel Ortega." Although some US lawmakers "expressed fears" before Sunday's vote, US officials said "after a clear victory" they would "respect the decision of the Nicaraguan people." State Department spokesman Eric Watnik said the administration is "willing to give the benefit of the doubt" to Ortega.

NYTimes Says Power, Not Ideology, Motivates Ortega. In an editorial, the New York Times (11/11, A14) calls Ortega "an old-style Latin American strongman who, we fear, will further weaken Nicaragua's democratic institutions and retard economic progress. Washington's challenge will be to figure out how to help curb Mr. Ortega's authoritarian impulses without pushing him into Mr. Chávez's arms." Ortega "had to use a series of political maneuvers and dirty tricks to ensure his victory," and, the Times concludes, while he "was once pro-Marxist, now he's pro-Ortega. And that's the problem."

Columnist Praises Advances Made By Opposition Party. Wall Street Journal (11/10, A17, 2.04M) columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady says Ortega's victory "has demoralized Nicaraguans who were hoping that the days of thuggish Sandinista government might be behind them. Yet despite the disappointment of an Ortega comeback, there are reasons not to paint the country with the broad brush of defeat in the aftermath of the election." For example, she says candidate Eduardo Montealegre's Liberal Nicaraguan Alliance (ALN) has "accomplished something big for Nicaraguan democracy by unseating the corrupt PLC as the country's main center-right party and establishing itself as a credible force against the Sandinistas."

Security Council To Vote On Gaza Offensive Resolution. The AP (11/11, Bergman) reports the UN Security Council "will vote [today] on an Arab-backed draft resolution condemning the Israeli military offensive in Gaza and demanding a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the coastal strip, a European diplomat said." That text "was softened somewhat from a version being circulated earlier this week," but "diplomats said Friday there remained concerns among some of the council members about the language of the draft, making passage uncertain." Qatar proposed the text, which "calls for Israel to immediately cease its military operations in the Gaza Strip and withdraw its troops. It also calls upon the Palestinian Authority to take 'immediate and sustained action' to bring an end to violence, including the firing of rockets on Israeli territory." The resolution would ask the UNS to establish a "'fact-finding mission' to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, and asks the international community to restart the peace process with the 'possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations.'"

Haniyeh's Resignation Offer Could Auger Unity Government. The AP (11/11, Barzak) notes Palestinian PM Ismail Haniyeh "said Friday he would be willing to sacrifice his job if the international community would lift economic sanctions that have crippled his Hamas-led government." Those remarks were "the latest indication that the Islamic Hamas group was nearing a deal to form a national unity government with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' moderate Fatah Party that would be made up of independent experts. Such a coalition would presumably present a more moderate face to the world and convince the West to restore hundreds of millions of dollars in international funding." Also, Abbas spoke yesterday with Hamas "supreme leader" Khaled Mashaal, and a Hamas official "said their discussion indicated the sides were nearing agreement."

Merkel Says Berlin Will Revive Quartet Next Year. The Financial Times (11/11, Williamson) reports remarks by German Chancellor Angela Merkel that her nation "will try to advance the Middle East peace process next year by reviving the joint diplomatic efforts in the region by the US, European Union, Russia and the United Nations." She said publicly that "Germany would use its EU presidency from January onwards to breath new life into the Middle East 'Quartet' involving these four international interests." Government "officials said the chancellor's comments reflected frustration in Germany and the EU that the quartet had been largely inactive in recent months, despite the tensions and violence in the Middle East." Merkel's announcement followed repeated suggestions by [Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier] that the quartet structure be revived, in particular to draw Washington into broader international initiatives in the Middle East." He has "argued" that "its mandate could be expanded to include related regional conflicts, such as that between Israel and Lebanon."

Palestinians Protest Attacks As Olmert Seeks Meeting With Abbas. The CBS Evening News (11/9, story 6, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Gaza, tens of thousands of Palestinians took to the streets many calling for revenge following an Israeli attack that killed 18. The shells were meant to take out Hamas rockets, but instead hit several homes. Israel's Prime Minister blames the mistake on a technical failure."

The New York Times (11/10, A3, Fisher, 1.16M) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Thursday said he was "very uncomfortable" and "very distressed" by the incident, and "offered to ease tensions by meeting the Palestinian president 'anytime, anyplace.'" Saying that he had "personally investigated" the artillery strike, Olmert called the shelling Wednesday a "mistake" caused by "technical failure." Olmert also said Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "will be surprised when he will sit with me of how far we are prepared to go. I can offer him a lot." Although he offered no further explanation, the Times says "his words seemed to reflect deep embarrassment at the deaths, mostly of women and children." Abbas did not immediately respond to Olmert's offer.

Olmert Says Israel Won't Stop Targeting Gaza. The AP (11/10, El Deeb) reports Olmert also said Thursday Israel "will keep targeting Palestinian rocket squads in Gaza despite the risk of inadvertently hitting civilians." Although he "regrets the latest deaths," the prime minister said Israel will "press ahead with strikes" against Palestinian militants. Also Thursday, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "picked up the phone and called his main political rival, Hamas' supreme leader Khaled Mashaal," in a move the AP said "could help prevent the Islamic militant group from renewing attacks on Israel and also pave the way for a moderate Palestinian government."

Hamas Has "Big Stake" In Truce With Israel. In an analysis, the AP (11/10, Gutkin) says Hamas' threats to resume attacks inside Israel are "playing well on the Palestinian street, but the group has a big stake in keeping its truce with Israel as it struggles to end a Western aid boycott and transform itself into a legitimate political power. Hamas is already moving ahead with efforts to form a national unity government with the rival Fatah Party," which the AP says "would presumably project a more moderate face to the world."

NYTimes Calls Bush, Rice Responses "Woefully Inadequate." In an editorial, the New York Times (11/10, 1.16M) says though "there have never been easy answers for how to broker peace between Israel and the Palestinians," the "horrifying price of ignoring the problem was made clear again this week when errant Israeli tank shells crashed into a Gaza neighborhood, killing 18 people, including seven children, as they slept." After Hamas's military wing called for retaliatory attacks on American targets, the Times says "analysts were trying to figure out which was the most immediate danger: a new wave of terrorist attacks against Americans, the start of a full scale Israeli-Palestinian war, or a civil war between Hamas and its rival Fatah if talks on forming a unity government fail." In such times, the Times says President Bush's call for "care and restraint" on all sides "seems woefully inadequate. That is also how we would describe Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's sterile tour of the region last month. Since her return, the administration has not taken a single step to revive peace talks." Therefore, it urges Bush "to pledge his prestige and the full resources of his remaining presidency to negotiating a Middle East peace. Even before Mr. Olmert visits Washington next week, Mr. Bush should send Ms. Rice back to the region to broker an immediate cease-fire."

Jerusalem's Gay Community Gathers Under Heavy Security. The New York Times (11/11, A7, Myre) reports, "After Supreme Court rulings, criticism from the Vatican and several nights of rioting by angry opponents, Jerusalem's gay community held a small, orderly rally Friday under a heavy police guard." The "venue was changed twice as the police sought a secure area, well away from an Orthodox Jewish neighborhood where youths have rioted in opposition to the event." The Times calls the event "much more modest than the original plan, which had called for a large march through the city center, and organizers and participants were divided on whether to declare it a full success." The march "was again marked by staunch opposition from Jewish, Muslim and Christian leaders, who rarely find points of agreement. … In liberal, secular Tel Aviv, gay-themed events take place without a ripple. But in Jerusalem, there is always friction," including the cancellation of last year's gay festival because of opposition and the subsequent stabbing of three marchers by an Orthodox anti-gay activist.

Under the headline, "Israeli Gay Rights Parade Called Off," the Los Angeles Times (11/11, Boudreaux) notes, "For days, Israeli television aired images of ultra-Orthodox Jews in black suits and hats, pelting police with stones and setting cars afire in a crusade against a planned gay pride march through Jerusalem." That "battle ended Friday in a setback for Israel's gay community, which bowed to police and rabbinical pressure to take the annual event off the streets and confine it to a stadium. Nearly 4,000 revelers waved rainbow flags and danced to live rock and rap music, but the mood was dampened by a sense of retreat." The controversy over the march "reflected a sharp divide in Israeli society."

government and is not eager to see the tribunal go forward." The Times says the "final draft does not include an earlier mention of the possibility of trials on crimes against humanity. But among the crimes the tribunal can judge, the draft lists acts of terrorism, crimes and offenses against life and personal integrity, illicit associations and failure to report crimes or evidence of conspiracy." The concept "was approved this week by the five permanent members of the Security Council after procedural objections from Russia were met over how the judges and prosecutors were to be chosen." UN prosecutor Serge Brammertz's "investigation has already implicated senior Lebanese and Syrian security officials, though Syria has denied any role." The inquiry "has concluded that the Hariri killing was highly organized and planned by professionals with past experience in such activities."

Emirati Female Cabinet Minister Becomes Role Model For Region's Women. The New York Times (11/11, A4, Fattah) profiles Sheika Lubna al-Qassimi, minister of economy and planning for the United Arab Emirates and the nation's first female Cabinet member. "After decades of pushing the barriers in a region where women have traditionally been kept out of the public sphere, Sheika Lubna now towers as one of the country's most influential women." Hers is "a particularly important position in a nation that is a major oil producer and relies so heavily on foreign investment, and where the economy continues to boom." In spite of her work and travel schedule, "she has remained conscious of her role in chipping away at the restrictions women face in" the Middle East. Noting that the UAE has "one of the fastest growing economies in the Middle East" and is "one of the most open societies in the Persian Gulf," the Times say Sheika Lubna "has sought to prove to women here that they, too, must begin assuming a greater role in public life." Despite being a wealthy aristocrat, she "chose the hard way," studying in California and building a computer programming career in Dubai. The Times adds, "As she set out to advocate for the Emirates, people at home, especially young women seeking to break out of the traditional mold, saw a different message: it was time to rise to the challenge."

Euro Referendum Decision Could Worsen Polish-EU Relations. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A4, Champion, 2.04M) notes Warsaw "plans to hold a referendum on whether to join the European Union's common currency, the euro, in 2010, adding to concerns over the commitment level of the EU's biggest new member." Polish rejection of the euro "would follow a precedent set by Sweden, which has voted not to join the euro despite a legal obligation to do so. But Poland's plan is just the latest move by President Lech Kaczynski and his twin brother, Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski, to put Poland at loggerheads with the EU." Polish officials predict the nation will meet euro entry criteria in 2009. The Journal says "the decision to hold a referendum raises a question about Poland's membership intentions. The referendum would be held in the same year as Polish presidential elections, making the euro issue highly political."

Greek Cypriots Demand EU Renounce Turkish Trade Ban. The Washington Times (11/11, Borowiec) reports, "The battle of wills over Turkey's European Union membership application heightened yesterday after the government of Cyprus warned that the bloc's credibility was at stake if it tolerates Ankara's ban on Greek Cypriot air and sea traffic." Foreign Minister George Lillikas "termed Ankara's refusal to open its harbors and airports to Greek Cypriot ships and planes a 'provocation' which the EU should not tolerate." The EU "has given Turkey a month to liberalize trade links with all 10 countries that joined in 2004, including Cyprus." This week's "stinging" EU report on accession progress "also criticized Turkey's penal code, corruption, human rights record and the interference by the military in politics." EU expansion commissioner Olli Rehn "warned that a one-month deadline given Turkey to change its policy 'is likely to be the last opportunity to make real, serious progress for some years to come' on the Cyprus question, which emerged as a major obstacle in Turkey's EU hopes."

US Pans UN Human Rights Council's Performance. The AP (11/10, Bergman) reports Washington "sharply criticized the new U.N. Human Rights Council on Friday, calling it a 'disappointment' and saying it has failed to address serious violations in its first few months of operation — particularly in Sudan's Darfur region. Sudan responded with a harsh condemnation of the U.S. human rights record and said Washington had no right to judge the effectiveness of the U.N. agency." USUN's Miriam Hughes "criticized the council for a 'slow and discouraging start,' saying it has 'accomplished little that will make a concrete and significant difference in the lives of millions around the world.'" The AP continues, "Referring to the two special sessions the council has held to discuss alleged human rights violations by Israel, she said some nations view the council 'as just another arena in which to play political games.'" In contrast, "speaking on behalf of the EU, Finnish Ambassador Kirsti Lintonen told the General Assembly the council had addressed many important issues since its inception."

US-Russia Deal Clears Way For WTO Accession. Major newspapers gave extensive coverage to the US-Russia bilateral trade agreement that advances Moscow's accession to the World Trade Organization. The Washington Post (11/11, D1, Finn, Goodman) calls its "a landmark trade agreement" that is "substantially advancing Moscow's pursuit of World Trade Organization membership and cementing the position of the former Communist giant in the global economy." The Post calls the deal "a victory for President Vladimir Putin, who has chafed at Russia's exclusion from the WTO," and the Administration "characterized it as a milestone in the evolution of Russia from erstwhile Cold War enemy to a growing trading partner." The Post notes that Russia's "inclusion" in the WTO "would be a major advance in the development of a global body devoted to seeking reduction of tariffs and promoting trade around the world." However, this "deal will not finalize Russia's decade-old quest for WTO membership. The Kremlin still must finish bilateral negotiations with three other countries, Costa Rica, Moldova and Georgia," and the latter "in particular is likely to try to use Russia's desire for WTO membership as leverage in negotiations." The Post adds, "If Russia satisfies Georgia's objections and reaches agreements with Moldova and Costa Rica, it will still confront further multilateral negotiations within the WTO, giving all countries -- including United States -- another chance to extract trade concessions."

The New York Times (11/11, C1, Kramer, Andrews) notes US and Russian negotiators are "crossing the final big hurdle in the stop-and-go cycle that has marked the process since Moscow began its application shortly after the collapse of the Soviet Union." Putin "has repeatedly said that joining the 149-member W.T.O. was a major foreign policy goal, though Russia's oil-driven economy will get few direct gains from membership."

The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A3, Chazan, 2.04M) reports the "landmark deal" is "paving the way for Russia to join the [WTO] -- a goal that Moscow has doggedly pursued for the past 12 years and that has been one of the key objectives of Vladimir Putin's presidency." Such a "breakthrough" would eliminate "a major irritant in relations…that have been strained by disagreements over Iran and U.S. accusations that Russia is backsliding on democracy and human rights and using energy to bully its neighbors." Kremlin "officials said delegations of both countries were trying to make sure the deal would be ready for signing when Mr. Putin and President Bush meet during the [APEC] Forum summit in Hanoi, Vietnam during the week." Joining the WTO "would mark a milestone for Russia, demonstrating to the world that it adheres to the rules of global trade, has eradicated the last vestiges of socialism and is fully integrated into the world economy."

The Financial Times (11/11, Buckley, Beattie, Callan) adds Washington and Moscow "agreed in principle on the terms for Russian [accession], giving a significant boost to Moscow's hopes of joining the 149-nation body after 13 years of talks. … Russia, which has enjoyed an oil-fuelled economic recovery in the past eight years, is the last big market outside the aegis of the WTO." The Times notes, "Analysts had warned any deal could face difficulties winning approval in Congress, particularly after both houses came under Democratic control this week. Congress must repeal the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which subjects Russia's trading status to annual review, to ensure Russia is granted permanent normal trading relations by the US. But a Bush administration official characterised meetings with Democratic leaders on Friday to brief them on the deal as 'positive.'"

The AP (11/11, Aversa) notes, "A longtime economic goal of Russia — entry into the [WTO] — moved a crucial step forward Friday as U.S. and Russian trade negotiators reached agreement." Accession "would mean Russia would receive the same favorable tariff rates for its products as other members. Other countries also would have to follow WTO rules in trade disputes with Russia. And, Russia — a big exporter of oil and gas — would have to abide by WTO's trade rules." Bloomberg (11/11, Drajem, Alison) says a US-Russia deal will remove "one of the last hurdles for an agreement that may add $10 billion a year to the Russian economy." However, "two other obstacles remain: Russia must overcome Georgia's opposition to its entry to the world trade arbiter, and the U.S. Congress must vote to grant Russia permanent, normal trade relations if the two countries are to enjoy all the benefits of the trade opening."

The Washington Times (11/11, A1, Hirsch) adds, "As a [WTO] member, the Russian economy stands to grow by $10 billion annually through increased trade and foreign investment." USTR said the two sides "resolved issues over U.S. meat and poultry exports, and Russia agreed to cut tariffs on manufactured goods… The cuts are expected to help U.S. sales of civil aircraft and parts, medical and scientific equipment, agriculture, power generation, construction equipment, information technology, and chemicals."

Boucher Says Washington Committed To India Nuclear Pact. The AP (11/10) notes Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher "said Friday that Washington is eager to finalize a civilian nuclear pact with India, and urged it to work with neighboring Pakistan in the fight against terrorism when they resume peace talks next week." Boucher "said he was 'very hopeful' the matter would be taken up by the outgoing Senate. 'We want to do it as fast as possible because it is important to the U.S.,' he told reporters in New Delhi." AP says the agreement "is seen as a cornerstone of the emerging alliance between New Delhi and Washington after nearly a half-century of Cold War estrangement," and says it "has strong supporters in both U.S. political parties and was overwhelmingly endorsed by the House of Representatives in July." The pact "reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy by shipping civilian nuclear technology to India in return for safeguards and inspections at certain nuclear plants. Critics say the deal would ruin global nonproliferation efforts."

Court Grants Light Sentences To Vietnamese-American Detainees. The AP (11/11, Mason) reports Vietnamese authorities "defused a political storm yesterday by issuing light sentences to three Vietnamese-Americans convicted of terrorism, preventing the closely watched case from clouding President Bush's visit next week." The Americans were sentenced to time served, as were their four Vietnamese national co-defendants, and will be deported next month. The sedition "case had attracted Washington's attention just before Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice planned to make their first visit to Hanoi for the 21-nation Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit." US Ambassador Michael Marine is quoted saying, "I am certainly pleased that they will be sent home. These individuals have been held for quite some time. That is allowed under Vietnamese law, but 14 months without being brought to trial is a long time for anyone." The AP notes a drawn-out case may have complicated the US Senate's vote to normalize trade relations with Vietnam, a prerequisite to WTO accession.

US Seeks To Revive Free Trade Talks At APEC Summit. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A2, Hookway) reports that, "while North Korea will be in the spotlight" at next week's APEC Leaders Summit, "some substantive negotiating may be taking place on the sidelines to break another international impasse: how to revive global free-trade talks." US officials are "hoping to use the Hanoi gathering … to kick-start discussions on a long-term goal of creating a Pacific-wide free-trade area." While an "initial foray" into such a grouping "foundered" because "there wasn't enough appetite for a separate free-trade agreement focused on Pacific Rim countries," Japan and some others may now back the initiative. The Journal calls the APEC Summit "a useful venue to try to renew momentum for liberalizing trade and call for a resumption of the Doha round. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has already traveled to Vietnam to meet with other Pacific Rim finance ministers and put free trade firmly back in play." However, the Journal adds, "the Asian countries have plans of their own, and they don't necessarily include the U.S."

US Looking For Compromise On UN Force For Darfur. AFP (11/10) reports Washington "said it was considering compromises on the make-up of an international peacekeeping force for Darfur after Sudan rejected demands for deployment of UN troops." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Washington still wanted United Nations "involvement" in the Darfur force, "but he did not reiterate past US insistence the peacekeepers be deployed formally under the world body's banner." McCormack said US officials are "taking a look at how we can address the various concerns that have come up from the Sudanese government, as well as others in the region, about the nature of this international force."

US Figure Skater Selected As Good Will Ambassador. The New York Times (11/10, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) reports, "During the cold war, the State Department called on the Harlem Globetrotters to travel as good-will ambassadors to counter hostile images of America around the world. ... And during these troubled times? America's newest good-will ambassador is Michelle Kwan, the figure skater." The Times notes that "while many of the public diplomacy efforts by the United States in the past few years have been directed toward the Muslim world, it was unclear on Thursday whether Ms. Kwan would be sent to Iraq or Afghanistan."

Samuelson Calls For Candor On Global Warming. In his Washington Post (11/10, A31, 690K) column, Robert J. Samuelson writes that when it comes to global warming, "we need more candor. Unless we develop cost-effective technologies that break the link between carbon dioxide emissions and energy use, we can't do much. Anyone serious about global warming must focus on technological progress -- and not just assume it. Otherwise, our practical choices are all bad: costly mandates and controls that harm the economy, or costly mandates and controls that barely affect greenhouse gases. Or, possibly, both."

Ahtisaari Pushes Kosovo Final Status Plan To 2007. In a brief piece, the New York Times (11/11, A6, Wood) notes former Finnish Prime Minister Martti Ahtisaari "said he would hold back his recommendations — with independence or autonomy as options — until after parliamentary elections in Serbia, called earlier in the day for Jan. 21." While a final status plan "was to have been accomplished by the end of this year," some "diplomats have been concerned that it might increase support for Serbian ultra-nationalists in the elections." The Times adds that "Kosovo's ethnic Albanian leaders are also uneasy," and Kosovo Prime Minister Agim Ceku "said his government might unilaterally declare independence if negotiations fail to give them statehood."

WPost Urges Support For Kosovo Independence. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/10, A30, 690K) notes that the Serbian parliament formally adopted a new national constitution on Wednesday that "included a preamble that would have warmed [Slobodan] Milosevic's heart: a declaration that the province of Kosovo, which Serbia in effect lost seven years ago, is an 'integral' and 'inalienable' part of the country." The Post says, "By incorporating a claim to Kosovo into a new constitution, Serbia's leaders staked out yet another of the reckless nationalist stands that have caused their country so much damage in the past 15 years. They also set the stage for some difficult and potentially dangerous diplomacy between the Bush administration and Russia over the next two months." But the Post warns that "putting off Kosovo's independence would only enrage the province's 2 million Albanians and trigger the Balkan meltdown that the West hopes to avoid. It would also encourage Mr. Putin's growing tendency to use threats -- whether of energy-supply interruptions or violence -- to get his way with the West."

British, Irish Officials Claim Success In Meeting First Ulster Talks Goal. The New York Times (11/11, A7, Quinn) reports British and Irish officials "seized on guarded words of support from Northern Ireland's feuding Protestant and Roman Catholic political parties, saying that enough progress had been made by the first deadline they had set in a timetable for restoring local rule for the province that they could proceed to try to meet the next one." However, "a dispute about policing is casting doubt on whether the Democratic Unionist Party…and the main Roman Catholic party, Sinn Fein, can reach agreement by Nov. 24, when they are to nominate leaders for the power-sharing government." Officials from London and Dublin "said that they were satisfied that party statements had indicated support for a government," and "said that the St. Andrews Agreement remained the basis of reaching their goal."

In more negative tones, the Los Angeles Times (11/11, Murphy) reports, "The first key deadline for implementing a new power-sharing plan in Northern Ireland passed Friday with the parties still at loggerheads, but Britain and Ireland said they were satisfied that the pact 'represents the basis for a political settlement' of the long-running conflict." Sinn Fein and the DUP "only signaled conditional acceptance, apparently stuck on the same issue that has forestalled an agreement from the beginning: the unionist party's insistence that Sinn Fein endorse the local police force — with which its military wing, the Irish Republican Army, was virtually at war for years — before joining the government." Sinn Fein "has said it is prepared to accept the police force once it is assured that concrete reforms are in place, a timeframe is established for handing over control of the police to local authorities, and after the party's membership has agreed to take such a step."

US Military Official Claims Somalia Could Slide Further Into Anarchy. The New York Times

(11/11, A6, Gettleman) carries comments by an anonymous "senior American military official" that "painted a dire picture of the escalating tensions in Somalia." The official "said the United States was at a loss about what to do," and "aid the current situation was even more explosive because it threatened to drag in Somalia's neighbors." The Times notes the nation "once again is at a crisis point, with rising prospects of a major war between the weak, so-called transitional government and the increasingly powerful Islamic forces that rule Mogadishu, the capital." However, the source "did not go as far as saying war was imminent or inevitable. The official and diplomats here in Nairobi have pointed to talks this week between the speaker of the transitional Parliament and top Islamic clerics as a speck of hope."

Norwegian Refugee Council Leaves Darfur. The Washington Post (11/11, A21) notes the Norwegian Refugee Council "said Friday that it was closing its humanitarian operations for nearly 300,000 people in Darfur because it was impossible to work in the troubled region of western Sudan." They "cited 'frequent disruption' of its work, saying it had been suspended five times for a total of 210 days since it started operations in mid-2004." NRC had been running two refugee camps serving a combined 228,000 people. The Post adds, "Aid agencies have repeatedly complained about government interference in their work in Sudan," and "rebels also have been accused of interfering with aid, in some cases by kidnapping aid workers."

WPost Says US Must Reinvigorate Darfur Peace Process. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (11/11, A26) says Sudanese authorities have "proved impervious to U.S. pressure." The regime's "back is against the wall, and it is prepared to be ruthless -- particularly so long as China, Russia and the Arab states provide diplomatic cover." The Administration "should certainly assemble commitments of peacekeeping troops and call Sudan's bluff. But it should also attempt to revive the failed Darfur peace plan negotiated this year, for without peace even a large peacekeeping mission may be doomed." To get the rebels to the table, "the United States needs to work with Sudan's diplomatic enablers in Beijing, Moscow and the Arab capitals." The Post concludes, "Darfur's violence is spilling into Chad and could precipitate the collapse of that country's government. It is also contributing to the risk of renewed north-south fighting. If there is no solution in Darfur, the world will witness Darfur-like atrocities elsewhere on a scale appalling to imagine."

LATimes Says Nigeria's Obasanjo Should Step Down When Term Ends. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/11) calls Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo his nation's "savior, and menace." He "has done more for Nigeria than any leader in its modern history," but his "legacy is endangered" by his attempts to prolong his rule. Obasanjo "has shown a worrying reluctance to step down as planned in April 2007," and that initiative could "perhaps plunge his country into civil war." The Times concludes, "Which course the Nigerian president takes will affect more than his legacy and his nation." Obasanjo "has a chance to become a respected elder statesman who could influence continental politics long after leaving office and bring much-needed international attention and aid to Africa. Or he could be another in a long line of Nigerian despots, cursed by his people and forgotten by history.

LATimes Says Delay In Turkey Bid To EU Would Be "Unfortunate." The Los Angeles Times (11/10, 850K) editorializes, "On Wednesday, the European Commission released a progress report on Ankara's bid to join the European Union. It was highly critical of the pace of Turkey's reforms on issues such as freedom of speech and its failure to recognize Cyprus. Cyprus is indeed the stumbling block of the day, but there is a more fundamental resistance across much of Western Europe to the idea that Turkey could join the EU. The EU is still digesting 10 new Central and Eastern European members with a lower standard of living, and there are some understandable concerns about absorbing 73 million Turks on the continent's periphery." However, the Times says a decision by EU commissioners at a summit in mid-December to "suspend accession talks with Turkey for a year or more" would be "unfortunate — for both sides of this courtship."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senate Seen Unlikely To Approve Warrantless Wiretaps. The AP (11/11, Kellman) reports, "Legislation aimed at President Bush's once-secret program for wiretapping U.S.-foreign phone calls and computer traffic of suspected terrorists without warrants shows all the signs of not moving ahead, notwithstanding President Bush's request this week that a lame-duck Congress give it to him." The AP continues, "Senate Democrats, emboldened by Election Day wins that put them in control of Congress as of January, say they would rather wait until next year to look at the issue. 'I can't say that we won't do it, but there's no guarantee that we're going spend a lot of time on controversial measures,' Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois said Thursday. … In Senate parlance, that means no." The AP adds, "Republicans for months have known that no bill accomplishing Bush's goal could get filibuster-proof support from 60 senators. Sealing off any hope was what Democratic leader Harry Reid put on his lame-duck to-do list. The warrantless domestic surveillance bill was conspicuous in its absence. … As for next year, Bush should not expect Democrats to allow such legislation to pass without language establishing considerable congressional oversight of any expansion of warrantless wiretaps. … 'We have been asked to make sweeping and fundamental changes in law for reasons that we do not know and in order to legalize secret, unlawful actions that the administration has refused to fully divulge,' said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the next Judiciary Committee chairman. 'If legislation is needed for judicial review, then we should write that legislation together, in a bipartisan and thoughtful way.' … The Bush administration has a backup plan. In speeches over the next few weeks, the Justice Department will launch a new campaign for the legislation by casting the choice as one between supporting the program or dropping it altogether -- and appearing soft on al-Qaida. .. .Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will make the eavesdropping program the focus of a Nov. 18 speech at the U.S. Air Force Academy. Kenneth L. Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the national security, will make a similar pitch Wednesday to the American Bar Association."

Social Security Databases A Resource For Terror Probes. The Washington Post (11/10, Roig, Kriva, 690K) reports that since "the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Social Security Administration's vast databases of personal information have become a resource for federal investigators, who have asked the agency to check tens of thousands of records for number misuse and identity fraud -- potential precursors to terrorist activity." From "just after Sept. 11 through 2005, Social Security officials sent prosecutors 456 referrals that were classified as terrorism-related, according to statistics compiled by Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse. The review shows that 91 percent of those referrals led to prosecutions." Only the "departments of Justice and Homeland Security have referred more terrorism-related cases for prosecution, according to the Syracuse records, which are based on data compiled by the Justice Department's Executive Office for United States Attorneys. Still, few if any suspects in Social Security cases are ever linked publicly to alleged terrorist activity. Most cases referred to prosecutors in the months after Sept. 11 involved document fraud by Latino immigrants working at airports." Previous studies "by the Syracuse center found that thousands of cases have been referred by all agencies for prosecution under the labels of 'international terrorism' or 'antiterrorism.' However, senior Justice officials instead usually cite the criminal division's much smaller list of terrorism-related cases, which as of June included 441 defendants and 261 convictions. Most on that smaller list were charged with crimes unrelated to terrorism, an earlier Washington Post analysis found."

Judge Rules Al Arian Must Testify In Virginia Islamic Charity Probe. The AP (11/10) reported, "Sami Al-Arian must testify before a federal grand jury despite claims that a plea agreement freed him from cooperating with the U.S. government, a federal judge ruled. U.S. District Judge James S. Moody Jr. ruled Al-Arian must testify in the probe of International Institute of Islamic Thought in Herndon, Va., because Virginia prosecutors have granted him immunity. In his trial, prosecutors said Al-Arian's World and Islamic Studies Enterprise got money from the Va. Institute."

Radical Cleric's Letter Alleges Torture After CIA Kidnapping. The Washington Post (11/10, A23, Whitlock, 690K) reports that in an "an account smuggled out of prison, a radical Muslim cleric has detailed how he was kidnapped by the CIA from this northern Italian city" of Milan "and flown to Cairo, where he was tortured for months with electric shocks and shackled to an iron rack known as 'the Bride.'" Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, "also known as Abu Omar, wrote an 11-page letter describing his 2003 abduction at the hands of the CIA and Italian secret service agents. He somehow transferred the document out of Egypt -- where he remains in custody -- and into the hands of Italian prosecutors who are investigating his disappearance." The document "has been submitted as evidence to defense attorneys representing 25 CIA officers, a U.S. Air Force officer and nine Italian agents who have been charged with organizing the kidnapping of Nasr, an Egyptian national, in February 2003." In Egypt, "his captors offered a deal: They would allow him to return to Italy if he agreed to become an informant. Nasr said he refused. As a result, he said, he was interrogated and physically abused for the next 14 months in two Cairo prisons."

British Intelligence Tracking Nearly 30 Terrorist Plots. ABC World News (11/10, story 3, 1:11, Gibson) reported on an "alarming claim by the head of Britain's domestic intelligence agency. She said British authorities are tracking almost 30 terrorist plots, involving 200 terror cells and keeping tabs on 1,600 people, many of them home-grown British militants." ABC (Ross): "We're told they're talking about six operational plots that reflect advanced planning, with specific targets and recruits already selected for attacks. The speech by the British spy chief also suggested that, for the first time, British authorities believe this is being run by Al Qaeda central, directly out of Pakistan, with Al Qaeda leaders in control." NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 5, Williams) called it "a distressing report," saying Britain's domestic spy agency MI5 "warns young British Muslims are being actively targeted for recruitment by various terrorist networks."

The Washington Post (11/11, A15, Jordan) reports MI5 is "watching 1,600 people in 200 cells believed to be plotting terrorist acts in Britain or overseas." MI5 Director Eliza Manningham-Buller said, "More and more people are moving from passive sympathy towards active terrorism." Manningham-Buller said a "growing number of people are plotting to kill others and damage the British economy. The conspirators, she said, are motivated 'by a sense of grievance and injustice driven by their interpretation of the history between the West and the Muslim world.'" The AP (11/10, Gardiner) adds that Manningham-Buller said MI5 "had foiled five major plots since the July 2005 transit bomb attacks in London."

The New York Times (11/11, A6, Cowell) reports British PM Tony Blair said the "threat from homegrown Islamic terrorism would last 'a generation,'" reinforcing the "highly unusual warning" from Manningham-Buller. In her remarks, the MI5 chief "also asserted that operatives for Al Qaeda in Pakistan were helping to guide some of the plots, reflecting British assessments that Qaeda operatives survived campaigns against them to steer conspiracies in Britain from afar."

"Hundreds" Of Al Qaeda Fighters "On The Move." The CBS Evening News (11/10, lead story, 2:40, Couric) began with an exclusive report saying that "hundreds of al Qaeda fighters are on the move, moving out of Afghanistan and Pakistan. And the question tonight is, where are they headed and what are they planning? This comes as British intelligence is warning that it's tracking nearly 30 terror plots involving hundreds of people." CBS (MacVicar): "Intelligence agencies have been warned al Qaeda may be planning to attack air and rail travel in Europe during the busy holiday travel season. The warnings come from interrogations of al Qaeda suspects who were recently ordered to leave Afghanistan and Pakistan." In the "last six months, in the mountains and battlefields of Afghanistan, al Qaeda has withdrawn well-trained Arab fighters."

On the CBS Evening News (11/10, story 2, 1:50), anchor Katie Couric also interviewed John Brennan, former head of the National Counter Terrorism Center, asking, "I think some people might be confused, Mr. Brennan, because the Bush administration claims that real damage was done to al Qaeda in Afghanistan, and yet it seems to me that there are other reports that al Qaeda and other similar organizations have been empowered and are stronger than ever. So what's the truth?" Brennan: "I think al Qaeda central, the core, which is in Pakistan-Afghanistan, Osama bin Laden and Zawahiri, that core group really has been bloodied badly. But I think the whole purpose of bin Laden was al Qaeda means the foundation. He wanted it to give birth to other group, to other individuals to carry out attacks. And what we're seeing right now is the proliferation of those individuals."

Judge Refuses To Vacate Al Qaeda Backer's Guilty Plea. The Washington Post (11/11, A12, Markon) reports US District Judge Leonie Brinkema "has refused to throw out the guilty plea of a convicted al-Qaeda supporter who argued that he was illegally spied on through President Bush's controversial warrantless eavesdropping program." Truck driver Iyman Faris pleaded guilty in 2003 to "plotting to bring down the Brooklyn Bridge and launch a simultaneous attack in Washington. He asked a judge to vacate the plea, arguing in part that the alleged surveillance violated his rights and that the government could not use it to build a case against him."

Cleric Claims He Was Kidnapped By CIA, Then Tortured. The New York Times (11/11, A7, Povoledo) reports Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, a "militant Egyptian cleric who prosecutors say was kidnapped" by the CIA, said in an account published in the Italian newspaper Corriere della Sera this week that he was "tortured with electric shocks while he lay on a wet mattress in a Cairo prison and was repeatedly beaten and forced to eat rotten bread in a pitch-black cell, while rats and cockroaches ran over his body." Milanese prosecutors "have appended the account to the case they are building against 39 people, including 25 C.I.A. operatives. Prosecutors accuse them of abducting Mr. Nasr and sending him to Egypt for questioning, in the American practice of rendition."

Torture Issue Was Notably Absent From US Campaigns. The New York Times (11/11, B5, Steinfels) runs a "Beliefs" feature on why US candidates declined to discuss allegations of torture during the just-ended campaign season, saying that torture "is such a stain on personal and national character that nothing but appalling photographs could have forced the subject to the fore. … In a season of shameless attack ads, torture is still too shameful to be debated."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats May Have Hard Time Implementing 9/11 Panel Recommendations. The Washington Post (11/11, A3, Eggen, Hsu) reports Democrats "have vowed to push through a host of reforms recommended two years ago by the Sept. 11 commission, such as better port security and improved radio communications for first responders, but many of the most controversial changes are likely to face obstacles even with Capitol Hill in Democratic hands, according to experts and legislative aides." Homeland security experts said Democratic control "will not guarantee implementation of some of the commission's most controversial suggestions, which have languished because of entrenched political and bureaucratic obstacles. A prime example is the commission's call to base the federal government's homeland security funding on the actual risk of terrorist attacks or other calamities -- an approach that would generally benefit large metropolitan areas at the expense of smaller cities and rural regions. Although such an approach would favor regions represented by Democrats, lawmakers have preferred to spread dollars to as many jurisdictions as possible." Center for Health and Homeland Security Director Michael Greenberger said, "It's easy to say they'll implement the 9/11 recommendations. But some of the recommendations have not been implemented because they've been so hard to swallow."

LATimes Says Customs Laptop Searches Go Too Far. The Los Angeles Times (11/11) editorializes, "It was bad enough for international travelers earlier this year when security officials barred laptop computers from carry-on luggage. Now that the ban has been lifted, a new worry has replaced it: the prospect of U.S. customs agents snooping through your laptop -- and even seizing it. … Stopping bad guys at the border is important, and it makes sense to inspect incoming items, including laptops, for explosives and other weapons. But the government has been using the terrorist attacks of 9/11 to redefine 'reasonable.' There's a clear line between checking a laptop for explosives and reading its contents, and agents should have an excellent reason to cross it."

Louisiana Recovery Program Slow To Get Funds To Applicants. The New York Times (11/11, Eaton) reports on its front page that the "$7.5 billion program to rebuild Louisiana by helping residents repair or replace their flooded homes," known as Road Home, "has gotten off to a slow start, frustrating government officials and outraging many homeowners who say they are still in limbo 14 months after Hurricane Katrina hit." Though nearly 79,000 families have applied, "only 1,721 have been told how much grant money they will receive. And just 22 have received access to the cash, which was provided by federal taxpayers and is being distributed by the state."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Will Reevaluate Strategy In Iraq. Coverage of the planned reevaluation of Iraq strategy centered on the perceived need for change and the ability of uniformed officers to push through their ideas in the absence of outgoing Secretary Rumsfeld. NBC Nightly News (11.10, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It didn't take long -- just a few days after American voters spoke with a unified voice at the polls and today there were already indications this nation's Iraq policy is indeed in for a major change. First, a new boss at the Pentagon and now a new definition of what it means to win in Iraq. It's clear a major change is coming, even while this nation's troops are fighting it out on the ground in Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski): "... the Bush Administration is struggling to come up with a new strategy for Iraq and today Joint Chief's Chairman General Pace on MSNBC described victory as simply reducing the violence to an acceptable level. ... At the same time parts of that new strategy are beginning to take shape. Military sources tell NBC News US commanders are working on plans to accelerate the turnover of more Iraqi territory from Americans to Iraqi security forces. But there is a risk. If the transition comes too fast, some areas could easily fall into the hands of sectarian militias. There are also plans to reverse Debaathification and rehire Iraqi servants whom the US fired three years ago because they were members of Saddam's Baath party." Loren Thompson, military expert: "Under Saddam you didn't get a military post unless you were a Baathist. So when you got rid of a Baathist, you got rid of anybody who knew how to run the country." Miklaszewski: "And a widespread amnesty for insurgents but not those suspected of attacking US forces or those Al Qaeda fighters, but many fear this all may be too late." Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution military analyst: "There's a momentum to this insurgency and the civil war now that no good policy can even reverse even if the policy is correct." Miklaszewski: "Advisors to Robert Gates say many of these proposals should have been adopted two years ago but were rejected then by Vice President Cheney and Secretary Rumsfeld."

The Washington Post (11/11, A1, Tyson, 690K) in a front page article reports, "The Pentagon is conducting a major review of the military's Iraq strategy to determine 'what's going wrong and should be changed' to attain U.S. objectives in the war-torn country, the nation's top general said yesterday." JCS chair Gen. Peter Pace "initiated the review this fall after starkly deteriorating security in Baghdad led commanders there to rule out any significant cut this year in the level of U.S. troops in Iraq -- now at about 145,000 -- according to senior defense officials and sources. ... Pace's comments also could foreshadow a reassertion of influence by senior officers in the wake of this week's resignation by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, according to military officers and analysts. Moreover, some military officers have voiced concern in recent days that if they do not assert a greater role in formulating a future course in Iraq, that course will be defined for them by the resurgence of congressional Democrats, many of whom favor a withdrawal of U.S. troops."

Pace is quoted as praising both Rumsfeld ("a strong advocate") and Secretary-designate Robert Gates ("very talented, dedicated patriot [with] a reputation as a man who gets things done, a man who is collaborative and solicits subordinates' opinions").

The New York Times (11/11, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "In a closely held effort, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has assembled a team of some of the military's brightest and most innovative officers and told them to take a fresh look at Iraq and Afghanistan, among other flashpoints. ... Ideas that have been discussed include increasing the size of the Iraqi security forces, along with the American effort to train and equip them, and adjusting the size of the American force in Iraq. ... The review reflects the recognition that military efforts need to be part of an overall approach that includes all aspects of American power, including diplomatic and economic."

BBC.com (11/11) reports, "Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen Peter Pace said commanders were having their own dialogue and would make the changes that were needed. President George W Bush is to meet members of a panel drawing up proposals for ending the conflict on Monday. Iraq was a key factor in the Republican defeat in mid-term polls and US defence chief Donald Rumsfeld's resignation." The Iraq Study Group "is said to have been looking at two options, both of which would amount to a reversal of the Bush administration's stance. One is the phased withdrawal of US troops, and the other is to increase contact with Syria and Iran to help stop the fighting."

Election Seen As Referendum On Iraq. NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 6, 2:13, Williams) ran an "In Depth" report analyzing this week's elections, asking, "Is the political pendulum on the move in this country? Is the nation changing politically or was this simply a one-time referendum on an unpopular war in Iraq?" Analyst Stuart Rothenberg: "It's far from clear that this is a long-term change in the electorate. Rather it's a reaction to the war in Iraq, to the President's performance and to the short-term desire for change." NBC (Reid): "He does say, though, that in certain parts of the country, shifts are clearly occurring. For example, just as southern Democrats were purged from the House in 1994 when Republicans swept to the power in this election nearly all New England Republicans were purged from the House. And in the Rocky Mountain States where four years ago all eight governors were Republicans, now five are Democrats."

The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Richter, McManus) says the Democratic victories are "b oosting pressure for a bipartisan approach to the Iraq war, a rough consensus is emerging that could lead to a new direction and a gradual U.S. disengagement from the costly conflict. There are those on both sides of the aisle who favor giving the Iraqis firm deadlines for meeting a list of political goals, with the possibility of redeploying U.S. troops if the goals aren't met -- a scenario that could lead to withdrawal."

Rep. Jim Moran, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/10, Matthews), said, "We need a change of command at the White House. This election was about one person and one issue: George Bush and the Iraq war. Corruption contributed to it, but it really was sending a message, and that message was sent as much by independents as it was by Democrats. That's what the Congress needs to do, to show some checks and balances, to see to it that the administration comes up with some exit strategy sooner rather than later."

Sen.-elect Bob Corker said on PBS' NewsHour (11/10, Warner), "We need to fix our strategy in Iraq and start moving ahead again so that Iraqi people can quickly secure themselves so that there's a government there that is accountable. And then we need to bring our men and women home as quickly as possible. So I'm glad that James Baker is working on a strategy that hopefully will upgrade our ability to do that. And I'm looking forward to seeing what that is."

Bush Grants Marine Posthumous Medal Of Honor At USMC Museum Ceremony. ABC World News (11/10, story 5, 0:56, Gibson) reported, "Inspiration today as President Bush honored a young Marine who gave his life in Iraq. At a ceremony for the new National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Virginia, the President said the Medal of Honor will be given to the parents of Cpl. Jason Dunham. He threw himself on a grenade to protect fellow Marines. And the President, today, was visibly moved." Bush: "As long as we have Marines like Cpl. Dunham, America will never fear for her liberty. And as long as we have this fine museum, America will never forget their sacrifice. May God bless you. May God bless the Marines. And May God bless the United States." Gibson: "Today is the Marine Corps' 231st anniversary. And it would have been Cpl. Dunham's 25th birthday."

NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 2, 2:14, Williams) reported on the award and profiled Cpl. Dunham, while the CBS Evening News (11/10, story 7, Couric) reported on the ceremony and the presentation of the Medal of Honor as a lead-in to a feature on what it takes "to become a Marine. … There's no question the training is tough. … But does it prepare young men for what they will face in Iraq?"

On the front page of its Metro section, the Washington Post (11/11, Smith, 690K) reports, "Many traveled thousands of miles for this moment, on the 231st anniversary of the Marine Corps, to gather on a grassy promenade near the Quantico Marine Corps Base, to remember and cry and celebrate the opening of the National Museum of the Marine Corps." The Post describes the museum's contents and quotes President Bush's speech.

The Washington Times (11/11, Lively, 88K) reports on its front page that the ceremony was "nearly 20 years in the making." Former Marine and journalist Jim Lehrer said, "The death rate among Marines in Iraq has been more than double that of the other service." The announcement of Dunham's MOH is also noted.

The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A4, Phillips, 2.04M) reports about the "charismatic" Dunham's posthumous award and describes the battle that cost him his life: "When his attacker dropped a live hand grenade, the Marine made the split-second decision to cover the weapon with his own helmet, shielding two of his men from its full explosive force." The Journal recalls, "Cpl. Dunham's life and death were chronicled in a page-one story in The Wall Street Journal on May 25, 2004."

The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports that Dunham "will be the first Marine to receive the nation's highest medal for bravery for combat since the war in Vietnam. The award ceremony will be at the White House at a date to be selected by Bush and the Dunham family."

CNN.com (11/10) reports, "Dunham will be the second American to receive the Medal of Honor from service in Iraq. Army Sgt. 1st Class Paul Ray Smith was the other, honored [posthumously] for action near Baghdad International Airport in April 2003, in which he killed as many as 50 enemy combatants while helping wounded comrades to safety."

Marines In Iraq Mark 231st Anniversary Of Corps. The New York Times (11/11, Chivers, 1.16M) reports from Outpost Viking, Iraq, "The Marine Corps celebrated its 231st birthday on Friday, an event that passes with little notice outside the corps's insular ranks, but is an essential ritual within, especially now, as the policies guiding the war seem certain to change and the reasons that brought the marines here are less clear." The Times says bleakly of the profiled unit's losses and the allegedly changing mission for the war, "Nearly 15 percent of the battalion's marines have been wounded. Five marines and one of their interpreters have been killed and 31 marines have been wounded seriously enough to require evacuation back to the states. ... the list of reasons for fighting has changed. First it shifted from finding weapons of mass destruction to removing a dictator to building a stable, democratic Iraq. ... many of the marines in the battalion, in their quiet times in the weeks before this day, have said they fight for two things: the corps's tradition and reputation, and for the man on their left and right."

Muhajir Claims 12,000 Fighters In Iraq, Says More Attacks To Come. NBC Nightly News (11/10, lead story, 3:00. Williams) opened with a critical report saying it is "clear a major change is coming" at the Pentagon and in US Iraq policy "just a few days after American voters spoke with a unified voice at the polls." In addition to "troops are fighting it out on the ground in Iraq," NBC (Miklaszewski) said there "was also a new tape released today from Al Qaeda, and although it all sounds very horrifying, US Intelligence officials report tonight that this tape is nothing more than pure propaganda. The voice on the audio claims to be that of the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, al-Muhajir. In a chilling diatribe he warns, we haven't had enough of your blood yet and threatens to blow up the White House. He claims Al Qaeda now has 12,000 fighters in Iraq. He also praised Democrats for their election victory that drove Donald Rumsfeld from the Pentagon. The new threats come as the Bush Administration is struggling to come up with a new strategy for Iraq."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/10, Costello) reported, "Al Qaeda in Iraq's new leader is taunting President Bush and Donald Rumsfeld. In a new audiotape posted on an Islamist website, a man claiming to be Abu Hamza al-Muhajer calls President Bush a lame duck and the outgoing Defense Secretary a coward. And that's not all he says. He also threatens to blow up the White House."

Blair Will Give Evidence To Iraq Study Group. The Financial Times (11/11, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair will next week give evidence to the Iraq Study Group led by James Baker, the former US secretary of state, in the first indication Britain is being consulted by Washington over potential change of policy on the war. ... The decision by the Iraq Study Group to interview Mr Blair is an important boost for Downing Street, amid fears that Britain might be excluded from the US reassessment of Iraq policy following the Democrats' victory in the congressional elections." Blair reportedly "is certain to tell Mr Baker that the US and UK must not "cut and run", remaining in Iraq until Baghdad can manage the security situation on its own. Mr Blair has told allies he is confident that the Baker-Hamilton committee will make no such recommendation."

US Office In Iraq Shelled For Second Time. The Washington Times/AP (11/11, Yacoub) reports, "The U.S. government's office in central Iraq came under mortar fire early Saturday, an attack that touched off a blaze in part of the complex, Iraqi police said. There was no immediate word on damage or casualties. ... The mortar attack was at least the second reported in recent weeks against the U.S. office in Hillah, which oversees government and diplomatic interests in the central Euphrates region, about 60 miles south of Baghdad." The mortar "is growing increasingly popular among Iraqi fighters because it can be fired from a secure location several miles from a target and then quickly hauled away or hidden."

Shays Lays Out Steps For Stabilizing Iraq. Rep. Christopher Shays, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/10, Matthews), said, "There's four things we need to do. The first thing is we need to set a timeline to transfer Iraqis to patrol the streets and get our guys from patrolling the streets. The Iraqis need to start doing the police work. … The second thing we need to do is set timelines for the Iraqis -- the Shias and the Sunnis in particular -- to work out their differences on reconciliation, on de-Baathification, on where the oil goes and federalism. The third thing you need to do is we need to get the six…neighboring countries to come together, Iran included obviously, and say: If we fail, Iraq gets divided into three parts; none of you want that. And finally, I think you need a plebiscite. If two-thirds of the Iraqis aren't going to support our being there and our plan to withdraw, then we leave even sooner. They need to start showing some support for our troops. Otherwise, we just need to leave."

Shiite Clerics Urge Speedy Hanging Of Hussein. The Los Angeles Times(11/11, Roug, 850K) reports, "Addressing worshipers for the first time since the conviction of Saddam Hussein, many of Iraq's Shiite Muslim preachers called Friday for the speedy hanging of the former president. Hussein, a Sunni Muslim who long repressed Iraq's Shiite majority, should be executed in public between two of the holiest Shiite sites in Iraq, a cleric demanded during his sermon in Karbala. ... U.S. officials had hoped the trial of Hussein, toppled in the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, would help unite Iraq. But many now believe the verdict is heightening ethnic and sectarian tensions. Shiites in eastern Baghdad and other areas where they are concentrated cheered the decision in mass rallies as angry Sunni Arabs marched in large demonstrations north of the capital."

National Guard Units Face Second Tours In Iraq. The AP (11/11, Baldor) reports, "National Guard combat brigades that have already served in Iraq may be called for a second tour, likely breaking the 24-month deployment limit initially set by the Pentagon, the Guard's top general said. ... the new plans would, for the first time, send entire Guard combat brigades back to the battlefront. Brigades generally have about 3,500 troops." The AP adds, "In a related move, the Pentagon is preparing to release a list of active units — and perhaps reserves as well — scheduled to go to Iraq that would largely maintain the current level of forces there over the next two years, another senior defense official said Thursday. There are about 152,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. That official requested anonymity because the plan has not been made public." It was "not clear whether this week's resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would affect deployment plans." The Los Angeles Times (11/11, 850K) carries an abbreviated version of this story.

Formerly Touted Tall Afar Struggles To Rebuild. The Washington Post (11/11, White, 690K) reports, "A year ago, U.S. officials championed the military's success in pushing insurgents out of this city in Iraq's northwestern desert, reclaiming it for the roughly 250,000 residents and eliminating an insurgent safe haven. President Bush publicly praised the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's effort." However, "The unemployment rate here is nearly 70 percent. Officials estimate that fewer than half of Tall Afar's residents remained here or returned after the last big U.S.-Iraqi military operation in September 2005. Many of the city's buildings are vacant or were destroyed in the fighting last year. Hundreds of millions of dollars was promised to help rebuild and restore Tall Afar, but the money has just started to trickle in through the Iraqi central government's staggeringly slow bureaucracy. And Iraqi forces have only recently taken the lead in providing security, helped in large part by the population drop and lack of attacks." The Post says with guarded optimism, "Still, the Iraqi forces are out front, while U.S. forces hang back more and more."

Crumbling Iraqi Health Care Worsens Death Toll. The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Roug, 850K) reports in a highly critical , 1,712-word front page article, "Thousands of Iraqis are believed to have died from shortages of medicine, vital equipment and qualified doctors, despite an infusion of nearly half a billion dollars from U.S. coffers into this country's healthcare system, Iraqi officials and American observers say. ... In the most sinister reported development, provincial Sunni Muslim doctors charge that Shiite Muslims who control the Health Ministry deliberately withhold medicines and other vital supplies. Privately, some U.S. officials say that hard-line Shiites use the ministry for political and sectarian ends." Iraqi health care "was once the envy of the region. ... Medicine and hospital care were free, doctors well-educated and respected. But neglect by former President Saddam Hussein and years of United Nations sanctions laid waste to the system."

Restored Baghdad Psychiatric Hospital Serving Traumatized City. ABC World News (11/10, story 4, 2:05, Gibson) ran a feature on a Baghdad psychiatric hospital "full of patients traumatized by the violence in their city and what they have seen take place." The report focused on the impact of the war on Iraq's children. ABC (McCarthy): "The good news is that the hospital is functioning at all. Immediately after the war, psychiatric hospitals in Baghdad were looted and patients abandoned. Today, with US funds, these hospitals have been restored and reequipped."

Navy SEAL Is Founder Of Group For Soldiers' Families. NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 8, Fratangelo) ran a feature on the United Warriors Survivors Foundation, created by Navy SEAL Nick Rocha "for the widows of fallen operation soldiers. They meet twice a year, young, vibrant women whose lives one minute revolved around the military and the next, fell apart. … It hits home for Nick. He knows it could have easily been his family left behind." Rocha: "I can't look myself in the mirror if I don't continue to help these people and their children."

Rumsfeld Could Face Abuse Charges. BBC.com (11/11) reports, "Donald Rumsfeld, who quit as US defence secretary this week, may face criminal charges in Germany for alleged abuses in Guantanamo Bay and Iraq. A complaint has been launched by the US-based Centre for Constitutional Rights, representing a Saudi detained in Cuba and 11 Iraqis held in Baghdad." BBC.com adds, "The Pentagon has not yet commented on the issue. The US denies any torture has taken place at Guantanamo Bay and has defended its interrogation techniques."

The New York Daily News (11/11, Meek, 729K) reports that Time magazine originally broke the story of the plan to have Rumsfeld charged, saying, "Retired Army Col. Janis Karpinski is the star witness backing the detainees, who also name ex-CIA Director George Tenet, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, ex-Iraq commander Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez and retired Gitmo commander Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller. Before Bush demoted her from brigadier general because of the abuse, Karpinski commanded the Long Island-based 800th Military Police Brigade that ran all of Iraq's prisons, including Abu Ghraib."

Fox Report with Shepard Smith (11/10, 8:45 p.m.) broadcasted, "Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld may have to worry about more than what to do with his free time. TIME magazine reports a group of former prisoners plan to file charges against Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other American officials for their treatment at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba and Abu Ghraib in Iraq. TIME says the court papers will be filed next week in Germany. Prosecution witnesses will include the woman once responsible for Abu Ghraib, former Brigadier General Janice Karpinksi. No comment from the Pentagon." This story received light coverage in New York, Washington DC, Raleigh, and Durham.

WPIX- TV New York (11/11, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The New York City-based Center For Constitutional Rights plans to file criminal charges against Rumsfeld in a German court. Alberto Gonzales and George Tenet will be named in a complaint that claims US officials okayed the torture and abuse of suspects in Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib. This first reported by TIME plays."

NC8- TV Washington, DC (11/11, 7:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "A lawsuit has now been filed over prisoner abuse allegedly committed by US military members in Iraq and at Guantanamo Bay. Those targeted by the suit include Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and now former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

WNCN- TV Raleigh, Durham (11/11, 9:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "The lawsuit is based in Germany. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former CIA director George Tenet are also named in the suit. According to a TIME magazine report, the plaintiffs in the case include 11 Iraqis who were prisoners at Abu Ghraib."

FT Recalls Rumsfeld's Statements. The Financial Times (11/11, Sevastopulo) in an analysis piece reports, "Always combative, often charming, sometimes a bully, Mr Rumsfeld introduced a style of Pentagon press conference that both entertained and infuriated." Several of the secretary's elliptical statements are quoted; the FT notes that he "made his name as a poet whose rhetorical musings have been compiled in Pieces of Intelligence: The Existential Poetry of Donald H. Rumsfeld."

Scarborough Slams Bush On Timing Of Rumsfeld Exit. On MSNBC's Tucker (11/10, Carlson), ex-Rep. Joe Scarborough, now an MSNBC host himself, said, "I could not imagine how I would feel were I a Republican congressman who had blindly followed George W. Bush as most Republican congressmen have over the past six years and spent my entire campaign on the stump defending this war, and by extension, defending Donald Rumsfeld, when history of this conflict showed that he made several terrible mistakes…and then to have George W. Bush fire him the day afterward and then hear that this was in the works for quite some time, I would blame my political loss and the end of my political career on George W. Bush. And think about all the party chairmen, all the chairmen in the Republican Party in the House and the Senate that are no longer chairmen because of Rumsfeld. A lot of anger on Capitol Hill, and I think we are going to really see some recriminations. And you're going to have a lot of Republicans that are not going to follow George W. Bush blindly anymore."

Peace Remains "Distant Dream" In Afghanistan. AFP (11/11, Briand) reports in a highly bleak article, "Five years after US-led forces drove the Taliban from Kabul, peace remains a distant dream in Afghanistan with militant attacks at an all-time high, a despondent population and widespread corruption. ... In the eyes of many Afghans the situation is worse than it was five years ago: the cost of living has increased, infrastructure remains deficient and security is still not assured, according to the non-governmental organisation Action Against Hunger."

Musharraf's Reconciliation Efforts Said To Suffer From School Strike. In a 1,300-word analysis piece on its front page, the Washington Post (11/11, A1, Constable, Khan, 690K) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's peace and cooperation agreement with North Waziristan tribal leaders had been "a model for curbing domestic Islamic militancy and cross-border insurgent attacks," but "today that model lies in shreds." The "fragile political peace has been shattered by two devastating attacks: a government missile strike that killed 82 people at an Islamic school in the Bajaur tribal district on Oct. 30, and a retaliatory suicide bombing Wednesday that killed 42 army recruits at a training camp in the Malakand tribal district." The Post says Musharraf "has long been caught between conflicting domestic and international pressures," and his "recent attempt at compromise, a series of negotiated settlements with armed Islamic groups and tribal leaders, has been controversial. Critics charge that pacts in North and South Waziristan left both areas under the control of extremists who continue to export violence to Afghanistan."

Female Soldiers "Just Do Their Jobs." In a Veterans' Day-oriented "Editorial Observer" piece in the New York Times (11/11, 1.16M), reporter Maura Casey recalls her mother's service in World War II and writes, "Yet, despite what women in uniform have accomplished, there are critics who want to curtail their military roles. ... reality has overrun critics' arguments. Between Iraq and Afghanistan, 68 women have been killed in action, and 436 have been wounded, according to the Pentagon's Web site. ... Given the ease of modern communication, from cellphones to e-mail, if women were not measuring up in Iraq, that would have become very clear by now."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fastow Deposition Will Help Shareholders Recover In Civil Suit. The New York Times (11/10, Barrionuevo) reports, "No one sold tickets, but the Andrew S. Fastow show cost a small fortune. … And while it was light on laughs, it even featured window washers who moved in the background like shadowy ninjas before a nervous audience of big-name Wall Street lawyers representing some of the largest banks in the world." The Times continues, "For eight and a half days, Mr. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, held some 70 lawyers rapt in a downtown Houston conference room as he delivered the most expansive deposition yet in a spate of lawsuits stemming from Enron's 2001 collapse. His much-anticipated appearance, which ended on Nov. 2, was the first time an Enron insider had sought to help shareholders recover money in the civil litigation. … Lawyers representing Enron investors have already won settlements for $7.3 billion of the $40 billion shareholders claim they lost in Enron's 2001 collapse. On Nov. 1, the latest settlement — an agreement by Arthur Andersen, Enron's former accounting firm, to pay $72.5 million — was disclosed. … But it is far from clear whether the testimony of Mr. Fastow, a convicted felon who masterminded some of the fraudulent transactions that hid the company's poor financial health, will be enough to push the seven banks that have not settled to the negotiating table."

New California AG To Take Fresh Look At H-P Case. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A2, Anders) reports, "The criminal prosecution of former Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia Dunn -- who is due to be arraigned on Friday -- could get a fresh look from one of California's best-known politicians." The Journal continues, "On Nov. 7, California voters picked Democrat Jerry Brown -- the former governor and presidential candidate -- to be the state's next attorney general. Mr. Brown, who is currently mayor of Oakland, will begin his new job Jan. 9." The Journal adds, "As attorney general, Mr. Brown will have ultimate authority in deciding how to proceed with People vs. Dunn, a case filed in state court in San Jose last month by William Lockyer, the current AG. The state's case focused on allegedly improper techniques used by H-P and its agents to gather phone records and other personal data for an investigation of boardroom leaks. … Mr. Lockyer took a negative view of H-P's conduct. 'One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way,' he said in an Oct. 4 briefing about the state's case. 'In this misguided effort, people inside and outside H-P violated privacy rights and broke state law.' … Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said he expects the Dunn case will be "a candidate for review" by Mr. Brown, 'if only to get him up to speed on the evidence we gathered and why we brought the case.'"

Three Qwest Officials Cash In Stock Options. The AP (11/11, Press) reports, "Three executives at Qwest Communications International made more than $43 million by cashing in stock options, according to regulatory filings." The AP continues, "The chief executive, Richard C. Notebaert, made a profit of $18.4 million and the chief financial officer, Oren G. Shaffer, made $18.5 million, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing. .. .The chief legal officer, Richard N. Baer, made a $6.4 million profit, according to documents filed earlier this week. … A Qwest spokesman, Nicholas Sweers, said that Mr. Notebaert planned to donate his after-tax proceeds to charities. Mr. Sweers did not identify the charities. .. .Mr. Shaffer and Mr. Baer have not revealed any plans for their proceeds." The AP adds, "The sales were disclosed about a month after Qwest's founder and largest shareholder, Philip F. Anschutz, contracted to sell 80 million shares through 2010. … Mr. Sweers said the executives retained substantial stock options. With Qwest share prices up by more than 80 percent year-over-year, 'all shareholders have been rewarded by the company's financial and operational performance,' Mr. Sweers said. … Qwest has announced plans to buy back up to $2 billion worth of its stock over two years."

SEC, Accounting Board To Discuss Change To Sarbanes-Oxley Component. The Washington Post (11/11, D1, Johnson) reports SEC and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board members will meet tomorrow to discuss ways to overhaul a section of Sarbanes-Oxley "that business groups have targeted as overly expensive." The component, "which requires companies to review their financial controls and to have auditors pass judgment on them, spilled into public view this week after the release of portions of a letter by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox proposing changes." The "exact language in Cox's letter has not been made public," but "speculation raged after reports suggested that Cox had proposed that small and mid-size companies could avoid reviews of their internal controls altogether or that regulators could render the reviews virtually useless by significantly heightening the standard for what kinds of transactions were important enough for auditors to assess." The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B3, Burns, Smith) reports in a speech Friday, Cox "repeatedly criticized the current regulatory setup as 'antiquated,' 'redundant,' 'needless and often harmful.'"

SEC To Propose Further Hedge Fund Limits. Bloomberg (11/11, News) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission will propose rules next month raising asset requirements for investing in hedge funds after one fund, Amaranth Advisers, lost $6.5 billion on bad natural gas trades." Bloomberg continues, "The changes will be proposed to the S.E.C.'s five commissioners at a December meeting in Washington, the agency chairman, Christopher Cox, said yesterday. He did not specify how the agency might limit the pool of hedge-fund investors. … 'We're going to make it very clear that hedge funds are risky investments that are not for mom and pop by fencing it off with higher standards to accrediting investors,' Mr. Cox said in an interview." Bloomberg adds, "Hedge funds are open to individuals with at least $1 million in assets or at least $200,000 in income for the last two years, and also institutions like insurance companies, mutual funds and pension funds. Since Amaranth collapsed in September, lawmakers have become increasingly concerned that a hedge fund meltdown could put pension fund investments at risk. … Mr. Cox said at the meeting on Dec. 13, the S.E.C. would also propose a hedge fund anti-fraud rule as well as new guidelines to help companies and auditors interpret the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law in a way that saves time and money."

Cuomo May Not Follow Spitzer's Lead In Pursuing Corporate Wrongdoers. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B1, Davies) reports, "Soon, there will be a new sheriff in town. … New York state's departing attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, used the once-provincial job to propel himself onto the national stage: Applying little-known state laws, he crusaded against bad behavior in mutual funds, banking and the insurance businesses, forcing billions of dollars in penalties. He also took on business titans such as Dick Grasso, the former head of the New York Stock Exchange, charging that he was overpaid." The Journal continues, "His successor, 48-year-old Andrew Cuomo, inherits an office that has been transformed. Now everyone is waiting to see how Mr. Cuomo, who was elected on Tuesday in a landslide, plans to wield his power. … In an interview, Mr. Cuomo, the son of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, signaled that he intends to be different from Mr. Spitzer. Unlike the hard-nosed Mr. Spitzer -- who in his office keeps a picture of Teddy Roosevelt, another New York maverick, who famously crusaded a century ago to break up monopoly businesses like Standard Oil -- Mr. Cuomo said he works best 'collaboratively.' Mr. Cuomo said his top priorities are to clamp down on Medicaid fraud, the sale and use of illegal guns, and government corruption. … 'Just the way Eliot exposed corruption on Wall Street, the attorney general has a responsibility to expose corruption in government,' Mr. Cuomo said. He plans to go after big business whenever necessary, but said times have changed since the widespread scandals that erupted after the stock-market bubble burst earlier in the decade. Mr. Spitzer, he said, filled a void left by federal regulators who were slow to respond to questionable business practices."

Korean Probe Of Lone Star Deal Hits Snag. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B2, Santini) reports, "South Korean prosecutors are hitting some stumbling blocks in their investigation of Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and its 2003 acquisition of Korea Exchange Bank, even as a recent assessment by Korean tax authorities almost wiped out the bank's earnings for the latest quarter." The Journal continues, "Tuesday, the Seoul Central District Court rejected prosecutors' second request for arrest warrants for Lone Star Vice Chairman Ellis Short, General Counsel Michael Thomson and country head Paul Yoo, citing lack of evidence regarding warrant petitions for the first two men. Regarding Mr. Yoo, who resides in Korea, the court said he didn't pose a flight risk and wasn't likely to destroy evidence gathered by prosecutors. … Then, Thursday, in an apparent sign of frustration, prosecutors emailed a seven-page document to about 3,000 prominent Koreans, including lawyers, academics and journalists, criticizing the court's rebuff as hampering the investigation." The Journal adds, "Also Thursday, the prosecutors issued a summons to Messrs. Short and Thomson demanding they appear in Seoul Monday. A lawyer for Lone Star described the summons and the mass email as attempts to justify the third application to the court. … It is unlikely that Messrs. Short and Thomson will travel to Korea on short notice, the lawyer said, adding that Mr. Thomson has met with prosecutors in Seoul several times and as recently as last month."

CRIMINAL LAW:

High Court To Consider Missouri Sentencing. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (11/11, Sichko) reports, "Mario Claiborne faced a likely prison sentence of 37 to 46 months as he stood before a U.S. District Court judge in March 2005. … That was the recommended range for a prison term under federal sentencing guidelines. But Judge Carol E. Jackson chose to knock nearly two years off the prison term for the 21-year-old St. Louisan, who had pleaded guilty to two cocaine-related offenses." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Claiborne's case now sits before the Supreme Court, which will answer a central question: How does a judge adequately justify a sentence that's well outside the prison term recommended by federal guidelines? … The court agreed last week to hear Claiborne's case, along with a similar case from North Carolina. That case raises the question of how much weight should be given to the advisory guidelines and whether a sentence within the suggested range can automatically be presumed 'reasonable.'" The Post-Dispatch adds, "Lower courts have divided over those issues since the court decided last year to make the guidelines advisory, not mandatory. While district courts were no longer bound by those guidelines, they were still required to take them into account. … In the 2005 opinion, issued before Claiborne was sentenced, the 5-4 Supreme Court majority said it hoped the changes would help 'avoid excessive sentencing disparities' while maintaining a level of flexibility. But two justices in that majority, swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor and then-Chief Justice William Rehnquist, are no longer on the court. … Now, the court will re-examine that decision for the first time and seek to clarify whether a presumption of 'reasonableness' given to sentencing guidelines actually implies that they're more 'mandatory' than 'advisory.'"

FBI Agent's Article Puts Murder Case At Risk. The AP (11/11) reports, "The man accused of killing a University of Vermont student from Arlington, Va., is asking a judge to dismiss the charges because an FBI agent wrote a newspaper opinion piece about the case that referred to the suspect as 'evil,' a 'sexual predator' and a 'two-legged hyena.'" The AP continues, "In the opinion piece, which appeared Wednesday in the weekly newspaper Seven Days, the agent wrote anonymously and described his personal reaction during the search for the man accused of killing 21-year-old Michelle Gardner-Quinn. … David Sleigh, the attorney for suspect Brian Rooney, filed a motion Wednesday after the article appeared. He said the article made it impossible for Mr. Rooney to get a fair trial. … 'Agents of the state have deliberately disseminated highly inflammatory and prejudicial comments to the press,' Mr. Sleigh said in a three-page motion." The AP adds, "Mr. Rooney has pleaded not guilty to a charge of aggravated murder for the Oct. 7 abduction, assault and killing of Miss Gardner-Quinn after the two met by chance in downtown Burlington. … If convicted, Mr. Rooney, 36, of Richmond, Vt., could be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole."

Judge Declares Mistrial In Online Fraud Case. The Washington Post (11/11, D01, Johnson) reports, "A federal judge declared a mistrial in the fraud case against former PurchasePro Inc. chief executive Charles E. Johnson Jr. after his attorney successfully petitioned to withdraw nearly three weeks into the case, according to court records." The Post continues, "The prosecution of Johnson, an entrepreneur who came under government scrutiny for engaging in questionable last-minute advertising deals with America Online Inc. during the Internet boom, will be separated from the case against three other defendants in the Alexandria trial. Johnson will be tried separately, U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. ruled Thursday." The Post adds, "The exact reasons for the mistrial remained under court seal, although two sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the judge's order said they pertained to allegations of misconduct by Johnson, 45, a tough-talking former college basketball player. Johnson, who is known by his nickname 'Junior,' did not return calls to his cellphone yesterday. … In opening statements to the jury last month, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles F. Connolly accused Johnson of directing subordinates to destroy e-mail messages, computers and other evidence and suggested that Johnson, whose father was a policeman and former security company operator, had threatened employees who failed to bend to his will." The Post notes, "Johnson denied the charges against him and argued that he put his wealth and his health on the line in an ill-fated attempt to save PurchasePro, his Las Vegas software company. … Johnson's former lawyer, onetime Washington federal prosecutor Preston Burton, yesterday declined to comment, citing ethical strictures. Burton, of the law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, appeared in court Thursday morning for sealed proceedings related to the mistrial, according to the court docket."

Former Congressional Aide Discusses Posting Foley Emails On Blog. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Levey, 850K) reports former congressional aide Lane Hudson "had no idea he would bring down a congressman when he sat in his living room and turned on his laptop one Sunday morning nearly seven weeks ago." Lane, "who is gay, had been railing for weeks on his anonymous blog against congressmen who sexually preyed on young people. That day in late September, he decided to post a series of suggestive e-mail exchanges between Rep. Mark Foley and a male former congressional page." Hudson said, "I thought, 'Here we go. Let's see what happens.'" The Times adds, "Within days, he had his answer. Foley, a six-term Florida Republican, resigned in disgrace. And Hudson had launched the biggest Washington sex scandal since Monica S. Lewinsky." Hudson "remained anonymous throughout the fall as the scandal raged and GOP leaders complained of a Democratic conspiracy. Then two weeks ago, he was unmasked by bloggers, who identified him as an organizer for a national gay rights group; Hudson was fired." In an interview, Hudson "fiercely denied a preelection plot. Rather, he said, he was driven by genuine anger at a corrupt environment that protected the powerful on Capitol Hill." Hudson said, "It's the Washington culture that allowed this to happen. Now we know the FBI, a host of media organizations, Republican leadership — all were in possession of this same information. And no one did anything about it." Eleven years earlier, "as an 18-year-old congressional intern, Hudson had been approached by Foley at a Capitol Hill bar, Hudson said. The congressman asked Hudson for his e-mail address and started sending him invitations to drinks and meals."

Four Plead Guilty To Northwest ALF, ELF Arsons. The Oregonian (11/10, Denson) reported that on Thursday, Jonathan Paul, "a leading voice in the nation's radical movement to protect whales, wild horses and wilderness areas, was one of four people to plead guilty to conspiracy for their roles in a five-year campaign of sabotage in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado. The four were snagged by the largest investigation of eco-sabotage in U.S. history, an 18-crime inquiry into arsons and vandalism the government dubbed 'Operation Backfire.'" The Oregonian notes that ALF and ELF "are characterized by the FBI as the nation's leading domestic terrorist threats. … At a press conference in Portland, U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut and Robert Jordan, the FBI's special agent in charge for Oregon, declared victory. 'These people claimed they did what they did to protect the environment,' Jordan said. 'Along the way, they destroyed more than $30 million worth of resources. They spent year after year using violence to try to intimidate you and your government into their twisted way of thinking.'"

The Seattle Times (11/10, Bernton) reports the pleas raised "the possibility that the Justice Department's largest-ever prosecution of ecosabotage will wrap up without a trial. Since the first arrests in December, the federal government in Washington and Oregon has obtained 12 guilty pleas," only California violin teacher Briana Waters "still is preparing for a trial" for allegedly "acting as a lookout in the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Urban Horticulture Center." The Times adds that Thursday's pleas "prompted Robert Jordan…to declare victory in a decadelong effort to track down and prosecute the stealthy arsonists of the ELF and ALF. … 'Instead of using reason and logic, they used fire bombs and destruction. Instead of using peaceful, lawful methods they used fears and threats,' Jordan said in Portland."

The Eugene Register-Guard (11/10, Bishop, Steves) reported, "In public statements, two of the defendants expressed their regret for crimes they now consider misguided deeds done out of deep devotion to environmental causes." Defendants Daniel Gerard McGowan, Nathan Fraser Block and Joyanna Zacher "may get eight-year prison terms," while Paul "may get a five-year term." At the Thursday press conference, "Immergut called the four guilty pleas the conclusion of 'the largest case of domestic terrorism in United States history,' later amending that to say it was the largest case of eco-terrorism." The Register-Guard noted, "Jordan disputed a reporter's assertion that it took a long time to solve the case. He noted how the cell took extreme measures to avoid leaving behind any DNA or fingerprint evidence. He also noted their deep commitment to secrecy."

The AP (11/10, Barnard) noted Immergut said the pleas "have effectively dismantled the Northwest cells of the organizations operating loosely under the mantles of ALF and ELF," and Jordan declared, "Today we can declare victory in that fight." The Medford Mail Tribune (11/10, Fattig) reported, "Two months ago, their defense attorneys had asked the federal government whether warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency had been used against the defendants. Assistant U.S. Attorney Kirk Engdall denied the NSA surveillance was a factor in the investigation or the plea agreement," but "Amanda Lee, an attorney representing McGowan, said Thursday she believed it was a factor, given the timing of the plea agreements."

Wales Murder Material Witness Failed Polygraph About Gun Barrel. The Seattle Times (11/11, Carter, Miletich) reported, "A Bellevue gun collector questioned in the 2001 slaying of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales has failed an FBI polygraph test about whether he owned two gun barrels that were the same type as the one used in the shooting, his lawyer said Thursday" at a bail hearing. "Albert Kwan agreed to the polygraph test last month after he was indicted and jailed in a different case for illegal possession of a machine gun." US District Judge Thomas Zilly "released Kwan from custody on the condition that Kwan post a $250,000 bond. Zilly also ordered Kwan to wear a location monitor, not possess firearms, and surrender his Hong Kong, British and U.S. passports." The Times notes, "FBI agents do not believe Kwan shot Wales, but want to know if he provided the gun barrel to someone who did." The AP (11/11) also reported on the story, largely drawing from the Times article.

Former LAPD Spokesman Indicted On Child Sex Abuse Charges. The Los Angeles Times (11/10) reported, "Former Los Angeles police spokesman Roderick 'Rod' Bernsen was indicted Thursday on two felony counts of 'abusive sexual contact' stemming from an alleged incident with two 12-year-old boys in a cruise ship sauna." Bernsen "was arrested Oct. 7 after the boys told the FBI that he had tried to talk with them about sex and then touched one boy's penis with his toe and spanked another's bare buttocks, according to an affidavit." The Times added, "Bernsen's attorney, Alan Rubin, said his client was innocent."

Former LATimes Reporter Names Ovitz In Pellicano Suit. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Blankstein, Krikorian) reports, "A former Los Angeles Times reporter has alleged in a civil lawsuit that onetime Hollywood power broker Michael Ovitz participated with indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others to intimidate and threaten her." The Times continues, "The former reporter, Anita M. Busch, originally filed the civil lawsuit in 2004 in which she identified Pellicano, several of his associates and numerous unnamed defendants as responsible for an alleged campaign of 'threats, intimidation, harassment and invasion of privacy for the purpose of deterring ... and retaliating against [Busch] for investigating and writing articles about the entertainment business.' … An amendment to the civil complaint, filed Monday in Los Angeles Superior Court, states that one of those unnamed defendants — identified earlier as 'Doe 4' — is Ovitz, who co-founded one of Hollywood's best known talent agencies, Creative Artists Agency." The Times adds, "Beyond naming Ovitz, Busch's filing does not detail any alleged actions by Ovitz. … The suit says only that he is one of dozens of defendants who were involved in 'directing, organizing, commanding, employing and/or hiring individuals to engage in the unlawful and tortious conduct.' … In a brief statement, Ovitz's attorney, James Ellis, said: 'My client had nothing to do with this. It's unfortunate that Ms. Busch has chosen to involve him in this matter.' … Ovitz has previously acknowledged that his outside law firm hired Pellicano to assist in the defense of three lawsuits filed in 2002 against Artist Management Group, a second talent agency established by Ovitz. Pellicano was paid $75,000 for that work."

Microsoft Targets Piracy In Developing Countries. The Financial Times (11/11, Leahy) reports, "Microsoft needs to do more to crack the consumer market in developing countries, with piracy and affordability holding back sales in regions ranging from Asia and eastern Europe to Latin America, its chief executive told the FT." The Times continues, "Steve Ballmer said the group had launched initiatives such as XP StarterEdition, a Windows software package with reduced features, and Flexgo, a pay-as-you-go PC, but these had not yet signficantly penetrated the middle-income markets in countries such as India and China. … 'On a per-cent basis, it [emerging markets] is the most rapidly growing part of our business but it's still a relatively small percentage. We have two issues: number one is where are the PCs and number two is piracy rates are also high in so-called emerging markets,' Mr Ballmer said in an interview in Mumbai." The Times adds, "Microsoft declined to provide a breakdown of its revenue by region or product. But Mr Ballmer, in Mumbai on a three-day visit to India, said emerging markets globally accounted for roughly 20 per cent of its total business, excluding software sales to hardware vendors, Xbox and other revenue streams such as advertising. .. .Total revenue in the year ended June was $44.282bn. While this was growing rapidly, the company could do better to reach middle-income consumers in developing countries. The company has sold only about 1m copies of Windows XP Starter since it was first piloted in 2004, most of these through government-sponsored programmes."

CIVIL LAW:

US Settles Civil Case Against BetOnSports. The AP (11/11, Leonard) reports from St. Louis, "U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway reached a settlement with online gambling company BetOnSports PLC that permanently bars the London-based company from accepting any bets from the United States." The AP continues, "The lawsuit has been closely watched by the online gambling industry, which generates about $6 billion annually in the United States." The AP adds, "The settlement announced Thursday ends a massive civil case Hanaway filed this summer. It does not affect a criminal case still pending against several BetOnSports employees, including Chief Executive David Carruthers, who remains under house arrest in a St. Louis suburb. … Carruthers faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges. His case is scheduled to go to trial early next year. BetOnSports fired him soon after he was arrested in July. … Hanaway spokeswoman Jan Diltz said the U.S. Attorney's Office would not comment on the civil settlement because the criminal case is ongoing."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Probe Oregon Hospital Where "Cuckoo's Nest" Was Filmed. The AP (11/11) reports from Portland, OR, "Federal investigators are looking into patient care at the hospital made famous in the movie 'One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest,' where there have been reports of abuse, short staffing and overcrowding." The AP continues, "The Oregon State Hospital is one of the oldest and most dilapidated state mental institutions in the nation. The movie was filmed there in 1975." The AP adds, "Justice Department officials are expected to visit the hospital next week. The department alerted Gov. Ted Kulongoski in June that it would investigate whether patients' constitutional rights were violated. … It's unclear how long the investigation could take. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said she could not discuss the timeline or details of the investigation."

El Paso Task Force Targets Human Trafficking. The El Paso (TX) Times (11/11, Gilot) reports, "Photographs of men, women and children filled the screen. But they didn't tell the whole story." The Times continues, "A shy Chinese boy is pictured. He was forced to work in restaurants in El Paso and North Carolina. … A young woman poses on a stationary bike. She was lured into the sex trade from her native Uzbekistan. … Two middle-aged couples smile at the camera. The pair on the left were deaf and mute victims of human traffickers. On the right were the traffickers. … 'You have to look beneath the surface. You'll not know it when you see it,' Brandy Gardes, an assistant U.S. attorney in El Paso, told hundreds of law enforcement officers and social workers at a conference last month in El Paso." The Times adds, "Officials have called human trafficking one of the toughest crimes to tackle. … It is hard to identify and hard to prove. Victims are often too scared to speak out. And the public and juries have a hard time believing slavery still goes on in the United States. … The U.S. Department of State estimated that 18,000 to 20,000 people are trafficked into the United States each year and held by force or coercion for sexual slavery and forced labor. Between 2001 and 2005, the Justice Department prosecuted fewer than 150 alleged traffickers. … There are no figures for El Paso, but it was chosen by the Justice Department as the site of one of 18 new human-trafficking task forces in the nation as part of a far-reaching effort to bring the problem out of the shadows."

Video Shows Two LAPD Officers Beating Suspect. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Winton) reports, "Two Los Angeles police officers were under investigation today for allegedly beating a man during a videotaped arrest in Hollywood that LAPD Chief William J. Bratton called 'disturbing.'" The Times continues, "The video of the Aug. 11 incident, posted on the YouTube website, shows one of the officers holding down William Cardenas, 24, as the other officer places his knee on the man's throat and punches him in the face six times. … Cardenas, who is lying on his back, is heard yelling, 'I can't breathe!' … He was arrested on suspicion of using violence or threats to prevent an officer from performing his duty and was charged with two counts of resisting arrest, said LAPD Lt. Paul Vernon. … Cardenas remains in custody." The Times notes, "The tape was photographed by an unnamed neighbor who gave it to B. Kwaku Duren, a lawyer who represents Cardenas. … Bratton cautioned that the videotape only reflected a part of the struggle with Officers Alexander Schlegel and Patrick Farrell, who is seen punching Cardenas."

The Washington Post (11/11, A02, Geis, Harris) reports, "It was an uncomfortable echo of earlier Los Angeles Police Department scandals, including the videotaped Rodney King beating. The department, which operates under a federal consent decree, has instituted many reforms but has periodically suffered through police brutality embarrassments." The Post continues, "The lawyer for the suspect shown in the video said his client's experience shows little has changed. 'The Los Angeles Police Department needs to make those reforms real, because they have not been made real,' B. Kwaku Duren said at a news conference in front of police headquarters Friday. 'That video speaks for itself.'"

USA Today/AP (11/11) reports, "An FBI investigation prompted by video footage of a man being punched repeatedly in the face by police has demonstrated anew the power of the Internet sensation of the year, YouTube.com. … In addition to being a monumental time-waster around the office, YouTube could also become a tool for keeping police honest, some say." The AP continues, "This week, a clip on the post-it-yourself video website triggered a police-brutality investigation by the FBI. The footage shows the Aug. 11 arrest of alleged gang member William Cardenas, 24. Two Los Angeles officers can be seen holding him down on a Hollywood street; one punches him several times in the face before they are able to handcuff him. … The Los Angeles Police Department is also investigating the officers' conduct. … Cop Watch LA, a police watchdog group, posted the video on YouTube, said organizer Joaquin Cienfuegos. Cienfuegos said the video was shot by a neighbor of Cardenas with a cellphone camera. The neighbor gave it to Cardenas' family, who then gave it to Cop Watch, according to Cienfuegos." The AP notes, "In recent months, videos posted on YouTube have rocked political campaigns, brought fame — or infamy — to previously unknown talents and cast unwanted attention on the gaffes of the famous. YouTube and similar video sites are also increasingly becoming repositories for videos that purport to detail wrongdoing by police."

Texas Landscapers Cause Dispute By Refusing To Do Business With Gay Clients. The New York Times (11/11, Blumenthal) reports from Houston, "Last month, a local landscaping firm prompted a furor here by telling a gay couple in an e-mail message, 'We choose not to work for homosexuals.' … The message quickly made its way around the Internet, and the company, Garden Guy Inc., was bombarded with threats and hate mail. But since then, the company's owners say they have gained far more business than they have lost." The Times continues, "In an interview Friday, Sabrina Farber, 34, co-owner of the company with her husband, Todd, 37, said the company had picked up $40,000 in new business in the past two weeks, while losing only two clients worth about $500 each a year. … 'I'm not saying that to gloat,' said Mrs. Farber, who described the frenzy as ugly and emotionally draining. But she said they would not do it differently and deserved credit for not masking their refusal with excuses. … 'Why can't people handle it when you say the truth?' she said." The Times adds, "One of the two gay clients, Gary Lackey, said, 'We're hoping things would die down' and declined to comment further in a telephone interview. The other member of the couple, Michael Lord, did not return a call. … The law appears to be on the Farbers' side, said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas. … 'The federal law of public accommodations says if you hang out a shingle or open your door you don't get to say, "Only to whites,"' Ms. Graybill said. But sexual orientation is not protected. And while some localities, like Seattle, have adopted ordinances extending antidiscrimination protection to gay men and lesbians, she said, Houston has not."

Massachusetts Legislature Apparently Kills Same-Sex Marriage Ban. The New York Times (11/10, Belluck, 1.16M) reports Massachusetts lawmakers, in "the only state where same-sex marriage is legal, dealt what appeared to be a fatal blow Thursday to a proposed constitutional amendment to ban it." In a "flurry of strategic maneuvering, supporters of same-sex marriage managed to persuade enough legislators to vote to recess a constitutional convention until the afternoon of Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session." On that day, "lawmakers and advocates on both sides said, it appeared likely that the legislature would adjourn without voting on the measure, killing it." Gov. Mitt Romney "said the vote was a 'triumph of arrogance over democracy.' He said that he would 'explore any alternatives' to try to force a vote, but that 'my options are limited.'"

NYTimes, LATimes Concerned About SCOTUS Actions On Abortion. The New York Times (11/11, A14) editorializes, "The Supreme Court unnecessarily returned to the politically charged area of abortion this week, hearing arguments in a case testing some of the core principles of Roe v. Wade and the court's own credibility as an institution removed from politics. At issue, once again, is a deceptively broad ban on so-called partial-birth abortions." Justice Anthony Kennedy "is likely to decide this case. In 2000, Justice Kennedy joined those who would have upheld the Nebraska law. But at oral argument his questions suggested that he may take issue with Congress's assertion that the ban would not put women's health at risk -- an encouraging sign. Even justices who oppose abortion rights need to be concerned about that. They also need to worry about how the court will look if the recent change in its membership produces a starkly different result on an issue so vital to women's privacy and health."

The Los Angeles Times (11/11) editorializes, "Anti-abortionists have been craving a test case to put before the U.S. Supreme Court, in hopes of overturning Roe vs. Wade -- and thought they had it when the South Dakota Legislature passed a ban on abortion. Instead of challenging the law in court, though, pro-choice forces cleverly put the matter to a popular referendum. Even in that socially conservative, anti-abortion state, a decisive majority Tuesday preserved a woman's right to choose. … The voters have spoken resoundingly on abortion and the right to privacy. Those who want to turn government into Big Brother need to heed the message and give it up."

Law Professor Says Election Officials, Not Machines, Are The Problem. In a New York Times (11/11, A15) op-ed, Loyola Law School's Richard Hasen writes, "As election mishaps hindered voting on Tuesday from Cleveland to Denver, some people were already calling for giving up on the new electronic voting machines, which were themselves put in place to prevent another hanging-chad fiasco like that in Florida in 2000. … But this reaction to the bugs and glitches shows that Americans have not learned the right lesson from 2000: the problem is not with the technology of running our elections but rather with the people running them." The US "should join the rest of the world's advanced democracies and put nonpartisan professionals in charge."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ's Antitrust Suit Against NAR Targets 36 Markets. Inman News (11/11, Roberts) reports, "The Justice Department, as a part of its antitrust lawsuit against the 1.3-million-member National Association of Realtors trade group, has identified 36 market areas in which association policy for the online display and sharing of property information has allegedly caused anticompetitive effects, said Laurie Janik, general counsel for the group." Inman continues, "Filed last year, the lawsuit charges that the Realtor group's policies are illegal because they could potentially be used to squelch real estate competition, while the Realtor group has maintained that its policies provide for ample online information about properties. … 'They've identified 36 markets to us where they intend to prove anticompetitive effects,' Janik said Friday during a meeting for multiple listing service executives at a Realtor conference in New Orleans. 'We'll be waiting to see just what types of proof they plan to advance from those marketplaces.'" Inman notes, "Lawyers for the association, meanwhile, are conducting interviews with MLS officials in those markets to gather information for its defense. … Issues of data protection and control are at the core of the legal scuffle, as some brokers have pushed the association to better serve their interests by helping to safeguard control over property information that they say is a vital part of their business. … A major contention in the Justice Department lawsuit is on a policy provision that allows brokers who are members of Realtor-affiliated MLSs to block their listings from display on other MLS participants' Web sites, Janik said. 'We believe it's a very justifiable position, but the government seems to think that once a broker has decided to participate in the MLS then you also must allow your listings to be displayed on a competitors' ... Web site.' … Also, Justice Department officials object to a Realtor policy which requires that Realtor MLS participants must 'actually be engaged in listing or selling the type of property that's listed in the MLS,' while the former policy simply required that an MLS participant possess a broker's license."

Motorola To Purchase BlackBerry Rival. The AP (11/11, Press) reports, "The cellphone maker Motorola said Friday that it would buy Good Technology, a rival of BlackBerry, in a deal that should improve the prospects for its new Q hand-held device. … The financial terms were not disclosed." The AP continues, "The deal underscores efforts by Motorola, a leading maker of handsets, to sell more mobile devices that offer access to e-mail and other business-oriented services. In September, it agreed to spend $3.9 billion to buy Symbol Technologies, a maker of portable bar code scanners and customized hand-held computers. … Motorola said Good Technology, a privately held firm based in Santa Clara, Calif., that provides computing software and services for the Treo and other smartphones, will join its mobile devices unit. That unit has flourished in the last couple of years thanks to the success of the Razr phones." The AP adds, "Ron Garriques, president of the mobile devices division, said Good Technology's services, products and customers all complement its business. … 'This acquisition will continue to strengthen Motorola as a leading provider of mobility devices and solutions both for enterprise customers and consumers,' he said. .. .Hoping to come up with another Razr-like blockbuster in the fast-growing smartphone category, Motorola introduced a Qwerty hand-held device, called the Q, this year to compete against the BlackBerry and the Treo, which also runs on Good Technology software."

Newspaper Mergers Spotlight Cultural Differences. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A1, Ellison) reports, "When Chicago-based Tribune Co. acquired Times Mirror six years ago, it was more than an $8 billion fusion of two media companies. The merger also threw together two competing and incompatible cultures, each rooted in the traditions of their respective flagship newspapers, the Chicago Tribune and the Los Angeles Times." The Journal continues, "Some Tribune executives think the Times is arrogant, spoiled and overstaffed, a paper with global ambitions that has ignored local readers. Some Times people consider the Chicago Tribune an inferior, provincial product. Times denizens, proud of their city's position as the nation's second largest, see the paper's owners as bean counters in business suits. Tribune thinks its Californian charges are too slick and prefer to take pride in the company's Chicago roots." The Journal adds, "Unlike many battles between journalists and corporate bosses, which focus largely on spending, this one is also driven by fundamental differences between the philosophies of the two newspapers. … Across the country, once-profitable newspapers are being ravaged by the Internet in a historic industry shift. The traditionally high margins of newspaper publishers have been squeezed as both readers and advertisers abandon the medium. Investor confidence has plummeted over the industry's uncertain growth prospects. … Even in 2000, some executives saw trouble looming. The solution dreamed up by Tribune and Times Mirror was to merge their operations in a way that allowed them to sell combined packages of newspaper and local TV advertising in the same big, urban markets. The strategy was a dud. In September, Tribune said it was exploring various strategic options, which may include a sale of the entire company or some of its divisions."

ENVIRONMENT:

US Seeks To Fine Florida Man Over Pollution Silence. The St Petersburg (FL) Times (11/11, Weimar) reports, "A Dover (FL) business owner is facing fines of $32,500 a day for failing to comply with requests from the Environmental Protection Agency." The Times continues, "In a criminal complaint, the federal agency accuses Hugh Johnson, owner of Johnson's Oil Service, of ignoring requests for information regarding his alleged involvement in the pollution of what became a Superfund site in Polk County. … The site, 5015 State Road 60 in Mulberry, is the former home of Sadler Drum, which specialized in the washing and reconditioning of chemical drums. The owner abandoned the site in 1997, leaving hundreds of empty containers." The Times adds, "The EPA investigated the site and discovered the presence of dozens of dangerous chemicals. The cleanup cost more than $900,000 and 65 potentially responsible parties were identified, including Johnson, according to court documents. … The EPA sent a registered letter to Johnson in June 2003, requesting more information. Johnson signed for the letter but did not respond, the court documents said. … In June 2006, the Justice Department intervened, sending notice to Johnson he must respond or face judicial enforcement. Johnson did not respond."

DOJ Suit Claims Virginia Family Damaged Wetlands. The Virginian-Pilot (11/11, Harper) reports, "The Justice Department has filed a federal lawsuit seeking fines and restoration of nontidal wetlands in southern Chesapeake that the government says were damaged in 1999. … But the property owners, the Bosher family, said this week that they did nothing wrong and that they were cleaning out existing ditches on their farmland at the time." The V-P continues, "Family members say they have since spent thousands of dollars trying to clarify the issue with federal regulators, to no avail. … 'It's been the most expensive, prolonged and painful experience,' said Kitty Bosher, president and secretary of Sea Bay Development Corp. and Green Sea Farms LLC." The V-P adds, "The two entities, both family-run, are listed as the owners of the site in question, known as the Bosher tract. At 1,560 acres, the tract is one of the largest undeveloped properties left in southern Chesapeake. … The case is another in a series of federal actions in recent years intended to protect nontidal wetlands - low-lying fields and forests found throughout Hampton Roads that filter pollutants, control flooding and provide wildlife habitat."

Global Energy Demand Expected To Jump In Current Quarter. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A4, Swartz) reports the International Energy Agency said global energy demand "will jump in the fourth quarter because of U.S. consumption, while demand" for OPEC-produced oil "will rise to its highest level in four years." The IEA said Friday that global oil demand "will rise 2.6% from the year-earlier period, when demand was crimped by mild weather and the impact of Hurricane Katrina in the U.S., the world's biggest energy market."

Offshore Drilling Bill Appears Dead Under Democrats. The New York Times (11/11, C3, Krauss) reports that legislation that would "open the seas off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to oil and gas drilling" appears to be dead in the wake of Democratic victories this week.

IMMIGRATION:

House To "Revisit" Border Fence Under Democrats. The Washington Times (11/11, Waterman) reports, "Democrats will look again at the legislation mandating 698 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border and might seek to scrap the plan altogether when they take control of Congress next year." Rep. Bennie Thompson, who will head the Homeland Security Committee, "told reporters this week that he expected to 'revisit' the issue."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush, Pelosi Vow To Seek Common Ground. President Bush and House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi met at the White House yesterday. Their vows to seek a bipartisan path are receiving largely positive media coverage. As McClatchy (11/10, Hutcheson) reports, the "bipartisan pledges of cooperation generated considerable skepticism in Washington, a city accustomed to partisan warfare." But Bush "has reached effectively across party lines before, both as governor of Texas and early in his presidency. … Some Democrats who have worked with Bush in the past said Tuesday's elections brought out a side of him that's been missing in recent years. Former Texas state Rep. Paul Sadler, a Democrat who considers Bush a friend, said he was puzzled by the style the president adopted when he moved to Washington in 2000. 'It's almost like he was hijacked,' Sadler said."

The New York Times (11/10, Stolberg, 1.16M), under the headline "On A Shifting Playing Field, A Sense Of Rising Expectations," reports, "It might seem like the…Bush -- or maybe the old one, returning to his Texas governor roots. But, Republicans say, it is really just the same…Bush -- the first M.B.A. president, pragmatic enough to recognize, as he himself might say, that he must adjust his tactics to changing conditions on the ground. 'You're seeing the George Bush who has always been adept at playing the hand he is dealt,' said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist with close ties to the White House." Vin Weber, "a Republican former congressman and lobbyist, put it this way: 'I've never thought that George Bush was a rigid ideologue; I've never thought that he was a hardened partisan. He is a businessman first, and in business you don't spend a lot of time crying about changed circumstances. You figure out quickly how to adapt, and that's what he's doing.'"

The AP (11/10, Kellman) says "both Bush and the Democrats have reasons to mend fences. In the twilight of a wartime presidency, Bush could polish his legacy by reviving his uniter-not-a-divider campaign promise of 2000." Meanwhile, "lawmakers in both parties, some of them beginning what amounts to a two-year job interview for the presidency, also have an incentive to move away from confrontation politics. If they need a reminder, they might look at the 61 percent disapproval rating Congress received in the exit polls this week."

The Washington Post (11/10, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) says that "despite deep philosophical differences and sharp election-year rhetoric from both sides, the White House and congressional Democrats may share some interest in finding common ground on such issues as overhauling the immigration system, education and energy, according to lawmakers and administration officials." Democratic leaders "seem anxious to show they can deliver as a governing party after years in opposition, while Bush is aware that his final two years will be bereft of any significant initiative unless he can work with the party he demonized on the campaign trail." One area where they could be progress in immigration. The New York Times (11/10, Archibold, 1.16M) notes "Democrats will take over leadership of committees in the House and the Senate that could guide new immigration legislation," while Bush and Pelosi "have cast changes to immigration laws as an opportunity to demonstrate bipartisan bonhomie. … Some immigration experts, however, predict a more arduous debate. Although conservative Republicans have led the opposition to accommodating some illegal immigrants, a handful of the newly elected Democrats, including Claire A. McCaskill of Missouri and Jim Webb of Virginia in the Senate, campaigned promising a tough approach to illegal immigration."

Hope for bipartisanship also extends to the relationship between Bush and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid. In a largely complimentary profile of Reid, the New York Times (11/10, Leibovich, 1.16M) says "people who know" him "say he is much more suited to work with Republicans than his partisan reputation would suggest."

ABC World News (11/9, story 2, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) called the meeting "one of the more uplifting traditions of our democracy: political combatants coming together after a bitter election." ABC (Raddatz) added, "These are two people who have said very nasty things to one another in the past. But today, it was all smiles. The President offered his congratulations to Speaker Pelosi after a one-hour lunch today. And both said they are ready to face the challenges the country faces together." Bush: "We don't agree on every issue. But we do agree that we love America equally, that we're concerned about the future of this country, and that we will do our very best to address big problems." Pelosi: "I look forward to working in a confidence-building way with the President, recognizing that we have our differences. And will debate them. And that is what our founders intended." ABC (Raddatz) continued, "Differences is putting it mildly." Pelosi was shown saying, "What he says is not in touch with reality," and later, ""The President has been incompetent." And Bush was shown saying, "The Speaker would be a Congresswoman who said catching Osama bin Laden would not make America any safer."

The CBS Evening News (11/9, story 3, 2:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) said the two leader made their statements yesterday "through strained smiles." Bush: "Well, we're going to work together to address those changes in a constructive way." Pelosi: "We've made history. Now we have to make progress, and I look forward to working with the President to do just that." CBS added, "This was a day of images designed to project unity and continuity, to insurgents in Iraq who might take the election results as a sign of reduced US commitment there, and to the same Democrats the President's been slamming as soft on terror. Mr. Bush now says he welcomes their ideas on Iraq." Bush: "Whatever party we come from, we all have a responsibility to ensure that these troops have the resources and support they need to prevail. I'm open to any idea or suggestion that will help us achieve our goals of defeating the terrorists and ensuring that Iraq's Democratic government succeeds."

NBC Nightly News (11/9, lead story, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Voters made clear their desire for middle ground in Washington. One day after ousting Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld, the President appeared with his cabinet soliciting help from the Democrats on the war. … Quite a change in tone for the President."

The AP (11/10, Loven) calls Bush and Pelosi "perhaps the biggest loser and winner on Election Day," and notes they "pledged over lunch Thursday to bury the hatchet and cooperate. When possible. At the White House, where Bush had invited Pelosi for lunch, presidential aides joked that there was no crow on the menu for Bush to eat." Bush "ate a little anyway, and he saluted Pelosi, not only as Tuesday's victor but as the first woman who will ascend to the position of House speaker, next in line to the presidency after the vice president." Pelosi, "like Bush all smiles," said, "We both extended the hand of friendship, of partnership to solve the problems facing our country." She "was accompanied by Rep. Steny Hoyer, the House's second-ranking Democrat. Bush was accompanied by a stony-faced Vice President Dick Cheney."

The Washington Times (11/10, Curl, 88K) also notes Bush's "new conciliatory stance is a far cry from what the president said repeatedly on the campaign trail." But the President, "humbled by losing Republican control of both the House and the Senate, struck a new tone of bipartisanship yesterday after a morning meeting with his Cabinet." The Financial Times (11/10, Sevastopulo, Luce, Kirchgaessner) runs a similar report under the headline "Bush In Overture To Democrats."

"Symbolism" Seen In Bush's Omission Of Cheney. The New York Times (11/10, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports, "It was no doubt inadvertent, but it was hard not to find some symbolism in the moment Thursday in the Oval Office when…Bush seemed to forget that…Cheney was in the room. … 'Both of us recognize -- all three of us,' Mr. Bush said, apparently referring to himself, Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer, 'recognize that when you win, you have a responsibility to do the best you can for the country.'" The Times adds, "The omission of Mr. Cheney, the embodiment of the administration's approach to national security, raised an intriguing question. As Mr. Bush grapples with the loss of his Republican majority in Congress, how far will he go to reinvent himself, and who -- or what philosophies -- is he willing to jettison along the way?" The Times also reports that "there were questions on Thursday about the future of Karl Rove, the political strategist whose divide-and-conquer tactics failed on Tuesday for the first time. Asked what role Mr. Rove would play now, Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, offered little insight. 'That's a good process question,' Mr. Snow said, 'for which I don't have an answer.'"

Bush, Democrats Clash On Bolton, Wiretapping Program. But not all was bipartisanship in Washington yesterday. As the Financial Times (11/10, Sevastopulo) reports Bush "asked Congress to approve John Bolton, his controversial ambassador to the United Nations, for a second term, in the face of opposition from key Democrats. The move comes in spite of conciliatory rhetoric from Mr. Bush on Thursday that he wants to work with Democrats after they routed the Republicans in the congressional mid-term elections." White House spokesman Tony Snow Thursday said Bush "discussed his desire to keep Mr. Bolton at the UN at a breakfast meeting on Thursday with Republican congressional leaders." However, "White House hopes of keeping Mr. Bolton in New York were immediately dashed when Lincoln Chafee, a Rhode Island Republican member of the foreign relations committee who just lost his seat in Tuesday's elections, said he would oppose Mr. Bolton. Joseph Biden, the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee in January, on Thursday said there was no point for the committee to even discuss the appointment." Similarly, NBC Nightly News (11/9, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) noted in a segment on the Democrats' electoral victory, "There are signals tonight from Capitol Hill, the top Democrats will block the re-nomination, really, of John Bolton, the UN Ambassador. He's opposed by lame duck Republican Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island."

The AP (11/10, Flaherty) says Bolton's "prospects for staying on as UN ambassador essentially died Thursday," in "another blow to…Bush." The Washington Post (11/10, A3, Linzer, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (11/10, Farley, 850K) also report the story. And the Washington Times (11/10, Dinan, 88K) notes White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "said it's too early to talk about whether the White House might give Mr. Bolton another recess appointment."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (11/10, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports the Administration "escalated its defense of the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program on Thursday, even as Democrats in Congress vowed to investigate the program aggressively once they assume power." Bush "urged that during the lame-duck session that starts next week, Congress pass a bill effectively authorizing the program. And in San Francisco, the Justice Department told a federal court that public scrutiny of the operation risked 'exceptionally grave harm to national security.'" Democrats, meanwhile, "sounded impatient to begin getting more answers after what they characterized as 11 months of stonewalling by the administration since the program was publicly disclosed last December. 'This administration first hid its domestic spying program from Congress and Americans for years, and when it was discovered, has ducked and weaved on its legal justifications,' said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who is to become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee when Democrats take control."

On ABC World News (11/9, lead story, 2:50, Tapper, 8.78M), Cokie Roberts said, "Some of the people who are taking over Senate committees are no friends of George Bush. And they've made that very clear on several occasions." Leahy, for example, is described as "one of the toughest critics of the President's choices for judges and his controversial NSA wiretap program."

NBC Nightly News (11/9, story 2, 2:30, Reid, 9.87M) reported, "Congressman Henry Waxman is one of the Democrat's most aggressive investigators, targeting Iraq contractors, especially Halliburton. And as chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, he'll have vast new resources and the power to subpoena witnesses."

In an editorial, the New York Times (11/10, 1.16M) was quick to criticize Bush for putting "bipartisanship on hold." After his statements in regard to bipartisanship, the Times said, "without missing a beat…Bush made it clear that, for now, his idea of how to 'put the elections behind us' is to use the Republicans' last two months in control of Congress to try to push through one of the worst ideas his administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have come up with: a bill that would legalize his illegal wiretapping program and gut the law that limits a president's ability to abuse his power in this way." Bush's priorities for the lame duck session of Congress "included one worthy but hardly urgent idea (getting Vietnam into the World Trade Organization) and a series of ideas ranging from bad to truly awful that Mr. Bush has been unable to get through Congress and hopes to ram through in the Republicans' last weeks." The Bolton vote, adds the Times, "can easily wait for the new Congress, and should."

McCaskill Would Vote To Confirm Bolton. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (11/9, Matthews) if the Senate should confirm John Bolton's nomination to be US ambassador to the UN, Sen.-elect Claire McCaskill said, "Yes, probably. I haven't had a chance to review all of Mr. Bolton's record. But I'm a believer that the President has certain picks that he's entitled to, as long as I'm convinced that they are serious about beginning work on diplomacy. Obviously, that's been kind of AWOL in this administration, that emphasis on building alliances. Now is the time to remain committed to the United Nations, not to withdraw. I would want to get those assurances from Mr. Bolton."

Democrats Prepare To Launch Investigations. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Schmidt, Simon, 850K), in a report titled "Democrats Are Set To Subpoena," reports Democratic "Rep. Ike Skelton knows what he will do in one of his first acts as chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the Democratic-led House: resurrect the subcommittee on oversight and investigations. The panel was disbanded by the Republicans after they won control of Congress in 1994." Now, Skelton "intends to use it as a forum to probe Pentagon spending and the Bush administration's conduct of the Iraq war." The Times adds, "With control of every committee in Congress starting in January, the new majority will inherit broad powers to subpoena and investigate. And that is expected to translate into wide-ranging and contentious hearings."

Meanwhile, under the headline "Democrats Poised To Flex New Muscles," the Wall Street Journal (11/10, Dreazen, Solomon, Block, 2.04M) reports "the Democrats' sweep of the House and the Senate gives the party powerful tools for probing certain controversies of the Bush administration's years in office, from its use of faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq to its effort to rebuild New Orleans." In the Senate, "the likely new Intelligence Committee chairman, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, says he will complete an investigation into the White House's case for invading Iraq that Republicans were accused of stalling. Michigan Sen. Carl Levin is in line to take over the most powerful congressional oversight body, the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which routinely sends staffers to Iraq and other overseas countries." Levin "has previously promised to conduct tougher oversight of the administration's use of no-bid contracting in Iraq, where the $21.8 billion U.S.-led rebuilding effort is winding down without having restored prewar levels of water or electricity." In the House, Rep. Bennie Thompson, "expected to take over the House Committee on Homeland Security, is promising to haul Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff before the panel to face questions on issues ranging from the no-bid contracts awarded after Hurricane Katrina to the number of vacancies in the department's senior management."

The New York Times (11/10, Hulse, 1.16M) says and in the Senate, "there are pronounced ideological differences between the incoming leaders and those they will be replacing, as well as other lingering issues." On the Intelligence Committee, Rockefeller "has feuded with Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican chairman, over Mr. Roberts' reluctance to challenge the administration's handling of intelligence preceding the Iraq war." And "in what could be the biggest policy divide on the panels, Senator Barbara Boxer, the liberal California Democrat and environmental advocate, is in line to take control of the Environment and Public Works Committee from Senator James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, who has disputed the existence of global warming."

USA Today (11/10, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Norman Ornstein, "co-author of The Broken Branch, a book about Congress, predicts 'double-barreled investigations' of Iraq war contracts and the conduct of the war, with House and Senate Democrats 'calling in generals left and right' to testify. 'That's a nasty thing for a president to have to deal with,' he says." In the Washington Post (11/10, 690K), columnist Eugene Robinson says "Democrats were restrained during the campaign, which was smart. But now it's time for them to ask those hard questions -- and use their new power to compel answers. Even if they have to be unfashionably partisan about it."

Waxman Weighing Where To Start On Probes Of Bush Administration. The AP (11/10, Werner) reports Rep.

Henry Waxman, "who will investigate the Bush administration's running of the government," says there are "so many areas of possible wrongdoing that his biggest problem will be deciding which ones to pursue." Addressing the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, he ticked off "the response to Hurricane Katrina, government contracting in Iraq and on homeland security, political interference in regulatory decisions by the Environmental Protection Agency and the Food and Drug Administration, and accusations of war profiteering." Waxman said, "I'm going to have an interesting time because the Government Reform Committee has jurisdiction over everything. The most difficult thing will be to pick and choose."

Democrats To Seek Additional Domestic Security Spending. USA Today (11/10, Frank, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "Democrats say they will use their majority in Congress to strengthen domestic security by putting millions of dollars into technology at airports and ports and increasing government oversight." But "they also may push policies that aviation officials say could cripple the industry, such as requiring screening of all cargo before it's put on passenger planes." House Democrats "made domestic security a centerpiece of their campaign this year and vowed to fulfill all the 9/11 Commission's recommendations. 'Real security' is the first of six policies Democrats will push when they take control of Congress in January, according to a manifesto they recently published to highlight differences with Republicans."

Dingell Agenda Includes Fuel Efficiency, Health Care Costs. USA Today (11/10, Healy, 2.27M) reports conventional wisdom "says that Democrats, who will control both houses of Congress next year, will somehow cut America's dependence on oil, especially imported, and trim the average American's fuel bill." Dingell says he "wants to cut the U.S. oil habit, promising the committee's help in 'making the United States energy-independent.'" At the same time, "he must represent the interests of the Michigan-based auto industry. Energy-conservation initiatives can cost automakers hundreds of millions of dollars for research and development of fuel-efficiency hardware and software for which new car buyers won't pay extra." Dingell is "not eager to force automakers to improve fuel economy by boosting what's known as CAFE, for corporate average fuel economy." Fuel economy standards, "he said, 'can be addressed very well, automobile or light trucks, within the framework of existing law,' which 'gives an awful lot of freedom to the administration' to adjust the standards to keep up with improving technology." USA adds Dingell is "passionate about overhauling health care by getting cheaper generic dugs to market faster; giving the government the authority to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies; stopping what he says are 'almost certain overpayments' to health insurance companies; and regulating dietary supplements, which, he says, 'are killing people.' He wouldn't name the supplements he considers dangerous."

WPost Urges Democrats To Tackle Ethics Reform First. The Washington Post (11/10, 690K) editorializes, "One of the loudest messages from Tuesday's elections was disgust with the way Washington does business. In exit polls, 42 percent of voters said corruption and scandals in government were extremely important in their decisions -- a greater share than for the war in Iraq, terrorism or the economy. House Democrats have vowed to quickly adopt new ethics rules; their package is good but could be improved. Senate Democrats, who, after yesterday's gracious concession by Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), will control the chamber, say they too have heard the voters' demand for change." The Post urges Congress to fulfill their reform vows before other priorities, adding that "after changing ethics rules, the new Congress needs to pass the lobbying reform legislation that its predecessor neglected to its peril."

Congress Urged To Take Up "Family Friendly" Measures. In a New York Times op-ed (11/10), author Judith Warner says, "While the excitement over Nancy Pelosi, most likely to be our first female speaker of the House, is still fresh, and while those of us who care about these things are still bubbling over the election of the highest number of women to Congress in history, I'd like to issue a challenge: Ladies, step up to the plate on behalf of the rest of America's women — and their families." For "years now, there have been murmurings — and more — from various corners of Congress in favor of change. Representative Lynn Woolsey's Balancing Act bill, which calls for a wide array of measures to reduce the stresses on working families, has been languishing for years. Senators Christopher Dodd and Ted Kennedy have gestured toward legislation on paid family leave and guaranteed sick leave. There was even a much-overlooked bill introduced in the Senate by Hillary Clinton this summer (and in the House by Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut) to provide low-income parents with subsidies to stay at home and care for their infants themselves. It's time to light a fire under these kinds of initiatives."

Democrats Planning Broad Economic Agenda.

ABC World News (11/10, story 2, 2:10, Stark) took a look at what economic initiatives might come from the Democrats, with the party bringing "an ambitious agenda on economic issues that could affect the wallets of millions of Americans. If you're an hourly wage worker, there's a good chance you're in for a raise. Democrats want to raise minimum the wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour, which could ripple through to higher wages for those who make more than the minimum, too. … If you're a student or parent trying to pay for college, lower student loan rates could also be coming. Democrats say their goal is to cut federal loan rates from 6.8% to 3.4% interest. … For seniors, and possibly anyone who takes prescription drugs, lower drug costs are high on the agenda. Democrats want to rewrite the Medicare reform bill to let the government negotiate lower prescription drug prices, but face a tough battle."

Democrats Vow To Make AMT Key Budget Issue. The Washington Post (11/11, Montgomery) reports on its front page that Democrats are vowing to "make the alternative minimum tax a centerpiece of next year's budget debate, saying the levy threatens to unfairly increase tax bills for millions of middle-class families by the end of the decade." The "complex and expensive tax…is expected to expand to more than 30 million taxpayers in 2010 from 3.8 million mostly well-off households in 2006."

Rubin Urges Democrats To Raise Taxes. As part of its lead story, ABC World News (11/10, lead story, 2:05, Raddatz) reported that "at least one major division was made clear" between the two parties, "over taxes. A powerful voice urging Democrats to call for tax increases to help bring down the deficit." Ex-Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin: "You can not solve the nation's fiscal problems without increased revenues." Raddatz: "The White House today rejected Rubin's suggestion." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow: "Tax increases are bad for the economy." The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A5, Solomon) reports on Rubin's remarks at the Economic Club of Washington, adding that "raising taxes is a message many Democratic lawmakers are unlikely to utter aloud -- at least for now."

WSJournal Says Minimum Wage Increase Would Hurt Disadvantaged. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A6) editorializes, "A hike in the national minimum wage seems all but certain to become one of the first fruits of the Democrats' victories this week. … It is implicit in the logic behind raising the minimum wage that if we squeeze employers just a little, they won't even notice. Another argument, this one made explicitly, is that jobs are destroyed, but the wage gains more than make up for the reduced number of jobs. But this is only true if it's not your job that is destroyed. If you are a young black male, you are slightly more likely than the general population to be paid minimum wage, but you are almost 10 times as likely not to have a job at all. And if you're unemployed, raising the minimum wage not only doesn't help you find a job; it probably hurts. Welcome to Speaker Pelosi's idea of progress." The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A5, Nassauer) also examines some of the issues and questions surrounding a minimum wage increase.

Democratic Wins Could Stymie Bush Free Trade Agenda. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A1, Hitt, King) reports on its front page that the new Democratic domination of Capitol Hill "is set to deliver a blow to President Bush's free-trade ambitions and could hamper impending trade deals both big and small. Democrats' stances against free trade helped build the party's success at the polls and could tip the balance on trade matters." But that "new dynamic could put a definitive end to the already troubled" Doha round effort to reduce tariffs and open markets.

The Financial Times (11/11, Luce, Remtulla) writes that many of the newly elected Democrats "are economic populists who are deeply suspicious of free trade and quick to blame China and other developing countries for the loss of US jobs." The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Hennessy-Fiske) reports, "One of the first battles could be over the president's authority to get trade deals approved quickly." Sen.-elect Rep. Sherrod Brown, "a foe of free trade while in the House," and a "slate of new lawmakers plan to block fast track unless it's amended to include protections for domestic and foreign workers."

In his Washington Post (11/11, A27) column, Harold Meyerson writes, "Looking at the Democrats who picked up formerly Republican House seats, Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch tallies 27 who defeated (or replaced resigning) free-trade Republicans and who campaigned against the kind of trade deals that Congress has ratified. The fair-trade 27 insist instead on deals that stress labor rights and environmental standards. … In the incoming Senate delegation, the contrast is even sharper. The Democratic pickups -- Missouri's Claire McCaskill, Montana's Jon Tester, Ohio's Sherrod Brown, Pennsylvania's Bob Casey, Rhode Island's Sheldon Whitehouse and Virginia's James Webb -- all unseated free-trade incumbents with campaigns that stressed the need to pay far greater attention to the downward leveling that globalization entails."

Unions Reemerge As Democrats Take Control. The New York Times (11/11, A13, Greenhouse) writes that the labor movement, which has been "on the outs" with Capitol Hill since 1994, is readying its comeback. Unions, "eager to be treated as an important force," have "worked overtime since Election Day reminding Democrats about all that organized labor did to help put them over the top, including spending more than $100 million and dispatching more than 100,000 volunteers to help get out the vote."

Choice For Intelligence Chair Seen As First Challenge For Pelosi. The New York Times (11/10, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "Her boss may want her gone, but Representative Jane Harman happens to think she is good at her job. And she has no intention of leaving it without a fight." Harman "argues that her role as the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee makes her the logical candidate to become chairman when the new Congress begins in January." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, "the party's leader and presumptive House speaker in the next Congress, has indicated she has other plans. The two women, both from California, have long had a frosty relationship, and Ms. Pelosi has been angry with Ms. Harman for not using her position on the Intelligence Committee to attack the Bush administration aggressively." Pelosi "has told colleagues she plans to replace Ms. Harman on the Intelligence Committee, possibly with Representative Alcee Hastings of Florida, although she has given no public indication of her choice for the post since the election." The Times adds, "Many Democrats are closely watching the decision for signs of two things: how the speaker-in-waiting will chart her party's course on national security issues and how she will handle her first postelection test in dealing with the often fractious Democratic caucus. 'This is the battle that nobody wanted,' one senior Democratic strategist said. 'For Nancy to start off her speakership with a fight is a great shame.'"

Pelosi-Reid Relationship Could Be Key To Democratic Success. The Washington Post (11/10, A12, Banington, Weisman, 690K) reports, "After two days of watching Rep. Nancy Pelosi hailed as a political pioneer and the toast of her party, Sen. Harry M. Reid joined her yesterday atop the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years thanks to a razor-thin election in Virginia. … The Democrats' success in the Bush presidency's final two years will depend largely on the compatibility and forcefulness of the two barely tested leaders, according to some lawmakers and political experts. Reid, a former boxer from Nevada, is a camera-averse Senate insider who has used rear-guard tactics to bedevil Senate Republicans on Social Security, nominations and other issues in recent years." Pelosi "is a wealthy San Franciscan who grew up in a Baltimore political family and now has reached the highest elected post of any American woman." Yesterday, Reid "echoed Pelosi's earlier assertion that Democrats will push an agenda to help middle-class families and reduce the deficit while also treating Republican lawmakers more generously than the GOP had treated Democrats during their years in the minority."

Reid Described As Able Legislator With An Eclectic Personality. Under the headline "Harry Reid, An Infighter With A Sharp Jab," the New York Times (11/10, Leibovich, 1.16M) profiles Senate Democratic Leader Harry Leader. In a generally positive feature, the Times reports Harry Reid "began Election Day with 50 situps and 80 push-ups (very red state of him) and 40 minutes of yoga (very blue state of him). … Just after 2 p.m., he finally heard some actual news: Britney Spears was filing for divorce. 'Britney Spears,' Mr. Reid said, shaking his head. 'She loses a little weight, and now she's getting all cocky about things.' He added, 'Britney has gotten her mojo back.'" The Times adds, "Few would peg Mr. Reid, 66, as someone with anything to say about Britney Spears or, for that matter, someone who would ever use the word 'mojo.'" But "he is a tricky figure to pigeonhole or predict, a Democrat who is a Mormon opposed to abortion and who looks more like a civics teacher than someone set to become the most powerful person in the Senate. He makes an unlikely front man." The Times adds, "People who know Mr. Reid say he is much more suited to work with Republicans than his partisan reputation would suggest." Reid "is often credited with outmaneuvering his predecessor, Senator Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee, who had relatively little legislative experience when he became majority leader in 2003." He is "nothing if not battle-worn and realistic, friends say."

Pelosi's Liberalism Said To Spring From Her Father's Politics. The Washington Post (11/10, C1, Duke, 690K) reports, "Critics deride Pelosi, 66, for a presumed lightweight liberalism they attribute to her latter-day home in San Francisco. But her liberalism -- and the keen political instincts and skill at the inside parry of the game -- can be traced more deeply and more precisely back to Albemarle Street," in Baltimore, "to the political empire that grew there when her father held court through decades of an intensely political life. The Post adds, "In that brick rowhouse on the corner of Albemarle and Fawn streets, politics was a family business that became a local dynasty."

Pelosi Learned How To Count Votes From Father. In the Financial Times (11/11), Holly Yeager profiles Pelosi, "a workaholic and self-confessed chocoholic" who "has long been a vocal cheerleader and effective fundraiser for her party (she raised more than $100m for Democrats in the past four years – a feat matched only by the Clintons). But that this mother of five who first ran for public office 20 years ago is also a keen political strategist should not come as a surprise. Her late father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr, spent 10 years in Congress, then a dozen as mayor of Baltimore. Known as 'Old Tommy', he kept a 'favour file' in the living room of their Little Italy home, tracking good deeds that he and the Baltimore Democratic machine had done for people – in case they needed to ask for something in return. Mrs Pelosi – 'little Nancy' back then, the youngest of six children and the only girl – says she also learnt from him to count votes. 'Going into an election, they'd sit around the table and they had these yellow legal pads and they'd say, 'How many votes does it take to win?' and it's still the same thing.'"

Murtha Thinks He Has The Votes To Be Majority Leader. Asked about his run for House Majority Leader on CNN's The Situation Room (11/9, Blitzer), Rep. Jack Murtha said, "At this point I think I have the votes. We've been going over it today and we're pleased at the outcome, we're pleased at the response we're getting and we've been working hard." Murtha pointed out that he was Nancy Pelosi's "campaign manager when Steny Hoyer ran against her for minority leader. So I do have a fairly good relationship."

The Washington Times (11/10, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Though Mr. Murtha is otherwise a fairly conservative Democrat, his position on the war appeals to many liberals in his ranks and, say Democratic staffers, he has the private blessing of Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the caucus's head and the presumed next House speaker." The Times adds, "Within minutes of Democrats' capturing the 15th seat needed to take control of the House, Mr. Hoyer tried tightening his grip on the majority leader position by reminding fellow Democrats that he had been a central figure in their caucus during their darkest times." Murtha "reminded colleagues that his strongest voice in recent years came in opposition to the Iraq war, which strategists on both sides credit in part for Democrats' enormous victories this week."

Emanuel To Forgo Whip Race. The Chicago Tribune (11/10, Dorning, 617K) reports Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "the Chicago Democrat who led his party's successful campaign to take over the House, announced late Thursday that he would forgo a bid he had been considering for the influential third-ranking leadership post, majority whip. Instead, he will run for a post one rung down the leadership ladder, Democratic Caucus chairman." The Tribune adds, "A Democratic source said Pelosi had urged Emanuel not to make a bid for the whip post in order to avoid a divisive internal fight with the Congressional Black Caucus, which is strongly backing the only declared candidate for the post, Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.). Clyburn is currently Democratic Caucus chairman and the only African-American in the party leadership."

Some Democratic Leaders, Lawmakers Touched By Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, Mullins, 2.04M) reports that after "winning an election shaped by corruption as much as Iraq, Democrats are about to elevate a set of leaders in the House and Senate that will include lawmakers who have had their own brushes with scandal." Sen. Harry Reid (D., Nev.), "who is expected to be elected to majority leader in the Senate, has come under attack for his relationship with Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a profitable land deal, and whether he inappropriately used campaign funds to give Christmas bonuses to employees at his condo complex." In the House, West Virginia Democratic Rep. Allan Mollohan, "whose conduct is being investigated by the Justice Department, is in line for a senior position on the Appropriations Committee. Meanwhile, Rep. Alcee Hastings, a Florida Democrat, is vying to become chairman of the Intelligence Committee. Once a federal judge, Mr. Hastings was impeached by Congress more than a decade ago after he was charged with -- and acquitted of -- taking a $150,000 bribe. Mr. Hastings declined to comment." Democratic Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana, "under Justice Department investigation for accepting bribes, came out ahead of 12 other candidates vying for his seat on Election Day, but faces a December runoff under Louisiana's unique election system." Democratic leaders "in both chambers say they will make it a top priority to approve an ethics-reform package that tightens rules for lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists. Republicans made the same promise a year ago after a Justice Department corruption probe garnered guilty pleas from a pair of one-time aides to former Republican Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as well as from Mr. Abramoff, who was close to Mr. DeLay and other Republican lawmakers."

Dodd Likely To Chair Senate Banking Committee. USA Today (11/10, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports Sen. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, "a second-generation senator exploring a 2008 presidential bid, is in line to be chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, now that Democrats have a majority in that chamber." Dodd has been "a strong advocate for the insurance and financial services industries in his state. Such firms as Bear Stearns, Lehman Bros. and Goldman Sachs are atop Dodd's list of political action committee donors, according to the Center for Responsive Politics."

Defense Contractors Relieved McCain Will Not Get Armed Services Chair. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A8, Karp, Pasztor, 2.04M) reports many defense contractors are relieved that Sen. John McCain, "a strident critic of Pentagon weapons-buying practices, won't become chairman of the Armed Services Committee." Likely chairman Carl Levin "brings his own longstanding skepticism of the industry and some of its prized weapons programs, particularly missile defense. Yet the soft-spoken Mr. Levin is likely to change the tone and focus of the committee's oversight efforts." Unlike McCain, "whose investigations into Boeing Co.'s ethical lapses laid the path for the panel to examine weapons-contract details and contractor profit margins, Mr. Levin has signaled that his priority will be the war in Iraq."

Paulson Emerging From "Shadows" Untainted By Partisanship. The New York Times (11/11, Weisman) writes on its front page that while Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson spent his first months in office in "the shadows while cabinet colleagues were campaigning for a Republican Congress," he is now "set to plunge in. Untainted by the harshly partisan rhetoric of the past, he hopes to use his prowess as the former head of Goldman Sachs not just to pursue critical economic deals with China and other American trading partners but -- equally important for the weakened administration -- to explore deal-making with Democrats in Congress, as well." The White House "says it is counting on the best from Mr. Paulson." However, the Times says, "the chances for real cooperation are limited."

UN's Bolton Could Be Next Victim Of Democratic Wave. The New York Times (11/11, A12, Cooper) reports that now that President Bush "has pledged to be a bipartisan consensus builder," the question "is whether Mr. Bush is ready to junk all of his make-nice pledges in order to keep John R. Bolton at the United Nations. Officially, administration officials say they plan to make all the necessary calls to Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to try to persuade them to confirm Mr. Bolton for a new term." But with defeated Sen. Lincoln Chafee's Thursday announcement that he would "deny Republicans on the committee the last vote needed to send Mr. Bolton's nomination to the full Senate, some administration officials privately acknowledge that Mr. Bolton's chances of confirmation are 'nil,' one State Department official said."

Rangel Apologizes To Mississippians Over Comment. The New York Times (11/11, B3, Ramirez) reports Rep. Charles Rangel apologized for a comment that he says was "uttered with regional pride rather than rancor." On Wednesday, the incoming House Ways and Means chairman "talked about winning back more of the tax revenue that New York State sends to the Treasury. He said, 'Mississippi gets more than their fair share back in federal money, but who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?' Apparently, a lot of people do, and they are not shy about saying so." One colleague, Rep. Chip Pickering "reacted as if he and his state had been slapped with a glove." On Thursday, Rangel said in a statement, "I certainly don't mean to offend anyone. I just love New York so much that I can't understand why everyone wouldn't want to live here."

Pelosi's Office Clarifies Stance On House Vote For D.C. Delegate. The Washington Post (11/11, B1, Woodlee) reports a spokeswoman for Rep. Nancy Pelosi said the likely incoming speaker supports voting rights for the District of Columbia's House delegate. The statement "clarified her position after heated discussion on Washington Post Radio about her position on the issue. On Thursday, Pelosi said she would change House rules on the first day of the new Democratic-controlled session in January" so that D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton "could vote on proposed changes but not final approval of legislation on the House floor." In a related item, the Washington Times (11/11, Emerling) reports District voting rights advocates "are encouraged by the recent Democratic takeover of Congress, but would prefer a bill giving their representative a full vote in the House be considered before the end of this legislative session."

OTHER NEWS:

With Elections Done, Dow Could Continue To Soar. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, B1, Browning) reports, "Now that the stock and bond markets have shrugged off the major shift of political power in Washington, investors are beginning to wonder how much higher the stock market can go." The markets "seem to have welcomed the end of the divisive political campaign. Now, people's attention is turning back to more fundamental issues -- notably strong recent corporate profits and low interest rates." The Dow Jones "put in a gain of 122.39 points, or 1%," for the week, finishing at 12108.43, "just short of the record close of 12176.54 that it achieved Wednesday." The New York Times (11/11, C6) reports on the week's numbers as well.

Allen Concedes Senate Election. NBC Nightly News (11/9, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Democrats have taken over the Senate. As you know, it all hinged on the Virginia Senate race and that is all over. In the end Jim Webb won by about 7,000 votes and with that election went control of the Senate." Sen. George Allen was shown saying, "The people of Virginia, who I always call the owners of the government, they have spoken. And I respect their decision." And Webb was shown saying, "I would like to also today call on our President to publicly denounce the campaign tactics that have divided us."

On CNN's Larry King Live (11/9), Webb said, "I had a strong feeling when I entered this race that we could win, if things went our way. We were down 33 points at that time, but I always believed we could win. … I was very strongly concerned about the Iraq war. I was an early voice warning against going into Iraq. But I also have strong feelings about what has been happening to our country economically, with the breakdown along class lines, in a way that we probably haven't seen since the 1880s. And that's an issue that got an enormous amount of traction."

Asked on MSNBC's Tucker (11/9) how Webb is going to get along with "real liberals, legendary liberals," in the Senate, Democratic strategist Steve McMahon said, "He's going to get along fine with them. He's a Vietnam veteran who I'm sure had some strong views about what was going on in the country while there were people over fighting the war. But at the end of the day…he's a patriot, he's a moderate, he's a centrist, he matches Virginia beautifully, and he's going to be a great US senator."

The CBS Evening News (11/9, story 4, 2:25, Atkisson, 7.66M) reported that Democratic control of the Senate "means if there's an opening on the Supreme Court, it will be tougher for President Bush to push through a conservative Supreme Court nominee and it's less likely 'Roe v. Wade' will be overturned. But even with a majority, Democrats can't count on steamrolling through everything they want. As a minority, Republicans can always filibuster in the Senate, and the President has his veto pen."

The AP (11/10, Barakat) reports "Webb's supporters roared when he took his Marine son's battered combat boots from a bag and held them high above his head at a rally. Webb, whose son is fighting in Iraq, had worn the boots throughout what he called 'an unnecessarily brutal campaign.'" Allen "chose not to demand a recount when initial canvassing of the results failed to significantly alter Webb's lead."

The Washington Post (11/10, A1, Shear, MacJillis, 690K) reports, "Webb, 60, was a Republican for most of his life and for a time served under the godfather of the modern GOP, former president Ronald Reagan. But his election to the Senate delivered a final blow to the Republican Party."

The Washington Times (11/10, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) says "Allen's loss -- the third consecutive top office lost by state Republicans -- leaves the Virginia Republican party in disarray. 'George Allen is the patriarch of the modern Republican party in Virginia,' said Lt. Gov. William T. Bolling, one of several Republicans jockeying to be the new leader. His win last fall buoyed depressed party loyalists after their candidate Jerry W. Kilgore lost the gubernatorial race to Democrat Timothy M. Kaine." Now, "conservatives can choose to unite behind former leaders with an anti-tax message -- such as James S. Gilmore III, the last Republican chief executive -- or centrists such as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, who work with the opposing party. Mr. Davis won re-election Tuesday in a changing and growing Northern Virginia district that favored Mr. Webb." A Washington Post story (11/10, Shear, Craig) also says Allen was "the one who revitalized Virginia's Republican Party," adding he was also "considered a front-runner for the White House, with his folksy, football-and-cowboy charm." The New York Times (11/10, Broder, 1.16M), Los Angeles Times (11/10, Neuman, 850K) also report on the end of the Virginia campaign.

Webb Begins Transition As Allen Team Absorbs Stunning Loss. The Washington Post (11/11, B1, Shear) reports Sen.-elect Jim Webb "spent the day after clinching his victory by thanking his staff and beginning the process of making the transition from first-time candidate to freshman lawmaker." Webb told supporters Thursday that he "agreed to have lunch next week" with Sen. George Allen, but so far, "a time and place have not been determined" and Webb is waiting to hear from his defeated rival. Meanwhile, "aides to Allen said they were stunned by the loss, despite knowing for weeks that the race against Webb was very close. Members of Allen's Senate staff, many of whom are young, cried Thursday when they found out he had decided not to seek a recount of the ballots."

The New York Times (11/11, A12, Kornblut) writes that while "the most spectacular defeat" this week was Allen's, "who won the prize for most breathtaking downfall, not only losing his Senate seat to help hand power of the entire body to the Democrats, but also tarnishing a once-golden reputation in under three months flat," less obvious "but no less real was the damage to Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, a strategist once celebrated as the 'next Karl Rove.'"

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/10), host Dobbs gave Sen.-elect Jim Webb very favorable treatment during an interview, telling his "highly decorated Marine Vietnam veteran" guest that "you have the capacity, the experience and the character" to succeed in the Senate. Webb said, "One of the committees that I will be on, I can guarantee, will be one that deals with defense or foreign policy," and "I want to be on the Veterans' Committee. I've spent a good part of my life, as you know, either serving or working with veterans. And I feel a special obligation to the people who are serving."

Burns Concedes Defeat. The AP (11/10, Gouras) reports, "US Sen. Conrad Burns conceded defeat to Jon Tester on Thursday, acknowledging that a tight election had gone to the Democrats' favor, Burns' campaign told The Associated Press." Burns, "a three-term senator whose campaign was troubled by verbal gaffes and voter discontent, congratulated Tester, a farmer and state legislator. 'I stand ready to help as Montana transitions to a new United States Senator,' Burns said in a statement provided to the AP."

Tester's Move To Washington Will Be First Time Off The Farm. The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Verhovek) visits Big Sandy, Montana, home of Sen.-elect Jon Tester, "a wheat and lentil farmer who also has done stints here as a custom butcher, soil conservation board member, high school basketball referee and music teacher at Big Sandy Elementary School." Tester's Western roots "are genuine and about as deep as can be: He has never lived anyplace other than the family farm, which his grandparents homesteaded here in 1916."

King Glad To See Burns Go. In his Washington Post (11/11, A27) column, Colbert King writes, "Election night in the nation's capital was a pretty tame affair, given that most of the important local races were decided in the September primary. But for some of us who live in the District, the real action on election night took place far beyond city limits." Montana Sen. Conrad Burns "lost his seat, in part, because of his ties to corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff. But Burns hit rock bottom with some of us 12 years ago when we learned about his slur against the District's African American population."

Lieberman Says He Is Still A Democrat. The Los Angeles Times (11/11) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman affirmed he wants to be known as a Democrat in his new Senate term. Lieberman said this week that "he was reassured by Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid that he would retain his seniority in the new Senate."

Exit Polls Show Significant Narrowing Of Parties' "God Gap." The Washington Post (11/11, A1, Cooperman) reports on its front page that in the aftermath of this week's elections, "religious leaders across the ideological spectrum found something they could agree on: The 'God gap' in American politics has narrowed substantially. Religious liberals contended that a concerted effort by Democrats since 2004 to appeal to people of faith had worked minor wonders, if not electoral miracles, in races across the country." However, religious conservatives said the GOP "lost religious voters rather than the Democrats winning them." Either way, exit polls "told a dramatic story of changing views in the pews: Democrats recaptured the Catholic vote they had lost two years ago . They sliced the GOP's advantage among weekly churchgoers to 12 percentage points, down from 18 points in 2004 congressional races and 22 points in the 2004 presidential contest. Democrats even siphoned off a portion of the Republican Party's most loyal base, white evangelical Protestants."

Rove Said Impact Of Corruption Issue Was Greater Than Anticipated. Time.com (11/10, Allen) talks with Karl Rove about this week's elections. Rove said, "The profile of corruption in the exit polls was bigger than I'd expected. Abramoff, lobbying, Foley and Haggard added to the general distaste that people have for all things Washington, and it just reached critical mass." Rove "does not believe his data let him down." Rove said, "My job is not to be a prognosticator. My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, 'We're going to lose.' I'm looking at the data and seeing if I can figure out, 'Where can we be?' I told the President, 'I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control.'"

Chafee May Leave GOP. The AP (11/10, Smith) reports, "Two days after losing a bid for a second term, Sen. Lincoln Chafee said he was unsure whether he would remain a Republican." Yesterday "he was asked whether he would stick with the Republican Party or become an independent or Democrat. 'I haven't made any decisions. I just haven't even thought about where my place is,' Chafee said at a news conference. When pressed on whether his comments indicated he might leave the GOP, he replied: 'That's fair.'"

GOP Leads Most Still-Undecided House Races. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) "Washington Wire" reports Republicans "lead in most House races that remain undecided." Narrow margins for some "make recounts likely. But 'it's very unusual for recounts to alter races,' says Carl Forti" of the NRCC.

Mehlman To Step Down As RNC Chairman. The Washington Times (11/10, Hallow, 88K) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, "whose party just lost both chambers of Congress, will leave his position in January, and the post as party chief has been offered to Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele." Asked "about reports last night that he would resign," Mehlman said, "It is true. It's something I decided over the summer. No one told me I needed to. In fact, folks wanted me to stay." Mehlman said he "'told the White House over the summer it was my decision' to leave the RNC post, 'win, lose or draw.'" The Times adds Republican officials "told The Times that Mr. Steele, who lost his bid for the U.S. Senate on Tuesday, has been sought out to succeed Mr. Mehlman as national party chairman. Those Republican officials said Mr. Steele had not made a decision whether to take the post, as of last night." Other Republican Party officials "said some Republican National Committee (RNC) members, including state party chairmen, have mounted a move to have Mr. Steele succeed Mr. Mehlman. But they said that President Bush's political adviser Karl Rove, who is Mr. Mehlman's mentor, would rather see Mr. Steele serve in the president's Cabinet, perhaps as secretary of Housing and Urban Development."

The AP (11/10, Sidoti) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, "whose party lost both chambers of Congress in the midterm elections, will step down from his post when his two-year term ends in January, GOP officials said Thursday." The officials "said Mehlman made the decision not to run for a second term more than a month or two ago — well before the election."

The New York Times (11/10, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Mehlman said, "This has been a great ride, but at the same time I have a lot of interests in addition to politics." The Times adds Mehlman "ruled out going to work for any of the 2008 presidential candidates." Mehlman said, "My intention is to focus on identifying a platform that will be professionally rewarding for me for the next decade, that will include politics but not be related to politics." The Times adds Mehlman's "time in office has been marked by strong fund-raising — the committee spent $77 million on candidates this year — as well as the pioneering of sophisticated voter identification and turnout technologies that Republicans and Democrats said helped account for his party's successes in 2002 and 2004." Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts said, "I'd love to have him come work for me. He has revolutionized American politics." Romney "said Republican setbacks this year came about despite the advances Mr. Mehlman made in fund-raising and voter turnout operations." The Times adds the

"praise from Mr. Romney was echoed in an unsolicited call from James Carville, a veteran Democratic operative who is married to Mary Matalin, a veteran Republican strategist." Carville said, "The R.N.C. did a better job than the D.N.C. this year."

The Washington Post (11/10, Balz, 690K) reports White House officials "are trying to recruit a successor, but it was not known last night whether there was a leading candidate. One name that has emerged as a possible chairman is that of Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who just lost a bid for the Senate. But a GOP source said Steele is not likely to become chairman." Others "mentioned publicly as possible successor include Maria Cino, a former RNC official and now deputy secretary of transportation, and Mary Matalin, former communications director for Vice President Cheney and one of the party's most visible advocates. But a GOP strategist said, 'From what I understand, all these names are not on the table.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (11/9, King) reported, "It is almost certain now, all but certain, we are told by a number of Republican sources, that" RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman "will step down and leave that post by the end of the year. We want to make clear none of these sources are saying that there's any blame being assigned to Ken Mehlman. In fact, most Republican strategists at the White House and in the party across the country think that he did more than the best he could and that the damage would have even been worse in the mid-term elections if not for the RNC operation. He had told some close associates he planned to lave after the election anyway. … The number two at the Department of Transportation, Maria Cino, she's a veteran political strategist…is under consideration if Ken Mehlman steps down."

GOP Remap Strategy May Have Backfired. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A6, Cummings, 2.04M) reports gerrymandering was "supposed to cement Republican control of the House of Representatives, offering incumbents a wall of re-election protection even as public opinion turned sharply against them. Instead, the party's strategy of recrafting district boundaries may have backfired, contributing to the defeats of several lawmakers and the party's fall from power." Republican leaders "may have overreached and created so many Republican-leaning districts that they spread their core supporters too thinly. That left their incumbents vulnerable to the type of backlash from traditionally Republican-leaning independent voters that unfolded this week." That "helps to explain why three of four Republican incumbents in the Philadelphia area were beaten this week, while the remaining incumbent hung on by just a few thousand votes." In Florida, meanwhile, "state lawmakers had shifted some Republican voters from the secure district of former Rep. Mark Foley in an attempt to shore up the re-election chances of Rep. Clay Shaw without risking the Foley seat. Instead, Democrats took both."

Evangelical Leader Dobson Blasts GOP. The AP (11/10, Talhelm) reports, "Conservative Christian leader James Dobson accused the Republican Party of abandoning values voters in the midterm elections — and paying the price by losing control of Congress." In a statement, Dobson said, "What did they do with their power? Very little that values voters care about." The AP ads, "Finger-pointing abounded in the days after Democrats seized control of Congress after 12 years in the minority. Dobson, chairman of Focus on the Family, issued a statement railing against the Republicans for letting their majorities slip away." The "cybersex scandal involving former Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida and the fall of Ted Haggard, the evangelical pastor who was fired amid allegations of gay sex and drug use, left some values voters dispirited." More than "four in 10 evangelicals said corruption and scandals were extremely important, and those who felt that way were more likely to vote for Democratic candidates than other evangelicals."

Schwarzenegger Says He Is "Heartened" By Election Results. The Los Angeles Times (11/10, Nicholas, 850K) reports California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, in Mexico City, said "that he was heartened by Tuesday's election resulting in a Democratic takeover of Congress, welcoming what he described as 'new blood coming to Washington.'" Schwarzenegger "said he was hopeful that the changes will jump-start a political system that was paralyzed." After a meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox, Schwarzenegger said, "I think it's good that there are new ideas and new blood, because Washington was stuck. They could not move forward. Not much was accomplished. I think it was terrible." The Times adds Schwarzenegger said "he was hopeful that the results would usher in a new era of bipartisan cooperation — similar to what he said he is bringing about in Sacramento." But soon after "the governor finished speaking, one of his aides, communications director Adam Mendelsohn, told reporters that Schwarzenegger was not saying he was necessarily pleased to see Congress under Democratic control. Rather, Schwarzenegger was making the point that 'it's good there is an infusion of new ideas and desire for bipartisanship,' Mendelsohn said."

Schwarzenegger Urges GOP To Join Him In Center. The Washington Post (11/11, A6, Pomfret) writes, "In his victory speech Tuesday night to a confetti-swamped crowd at the Beverly Hilton, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had a message for the rest of the Republican Party after its worst defeat in decades. Follow 'the California way,' he said. 'We are proving to the nation that there is another way to go, a better path to solve problems.'" His "landslide victory in a largely Democratic state illustrates the growing power of moderate candidates and the electoral appeal of bipartisanship, and it could contain important lessons for Republicans and Democrats as they seek to position themselves in the future, analysts and politicians said." University of Southern California political analyst Sherry Bebitch Jeffe said, "If I was a Republican National Committee chair, I would hire Arnold out and teach Republicans what is necessary to put together a winning campaign. He really is the poster boy of what Republicans have denied for so long. Elections are won from the center."

Gingrich Sees Hope For Conservatives. The Washington Times (11/10, Hallow, 88K) reports Republicans, "suddenly a minority in both houses of Congress and led by an unpopular president, need to restore their image as the party of small government but at the same time avoid the image of blind obstructionism, party leaders and analysts said yesterday." Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said, "We have to recognize that this was a defeat for Republicans, not for conservatives." Gingrich said there is "hope to advance a conservative agenda" if House Republicans "can find allies among conservative Democrats." Gingrich said, "The balance of power in the House is now 50-plus blue-dog [conservative] Democrats." The Times adds it "won't be easy for Republicans to recover from Tuesday's defeat, because the party has 'completely lost its brand as the party of limited government and low spending,' said former Rep. Pat Toomey, president of the conservative Club for Growth."

Flake Says GOP Needs To Return To Fiscal Responsibility. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/10, A16), Rep. Jeff Flake says, "As Republicans, we have a choice to make, and we need to make it soon. The factions of the party must decide: Are we going to re-emerge as the party of ideas -- or be content as assistant hirelings of big government? We might begin by asking why we lost. Taxes, first, is the easy one, and there is no need for a Republican mea culpa here. We've cut taxes, and Americans and the economy are better off for it. But recently we've been satisfied with putting Democrats 'on record' supporting higher taxes. We need to do more." Second, "spending. This one is more difficult because it requires not just a mea culpa but abject apology. Not the politician-style – 'I'm sorry if you were offended by spending that our opponents have misinterpreted as offensive' -- but rather: 'We've overspent, badly, and it was offensive to you as well as our conservative principles. We're sorry, and we're going to do better.'" Of "immediate concern to Republicans in the House of Representatives is deciding who will be our standard bearer. Can those who have been a part of the current leadership team convince the other members that they've had an epiphany? It's possible, I suppose. But I think we'd be best served with some fresh faces, congressmen like Mike Pence and John Shadegg, who haven't had to travel that road to Damascus."

WSJournal Urges Republicans To Dump Current Leaders. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "As they lick their wounds, Republicans are no doubt wondering what went wrong and what to do now. The answers aren't all that complicated: Revive the reform convictions that earned them power in the 1990s, and start that process in the House of Representatives by electing a new slate of leaders. Twelve years ago, the Newt Gingrich-led Republicans swept into power as reformers who ran against corruption and pledged to make government 'smaller and smarter.' Somehow, across the years, that conviction was replaced by Tom DeLay and the quest for permanent incumbency, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis and the 'earmark' brigade, and a retinue of Beltway retainers symbolized by Jack Abramoff. The current leadership let it all happen, and if Republicans want a shot at regaining control in 2008 they'll turn to a new generation to lead them." House GOP leaders "should be returned to the backbenches." Republicans "might also recall what happened to Democrats when they tried to regain the House in 1996 by running with the same leadership and agenda that had been ousted in 1994. Those Democrats failed, despite Bill Clinton's victory at the top of the ticket, because too many voters saw the same old story. If Republicans lose again in 2008, they could be in the minority for a long time." The "good news is that a younger generation does seem to be stepping forward. Mike Pence, of Indiana, has already declared for minority leader, and John Shadegg of Arizona is seeking the number two job as whip. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, Jeb Hensarling of Texas and Jeff Flake of Arizona are among the other Members who have tried to put ideas above mere incumbency."

Some Democrats Want Ford To Replace Dean As DNC Chair. The New Republic Online (11/10, Lizza) writes that "some big name Democrats want to oust DNC Chairman Howard Dean, arguing that his stubborn commitment to the 50-state strategy and his stinginess with funds for House races cost the Democrats several pickup opportunities. The candidate being floated to replace Dean? Harold Ford." James Carville said, "Suppose Harold Ford became chairman of the DNC? How much more money do you think we could raise? Just think of the difference it could make in one day. Now probably Harold Ford wants to stay in Tennessee. I just appointed myself his campaign manager."

Steele Mum On Talk Of RNC Chairmanship. Meanwhile, on Fox News' Big Story (11/10, Gibson), Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele declined to say much about rumors he might succeed Ken Mehlman as RNC chair. Steele said, "I woke up on a Wednesday morning to blogs talking about this. This is a call of the President of the United States. This is a call of the leadership of the party. I'm flattered by it. But Ken Mehlman just announced his resignation, which he had made clear very early on that it would happen. Let us enjoy this moment and celebrate his achievements. And then the President and the White House will decide who the next head of the party will be and they'll move forward from there."

The Washington Times (11/11, Hallow, Ward) says Steele "is being pulled in several directions -- to take over as the national leader of the Republican Party in two months, to take a Cabinet post in the Bush administration or to go into the private sector. … Top national Republican leaders" have told Steele they want him to succeed Mehlman, according to the Times.

Democrats' Business Donations Neared Parity With GOP. USA Today (11/10, Davidson, 2.27M) reports Democrats "won the most expensive midterm election in history with stronger financial support from big business." Democratic congressional candidates "amassed $616 million vs. $632.2 million for Republicans in the 2005-06 election cycle, according to figures through Oct. 18 from the Center for Responsive Politics." Corporate donors "traditionally favor Republican candidates. In the last midterm contest in 2002, Democrats raised $248.6 million vs. Republicans' $342.2 million." While Democrats "attracted money from longtime supporters, such as trial lawyers and labor unions, they also drew a greater share from industries that lean Republican, such as pharmaceuticals. Some businesses may have been hedging their bets as a Democratic victory appeared more likely late in the campaign." The "total cost of the 2006 federal election was an estimated $2.8 billion, a 27% jump over 2002, the center says." Topping the "list of Democratic donors was the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which funneled 97% of its $2.2 million in contributions to Democrats. The union supports such Democratic-backed causes as raising the minimum wage." The Association of Trial Lawyers of America "kicked in $2.1 million, 95% to Democrats. The group is battling Republican efforts to limit big payouts in personal-injury cases."

GOP Lost Ground With Hispanic Voters. USA Today (11/10, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Republican gains "among Hispanic voters evaporated in Tuesday's elections, and some party leaders are blaming harsh rhetoric on immigration for the reversal." Cutting into "the Democrats' traditional advantage among Hispanic voters was a key to both of President Bush's election victories. In 2004, when Bush was at the top of the ticket, 44% of Hispanics surveyed after they cast their ballots said they voted Republican. This year, the figure dropped to 29%." The decline "is significant because Hispanics are fast becoming a crucial voting bloc. Census figures show Hispanics make up at least 10% of the population in 11 of the 28 U.S. House districts that switched from Republican to Democratic hands on Tuesday." Strategists from both parties say the vocal opposition of some Republicans to a proposed immigration bill that would give many of an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship drove Hispanics back to the Democratic camp."

Predictions Of Hispanic Voter Surge Said To Be "Just Premature." In a USA Today op-ed (11/10), Dallas freelance writer Marisa Treviño says, "Exit poll results from Tuesday's elections show an increase in Hispanic voting from 2002. Those results appear to confirm a pre-election report by the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO), which predicted that Latinos would make up about 6% of the vote. That's at least one percentage point up from 2002, but hardly enough to get excited about." So are "all the predictions of Latino voting clout to be dismissed? No. They're just premature. The coupling of Hispanic youth and technology just might change the equation." The "non-partisan Voto Latino, which aims to increase Hispanic voter participation, has targeted young Latinos by entering their world of cellphone text messaging and online social networks, such as MySpace."

WSJournal Says GOP's Hard Line On Immigration "Fools Gold." In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/10, 2.04M) says, "Republicans on Tuesday managed both to lose their majority in Congress and alienate a fast-growing bloc of Latino swing voters. Other than that, the House GOP strategy of trying to save itself by bucking President Bush and using immigration as a wedge issue worked pretty well." Republicans "can't say they weren't warned. Like trade protectionism, the immigration issue is the fool's gold of American politics. Voters like to sound off to pollsters about immigrants, yet they pull the lever with other matters foremost in mind. Elections seldom if ever turn on immigration, and the GOP restrictionist message so adored by talk radio, cable news and the nativist blogosphere once again failed to deliver the goods. … We hope" the Republican Party lets Bush address the issue, "having learned the hard way not to follow Lou Dobbs, Bill O'Reilly and the editors of National Review magazine down the garden path to defeat."

Voting Machines Backed By Harris May Have Malfunctioned In Her District. The AP (11/10, Davis) reports the "touch-screen voting machines Katherine Harris championed as secretary of state after the 2000 presidential recount may have botched this year's election to replace her in the U.S. House, and it's likely going to mean another Florida recount." More than "18,000 Sarasota County voters who marked other races didn't have a vote register in the House race, a rate much higher than the rest of the district, elections results show." Florida Secretary of State Sue Cobb "sent a team to Sarasota County on Thursday to observe the expected recount and audit the county's touch-screen voting machines. The county's elections supervisor, Kathy Dent, had requested the team after one of the candidates reported complaints about voting machines malfunctioning." Republican Vern Buchanan "declared victory in the race with a 373-vote lead over Democrat Christine Jennings — less than 0.2 percent."

The New York Times (11/10, Goodnough, 1.16M) reports Jennings "is seeking a recount after dozens of people reported problems using Sarasota County's touch-screen voting machines and a significant number of ballots had no recorded votes in the high-profile race." Jennings lost to Buchanan "by just 373 votes out of a total 237,861 cast — one of the closest House races in the nation. More than 18,000 voters in Sarasota County, or 13 percent of those who went to the polls Tuesday, did not seem to vote in the Congressional race when they cast ballots, a discrepancy that Kathy Dent, the county elections supervisor, said she could not explain." In comparison, 'only 2 percent of voters in one neighboring county within the same House district and 5 percent in another skipped the Congressional race, according to The Herald-Tribune of Sarasota. And many of those who did not seem to cast a vote in the House race did vote in more obscure races, like for the hospital board." A "preliminary review by The Herald-Tribune found that if Ms. Jennings had won the same percentage of the 18,000 missing votes as she did among counted votes in Sarasota County, she would have won the race by about 600 votes instead of losing by 373."

Voters Approve 88% Of $76.6 Billion In Borrowing Authority. USA Today (11/10, Cauchon, 2.27M) reports, "Voters were in a borrowing mood this week. State and local governments won approval for more than 88% of the $78.6 billion they asked to borrow in Tuesday's election, according to i-Deal, a New York company that tracked the results." The money "will be spent on schools, roads, sewers, fire stations and other projects." California voters "approved the biggest chunk of debt: $43 billion for five bond issues for roads, schools, flood control, parks and affordable housing."

Vilsack Kicks Off "Long Shot" Presidential Bid. The New York Times/AP (11/10, Glover) reports Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, "a centrist Democrat seeking an early edge in an all-but-certain crowded presidential field, launched a long-shot bid for the White House Thursday." Fifteen months "before his own state holds caucuses — the first step in the nominating process — Vilsack announced his candidacy, filed documents with the Federal Election Commission and heralded a multistate tour beginning Nov. 30." Overshadowing the "announcement is the upheaval in Washington as Democrats captured control of the House and Senate in Tuesday's elections. But Vilsack, a little-known Midwest governor, needs all the attention he can get — and the first infusion of campaign cash." In polls, Vilsack "has trailed the other potential candidates, among them front-runner New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards. Earlier this year, the governor even was behind in a survey of Iowans." Vilsack will "begin his tour in his hometown of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and will make stops in New Hampshire, Nevada, Pennsylvania and South Carolina. Vilsack was born in Pittsburgh, and the other states hold key early tests in the nomination process." Vilsack has not "been the only Democrat campaigning in Iowa. Several potential, more familiar candidates have traveled to the state, including Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama." When Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin "sought the Democratic nomination in 1992, rivals decided to cede the state to him, but Vilsack is unlikely to get such a break, strategists say."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/9, Blitzer) reported, "Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is getting a jump-start on the 2008 presidential race. He's now the first Democrat to throw his hat into the ring. The outgoing Vilsack announced today he's filing the necessary paperwork to run for president. He may have an edge in the lead-off presidential caucuses. That would be in his home state of Iowa. But polls show him way behind other better-known Democrats weighing presidential bids."

ABC World News (11/9, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Now that the 2006 vote is decided, here comes 2008. Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack, declared today that he's running for the presidential nomination. Iowa is where the caucuses that begin the nomination processes will be held in 15 months. There's one Republican presidential candidate so far. California congressman Duncan Hunter has taken the first steps towards running."

NBC Nightly News (11/9, story 9, 2:25, Faw, 9.87M) reported, "If you think Britney Spears, cavorting the same day she announces she's getting divorced, if you think she's getting ahead of herself, fasten your seatbelts because the presidential campaign of 2008, a mere 727 days from now, is also off and running. Today Iowa's two-term governor filed papers to run for President. Another household word, Duncan Hunter, yes the Republican from California, recently set up his exploratory committee." Rep. Duncan Hunter: "Preparing to run for President of the United States in 2008." Faw: "There is precedent, of course, for getting a head start. More than 30 years ago a relative unknown Jimmy Carter started running when almost no one was looking and look what happened to him. So it makes a certain amount of sense to start now or at least say one might." Tim Russert: But it's fair to say you're thinking of running for President in 2008?" Sen. Barack Obama: "It's fair, yes." Faw: "Early birds aren't foolhardy, especially unknowns who need what the anointed frontrunners already have, name recognition and money." But to "all this gearing up so early, some say enough already."

Yepsen Rates Vilsack's Chances. On MSNBC's Hardball (11/9, Matthews), David Yepsen of the Des Moines

Register discussed the 2008 Iowa caucuses, saying that if Vilsack runs, he has "a real problem, because I don't see how he wins anything here. He's expected to win. If he does, people like you are going to shrug it off as expected. And if he loses, and he's running fourth place in the polls out there, then it's going to be a big hit." Sen. Barack Obama has "sure acted like a candidate. He's made three or four visits to the state and got huge crowds." As for Sen. John Kerry, Yepsen said, "I think he's finished." On the GOP side, Gov. Mitt Romney "has started early. He's organizing. He's reaching out to lots of different people. He's got religious conservatives. He's also got party moderates. … Romney, I think, has got himself in a good position."

McCain To Create Presidential Exploratory Committee. NBC Nightly News (11/10, story 4, 2:55, Williams) reported, "The week is ending with yet another political development and this one didn't take long." Sen. John McCain "will set up an exploratory committee for a 2008 presidential run. Senator McCain will talk about his plans this Sunday when he will be Tim Russert's guest on 'Meet the Press.'" The New York Times (11/11, A13, Kornblut) reports McCain advisers say the Senator has "not made up his mind whether to run, although he has acknowledged that he is strongly considering doing so. 'There's not going to be a formal announcement this year,' John Weaver, an adviser to Mr. McCain, said. The senator, who appears at or near the top of public opinion surveys about who should run for higher office, will wait until the Christmas holidays, when his children are home, to make a final decision." The AP (11/10) also reports on McCain's early move.

Clinton Has No Plans To Shut Down Campaign Apparatus. The New York Times (11/11, B1, Healy) reports that while Sen. Hillary Clinton's re-election run may be over, she is "hardly closing up her campaign shop or worrying about deep debts. Advisers to Mrs. Clinton say she has more than $10 million left in her political bank account, not to mention a priceless reservoir of speeches, issue research, and financial networks nationally for any future use. Her advisers also say that she does not intend to disassemble her campaign apparatus and staff, as many candidates do when an election ends, nor does she plan to immediately close her New York City and Washington campaign offices. Indeed, the Clinton camp has spent months building a re-election team that could easily shift into gear for a 2008 presidential bid."

More Than Two Dozen Potential Candidates In The Wings. A CQ Weekly (11/10, Crawford) piece that exceeds 10,000 words examines the prospects of more than two dozen possible presidential candidates. On the Democratic side: Sen. Evan Bayh, Sen. Joseph Biden, Wesley Clark, Clinton, Tom Daschle, Sen. Christopher Dodd, John Edwards, Sen. Russ Feingold, Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry, Sen. Barack Obama, Gov. Bill Richardson, and Gov. Tom Vilsack. On the Republican side: Sen. George Allen, Sen. Sam Brownback, Sen. Bill Frist, Newt Gingrich, Rudy Giuliani, Sen. Chuck Hagel, Gov. Mike Huckabee, Rep. Duncan Hunter, McCain, Gov. George Pataki, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Gov. Mitt Romney, and Rep. Tom Tancredo.

Denver Hopes To Land 2008 Democratic Convention. USA Today (11/10, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports, "The Mile High City is hoping that a rising Democratic tide in Colorado and the West will lift its chances of hosting the party's 2008 convention." Officials "involved in Denver's bid for the convention say their prospects against rival New York City improved on Tuesday as Colorado voters put a decidedly Democratic stamp on the state." Democrats in Colorado "this week reclaimed the governorship after eight years of GOP rule, captured a House seat that had been Republican since 2002 and strengthened their majorities in the state House and state Senate. Colorado Democrats will hold four of seven U.S. House seats, a U.S. Senate seat and, for the first time since Dwight Eisenhower was president, control both the Legislature and governor's office."

Gingrich Emerging As "Top Conservative" For 2008. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) "Washington Wire" reports that the "ebbing fortunes" of Sens. George Allen, Bill Frist, and Rick Santorum have left ex-House Speaker Newt Gingrich the "top conservative prospect" for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. "'He can win some primaries,' says Bush ad-maker Mark McKinnon," who is with Sen. John McCain's likely campaign.

WSJournal Says Conservative Values Triumphant In Referenda. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A6) editorializes, "Republicans took a drubbing in Tuesday's elections. But judging by the results of various referendums nationwide, some of the ideas they used to stand for are alive, well and popular among voters. The most significant moral victory comes in Michigan, where voters approved by a surprisingly lopsided 58-42 margin Proposal 2, which bars discrimination and preferential treatment 'in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting.'" In California, "four measures that would have raised taxes in an already overtaxed state went down in flames. … Also encouraging were the nine states that passed anti-Kelo referendums. … What all this tells us is that while voters have delivered a partisan rebuke to a party that likes to describe itself as conservative, they still believe in low taxes, property rights and social conservatism -- so long as it is not extreme. There's a lesson here for the next crop of GOP candidates, assuming they're willing to pay attention."

US Commission on Civil Rights Vice Chair Lauds Michigan Vote. In a Wall Street Journal (11/11, A7) op-ed, US Commission on Civil Rights Vice Chair Abigail Thernstrom writes, "Ward Connerly has done it again: A striking 58% of Michigan voters gave the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative a thumbs up; only three counties voted against it. … The modern-day survival of racial preferences depends on sympathetic judges willing to spin dubious arguments and ignore widely available data on the pernicious impact of such preferences. But, this time, the University of Michigan may find itself without judicial recourse. The Supreme Court has never said that universities are constitutionally obligated to institute 'diversity' policies. Public universities are funded by taxpayers. And those taxpayers have spoken."

Trade Deficit Narrows. The Wall Street Journal (11/10, A2, Hitt, Whitehouse, 2.04M) reports, "Even as the overall US trade deficit narrowed in September, the country's imbalance with China continued to worsen, pointing to possible new tensions in trade policy making now that Democrats have retaken Congress. With the price of imported oil in sharp decline, the deficit fell 6.8% to $64.3 billion in September, the Commerce Department said yesterday. A broad easing of imports on the back of the first decline in oil prices in five months combined with a continued strong export performance to improve the trade picture." Yet "there were indications that the trade gap remains a problem. September's deficit, though down from August's revised record of $68.96 billion, was still one of the largest ever. And the rapidly ballooning deficit with China showed no sign of easing."

Stocks Down Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (11/9, story 8, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today the Dow was off more than 73 points [to close at 12,103.30]. Nasdaq was down almost nine points [to close at 8.93] in today's trading." The Wall Street Journal (11/10, C1, Browning, 2.04M) notes "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.53%, or 7.39 points, to 1378.33, still up 10.4% in 2006."

Wyoming Senator Hospitalized With Leukemia. The AP (11/10, Gruver) reports Republican Sen. Craig Thomas of Wyoming, "hospitalized since Monday with pneumonia, has been diagnosed with a form of leukemia, his spokesman said Thursday." Thomas "who was easily elected to a third term while in the hospital, issued a statement saying he will undergo treatment and plans to return to Congress in January." While hospitalized, "doctors noticed a low white blood cell count and a bone marrow biopsy revealed leukemia, cancer of the blood and bone marrow. Thomas was to immediately begin a four- to six-week course of chemotherapy and will remain at the hospital to reduce his risk of infection, his office said in a press release Thursday."

US Arms Makers Doubled Foreign Sales In One Year. The New York Times (11/11, Wayne, 1.16M) reports in its Business section, "Sales of military weapons by United States contractors to foreign governments doubled in the last year, as countries like Pakistan, Australia and Greece stepped up purchases of armaments and the United States government loosened policies to allow more American weapons to be sold on the world market. A total of $21 billion in arms sales agreements were signed from September 2005 to September 2006, compared with $10.6 billion in the previous year, according to new data compiled by the Pentagon." The foreign sales "have provided a welcome source of new revenue at a time when the Pentagon has indicated that the era of record military budgets is ending."

O'Malley Backs Racetrack Slot Machines In Maryland. The Washington Post (11/11, B1, Wagner) reports Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley called upon the state legislature "to legalize slot machine gambling at horse tracks, saying he was 'sick of this issue' but feared that the state's racing industry could collapse if lawmakers did not find common ground early in his term."

O'Malley Is Latest Baltimore Politician To Move On. The Washington Times (11/11, Miller) takes a sentimental look at Baltimore reign as "the nexus of Maryland political power" as its mayor prepares to head off to Annapolis.

Democratic Congress To Push For Shift In US Foreign Policy. The Washington Post (11/10, A7, Kessler, 690K) reports the Democratic takeover of Congress "will raise the profile of lawmakers who have repeatedly urged the Bush administration to talk to key adversaries such as Iran, North Korea and Syria, increasing pressure on the White House to stop placing restrictions or conditions on such discussions." The Post notes that incoming chairmen of the Senate and House Foreign Relations Committees -- Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Rep. Tom Lantos of California, respectively -- have "long argued that the administration's approach to dealing with adversaries has hamstrung diplomacy," particularly in the cases of Iran, Syria and North Korea. State Department officials "said that yesterday they are open to ideas, but that the change in Congress will not directly affect administration policies."

Global Outlook Upbeat In Response To Election, Rumsfeld Resignation. In a separate article, the Washington Post (11/10, A6, Moore, Finn, 690K) reports, "For Europe and much of the rest of the world, US voters' repudiation of the Bush administration in midterm elections Tuesday and the dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald H.

Rumsfeld on Wednesday confirmed the widespread view that President Bush and his policies have done more to tarnish America's image abroad and strain its global relations than any other US president in recent history." The "seismic political shift" in the US was "greeted in many places less with jubilation than with a sense of relief that Americans had at long last come to their senses." The Post adds that "political parties, government leaders, pundits and citizens from many countries seized on the return of a bipartisan government in the United States as a harbinger of welcome change in the Bush administration's policy of using the military."

Bush Reassures Calderon On Immigration Reform. McClatchy (11/10, Hall, Bachelet) reports President Bush "got an earful" from Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon "about immigration restructuring and controversial legislation" that Bush signed authorizing construction of a fence along the US-Mexican border. However, Calderon said he would "try to keep immigration from drowning out other important issues," such as anti-narcotics cooperation and trade. He also expressed hope that "the new composition of the US Congress allows a solution to the (immigration) issues."

The Washington Times (11/10, Dinan, 88K) says Bush gave Calderon "an assurance…that he will push for a broad immigration bill that includes a new guest-worker program and citizenship rights for many illegal aliens." The Times also notes that "although he didn't criticize the fence in his remarks to reporters in the Oval Office," Calderon said "at a later press conference attended by Mexican and Spanish-language press that he told Mr. Bush the fence is a mistake."

Iran Says Tough Sanctions Could Force End To Nuclear Inspections. The Los Angeles Times (11/11, Murphy) reports, "A defiant Iran, calling the Republican defeat in the U.S. elections a 'landmark victory for the Iranian nation,' warned Friday that it would reassess its cooperation with international atomic regulators if the United Nations moved forward with comprehensive sanctions on Iran's nuclear program." Chief nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani was in Moscow trying to win "Russia's support for weakening or postponing the sanctions." He "said Iran remained ready for dialogue and warned against adopting the European group's sanctions resolution." Moscow "proposed significantly scaled-down sanctions amendments that would focus strictly on halting Iran's uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities and prevent the development of missiles to deliver nuclear weapons." The Russian "proposal would leave intact Russia's $1-billion civilian nuclear power plant under construction in the Iranian city of Bushehr, a key focus of Larijani's agenda in Moscow, analysts said."

Rice Urges Russia To Bridge Gap Over UN Sanctions On Iran. Bloomberg (11/10, Johnson) reports Secretary Rice "has spoken twice in the past week with her Russian counterpart to bridge differences over how to stop Iran developing nuclear weapons," Assistance Secretary Sean McCormack said Thursday. Noting that the Secretary has spoken by telephone with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Nov. 8 and also last week, McCormack said, "She's doing her part to get this resolution over the goal line." When asked if Rice made any progress in her conversations with Lavrov, he said, "We're starting to chip away at some of the issues, but…this is multilateral diplomacy, it takes a little bit of time."

Rice Says US Unfazed By China's Growing Global Role. AFP (11/10) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "played down concerns over the spread of Chinese influence around the globe, saying it was better for China to have friends in the world than enemies." In an interview with Singapore's Strait Times newspaper, Rice said, "I'd like to have China have friends in the world, it's better than having China have enemies in the world. There have been times when we worried about the opposite -- that China would be a destabilizing factor in the world So I would rather see a China that is trying to reach out, that's trying to have friendships around the world." As President Bush prepares to meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao at next week's APEC summit, Rice "said Washington still harbored concerns about China's role."

Friedman Says China To Dominate US Politics In 2008. New York Times (11/10, 1.16M) columnist Thomas Friedman says China is "the country that's most likely to shape US politics in 2008." The rise of China and India, he says, will be the "trend that historians will cite as the most significant" of the current era, and "how the world accommodates itself to these rising powers, and how America manages the economic opportunities and challenges they pose, is still the most important global trend to watch." And while "the Bush team's focus on Iraq and terrorism, coupled with the Democrats' lack of control over either house of Congress, has kept China-US relations largely out of the headlines and on a relatively even keel during the Bush II years," the Democrats' return to control of both the House and Senate "will change that."

US To Resume Training Of Latin American Militaries. USA Today (11/10, Slavin, 2.27M) reports on its front page that "concern about leftist victories in Latin America has prompted President Bush to quietly grant a waiver that allows the United States to resume training militaries from 11 Latin American and Caribbean countries.

The administration hopes the training will forge links with countries in the region and blunt a leftward trend."

In "Precarious Position," Ortega Said To Balance Competing Demands. In an analysis of Daniel Ortega's election as president of Nicaragua, the New York Times (11/11, A3, McKinley) reports that, in Latin America, "the stubbornness of old cold warriors in Washington and the equal tenacity of leftist governments in Cuba and Venezuela have kept a miniature cold war going. Just as it was 20 years ago, Nicaragua now finds itself smack in the middle of the conflict with the election this week of" Ortega. He "faces a balancing act no politician would envy, both inside the country and on the world stage." While he must "satisfy his supporters" and "remain friendly with his leftist allies," Ortega "can ill afford to lose more than $50 million a year in United States aid or credit from the International Monetary Fund. Neither can Nicaragua, one of the poorest countries in the hemisphere, jettison the newly approved free trade agreement between Central American countries and the United States. Just to survive economically, this nation of some 5.6 million people needs to continue exporting textiles and fruit to the United States and receiving remittances from Nicaraguans in the north." His "precarious position may explain the careful nuance in his recent speeches," with the Times saying Ortega "is walking very softly and speaking in dulcet tones." He "has taken pains to calm businessmen, assuring foreign investors on Wednesday that he will protect property rights in exchange for help combating poverty," but he has "made it clear that he would not be Washington's lackey." The Administration "has taken a wait-and-see attitude in the face of what seems like two different Ortegas."

White House Adopts "Wait-And-See" Approach With Ortega. The Washington Times (11/10, Gentile, 88K) reports the Bush administration has "adopted a wait-and-see approach toward relations with Nicaragua after the return to power of former White House foe Daniel Ortega." Although some US lawmakers "expressed fears" before Sunday's vote, US officials said "after a clear victory" they would "respect the decision of the Nicaraguan people." State Department spokesman Eric Watnik said the administration is "willing to give the benefit of the doubt" to Ortega.

NYTimes Says Power, Not Ideology, Motivates Ortega. In an editorial, the New York Times (11/11, A14) calls Ortega "an old-style Latin American strongman who, we fear, will further weaken Nicaragua's democratic institutions and retard economic progress. Washington's challenge will be to figure out how to help curb Mr. Ortega's authoritarian impulses without pushing him into Mr. Chávez's arms." Ortega "had to use a series of political maneuvers and dirty tricks to ensure his victory," and, the Times concludes, while he "was once pro-Marxist, now he's pro-Ortega. And that's the problem."

Columnist Praises Advances Made By Opposition Party. Wall Street Journal (11/10, A17, 2.04M) columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady says Ortega's victory "has demoralized Nicaraguans who were hoping that the days of thuggish Sandinista government might be behind them. Yet despite the disappointment of an Ortega comeback, there are reasons not to paint the country with the broad brush of defeat in the aftermath of the election." For example, she says candidate Eduardo Montealegre's Liberal Nicaraguan Alliance (ALN) has "accomplished something big for Nicaraguan democracy by unseating the corrupt PLC as the country's main center-right party and establishing itself as a credible force against the Sandinistas."

Security Council To Vote On Gaza Offensive Resolution. The AP (11/11, Bergman) reports the UN Security Council "will vote [today] on an Arab-backed draft resolution condemning the Israeli military offensive in Gaza and demanding a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the coastal strip, a European diplomat said." That text "was softened somewhat from a version being circulated earlier this week," but "diplomats said Friday there remained concerns among some of the council members about the language of the draft, making passage uncertain." Qatar proposed the text, which "calls for Israel to immediately cease its military operations in the Gaza Strip and withdraw its troops. It also calls upon the Palestinian Authority to take 'immediate and sustained action' to bring an end to violence, including the firing of rockets on Israeli territory." The resolution would ask the UNS to establish a "'fact-finding mission' to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, and asks the international community to restart the peace process with the 'possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations.'"

Haniyeh's Resignation Offer Could Auger Unity Government. The AP (11/11, Barzak) notes Palestinian PM Ismail Haniyeh "said Friday he would be willing to sacrifice his job if the international community would lift economic sanctions that have crippled his Hamas-led government." Those remarks were "the latest indication that the Islamic Hamas group was nearing a deal to form a national unity government with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' moderate Fatah Party that would be made up of independent experts. Such a coalition would presumably present a more moderate face to the world and convince the West to restore hundreds of millions of dollars in international funding." Also, Abbas spoke yesterday with Hamas "supreme leader" Khaled Mashaal, and a Hamas official "said their discussion indicated the sides were nearing agreement."

Merkel Says Berlin Will Revive Quartet Next Year. The Financial Times (11/11, Williamson) reports remarks by

German Chancellor Angela Merkel that her nation "will try to advance the Middle East peace process next year by reviving the joint diplomatic efforts in the region by the US, European Union, Russia and the United Nations." She said publicly that "Germany would use its EU presidency from January onwards to breath new life into the Middle East 'Quartet' involving these four international interests." Government "officials said the chancellor's comments reflected frustration in Germany and the EU that the quartet had been largely inactive in recent months, despite the tensions and violence in the Middle East." Merkel's announcement followed repeated suggestions by [Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier] that the quartet structure be revived, in particular to draw Washington into broader international initiatives in the Middle East." He has "argued" that "its mandate could be expanded to include related regional conflicts, such as that between Israel and Lebanon."

Palestinians Protest Attacks As Olmert Seeks Meeting With Abbas. The CBS Evening News (11/9, story 6, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Gaza, tens of thousands of Palestinians took to the streets many calling for revenge following an Israeli attack that killed 18. The shells were meant to take out Hamas rockets, but instead hit several homes. Israel's Prime Minister blames the mistake on a technical failure."

The New York Times (11/10, A3, Fisher, 1.16M) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Thursday said he was "very uncomfortable" and "very distressed" by the incident, and "offered to ease tensions by meeting the Palestinian president 'anytime, anyplace.'" Saying that he had "personally investigated" the artillery strike, Olmert called the shelling Wednesday a "mistake" caused by "technical failure." Olmert also said Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "will be surprised when he will sit with me of how far we are prepared to go. I can offer him a lot." Although he offered no further explanation, the Times says "his words seemed to reflect deep embarrassment at the deaths, mostly of women and children." Abbas did not immediately respond to Olmert's offer.

Olmert Says Israel Won't Stop Targeting Gaza. The AP (11/10, El Deeb) reports Olmert also said Thursday Israel "will keep targeting Palestinian rocket squads in Gaza despite the risk of inadvertently hitting civilians." Although he "regrets the latest deaths," the prime minister said Israel will "press ahead with strikes" against Palestinian militants. Also Thursday, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "picked up the phone and called his main political rival, Hamas' supreme leader Khaled Mashaal," in a move the AP said "could help prevent the Islamic militant group from renewing attacks on Israel and also pave the way for a moderate Palestinian government."

Hamas Has "Big Stake" In Truce With Israel. In an analysis, the AP (11/10, Gutkin) says Hamas' threats to resume attacks inside Israel are "playing well on the Palestinian street, but the group has a big stake in keeping its truce with Israel as it struggles to end a Western aid boycott and transform itself into a legitimate political power. Hamas is already moving ahead with efforts to form a national unity government with the rival Fatah Party," which the AP says "would presumably project a more moderate face to the world."

NYTimes Calls Bush, Rice Responses "Woefully Inadequate." In an editorial, the New York Times (11/10, 1.16M) says though "there have never been easy answers for how to broker peace between Israel and the Palestinians," the "horrifying price of ignoring the problem was made clear again this week when errant Israeli tank shells crashed into a Gaza neighborhood, killing 18 people, including seven children, as they slept." After Hamas's military wing called for retaliatory attacks on American targets, the Times says "analysts were trying to figure out which was the most immediate danger: a new wave of terrorist attacks against Americans, the start of a full scale Israeli-Palestinian war, or a civil war between Hamas and its rival Fatah if talks on forming a unity government fail." In such times, the Times says President Bush's call for "care and restraint" on all sides "seems woefully inadequate. That is also how we would describe Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's sterile tour of the region last month. Since her return, the administration has not taken a single step to revive peace talks." Therefore, it urges Bush "to pledge his prestige and the full resources of his remaining presidency to negotiating a Middle East peace. Even before Mr. Olmert visits Washington next week, Mr. Bush should send Ms. Rice back to the region to broker an immediate cease-fire."

Jerusalem's Gay Community Gathers Under Heavy Security. The New York Times (11/11, A7, Myre) reports, "After Supreme Court rulings, criticism from the Vatican and several nights of rioting by angry opponents, Jerusalem's gay community held a small, orderly rally Friday under a heavy police guard." The "venue was changed twice as the police sought a secure area, well away from an Orthodox Jewish neighborhood where youths have rioted in opposition to the event." The Times calls the event "much more modest than the original plan, which had called for a large march through the city center, and organizers and participants were divided on whether to declare it a full success." The march "was again marked by staunch opposition from Jewish, Muslim and Christian leaders, who rarely find points of agreement. … In liberal, secular Tel Aviv, gay-themed events take place without a ripple. But in Jerusalem, there is always friction," including the cancellation of last year's gay festival because of opposition and the subsequent stabbing of three marchers by an Orthodox anti-gay activist.

Under the headline, "Israeli Gay Rights Parade Called Off," the Los Angeles Times (11/11, Boudreaux) notes, "For days, Israeli television aired images of ultra-Orthodox Jews in black suits and hats, pelting police with stones and setting cars afire in a crusade against a planned gay pride march through Jerusalem." That "battle ended Friday in a setback for Israel's gay community, which bowed to police and rabbinical pressure to take the annual event off the streets and confine it to a stadium. Nearly 4,000 revelers waved rainbow flags and danced to live rock and rap music, but the mood was dampened by a sense of retreat." The controversy over the march "reflected a sharp divide in Israeli society."

Lebanese Government Considering UN Proposal For Hariri Assassination Court. The New York Times (11/11, A7, Hoge) notes the UN "delivered a draft document to the Lebanese government on Friday outlining the framework of an international tribunal to try suspects in the assassination of the country's former prime minister, Rafik Hariri." That "draft arrived in Beirut at a moment of heightened political tension. The Syrian-supported Hezbollah militia is seeking more power in the government and is not eager to see the tribunal go forward." The Times says the "final draft does not include an earlier mention of the possibility of trials on crimes against humanity. But among the crimes the tribunal can judge, the draft lists acts of terrorism, crimes and offenses against life and personal integrity, illicit associations and failure to report crimes or evidence of conspiracy." The concept "was approved this week by the five permanent members of the Security Council after procedural objections from Russia were met over how the judges and prosecutors were to be chosen." UN prosecutor Serge Brammertz's "investigation has already implicated senior Lebanese and Syrian security officials, though Syria has denied any role." The inquiry "has concluded that the Hariri killing was highly organized and planned by professionals with past experience in such activities."

Emirati Female Cabinet Minister Becomes Role Model For Region's Women. The New York Times (11/11, A4, Fattah) profiles Sheika Lubna al-Qassimi, minister of economy and planning for the United Arab Emirates and the nation's first female Cabinet member. "After decades of pushing the barriers in a region where women have traditionally been kept out of the public sphere, Sheika Lubna now towers as one of the country's most influential women." Hers is "a particularly important position in a nation that is a major oil producer and relies so heavily on foreign investment, and where the economy continues to boom." In spite of her work and travel schedule, "she has remained conscious of her role in chipping away at the restrictions women face in" the Middle East. Noting that the UAE has "one of the fastest growing economies in the Middle East" and is "one of the most open societies in the Persian Gulf," the Times say Sheika Lubna "has sought to prove to women here that they, too, must begin assuming a greater role in public life." Despite being a wealthy aristocrat, she "chose the hard way," studying in California and building a computer programming career in Dubai. The Times adds, "As she set out to advocate for the Emirates, people at home, especially young women seeking to break out of the traditional mold, saw a different message: it was time to rise to the challenge."

Euro Referendum Decision Could Worsen Polish-EU Relations. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A4, Champion, 2.04M) notes Warsaw "plans to hold a referendum on whether to join the European Union's common currency, the euro, in 2010, adding to concerns over the commitment level of the EU's biggest new member." Polish rejection of the euro "would follow a precedent set by Sweden, which has voted not to join the euro despite a legal obligation to do so. But Poland's plan is just the latest move by President Lech Kaczynski and his twin brother, Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski, to put Poland at loggerheads with the EU." Polish officials predict the nation will meet euro entry criteria in 2009. The Journal says "the decision to hold a referendum raises a question about Poland's membership intentions. The referendum would be held in the same year as Polish presidential elections, making the euro issue highly political."

Greek Cypriots Demand EU Renounce Turkish Trade Ban. The Washington Times (11/11, Borowiec) reports, "The battle of wills over Turkey's European Union membership application heightened yesterday after the government of Cyprus warned that the bloc's credibility was at stake if it tolerates Ankara's ban on Greek Cypriot air and sea traffic." Foreign Minister George Lillikas "termed Ankara's refusal to open its harbors and airports to Greek Cypriot ships and planes a 'provocation' which the EU should not tolerate." The EU "has given Turkey a month to liberalize trade links with all 10 countries that joined in 2004, including Cyprus." This week's "stinging" EU report on accession progress "also criticized Turkey's penal code, corruption, human rights record and the interference by the military in politics." EU expansion commissioner Olli Rehn "warned that a one-month deadline given Turkey to change its policy 'is likely to be the last opportunity to make real, serious progress for some years to come' on the Cyprus question, which emerged as a major obstacle in Turkey's EU hopes."

US Pans UN Human Rights Council's Performance. The AP (11/10, Bergman) reports Washington "sharply criticized the new U.N. Human Rights Council on Friday, calling it a 'disappointment' and saying it has failed to address serious violations in its first few months of operation — particularly in Sudan's Darfur region. Sudan responded with a harsh condemnation of the U.S. human rights record and said Washington had no right to judge the effectiveness of the U.N. agency." USUN's Miriam Hughes "criticized the council for a 'slow and discouraging start,' saying it has 'accomplished little that will make a concrete and significant difference in the lives of millions around the world.'" The AP continues, "Referring to the two special sessions the council has held to discuss alleged human rights violations by Israel, she said some nations view the council 'as just another arena in which to play political games.'" In contrast, "speaking on behalf of the EU, Finnish Ambassador Kirsti Lintonen told the General Assembly the council had addressed many important issues since its inception."

US-Russia Deal Clears Way For WTO Accession. Major newspapers gave extensive coverage to the US-Russia bilateral trade agreement that advances Moscow's accession to the World Trade Organization. The Washington Post (11/11, D1, Finn, Goodman) calls its "a landmark trade agreement" that is "substantially advancing Moscow's pursuit of World Trade Organization membership and cementing the position of the former Communist giant in the global economy." The Post calls the deal "a victory for President Vladimir Putin, who has chafed at Russia's exclusion from the WTO," and the Administration "characterized it as a milestone in the evolution of Russia from erstwhile Cold War enemy to a growing trading partner." The Post notes that Russia's "inclusion" in the WTO "would be a major advance in the development of a global body devoted to seeking reduction of tariffs and promoting trade around the world." However, this "deal will not finalize Russia's decade-old quest for WTO membership. The Kremlin still must finish bilateral negotiations with three other countries, Costa Rica, Moldova and Georgia," and the latter "in particular is likely to try to use Russia's desire for WTO membership as leverage in negotiations." The Post adds, "If Russia satisfies Georgia's objections and reaches agreements with Moldova and Costa Rica, it will still confront further multilateral negotiations within the WTO, giving all countries -- including United States -- another chance to extract trade concessions."

The New York Times (11/11, C1, Kramer, Andrews) notes US and Russian negotiators are "crossing the final big hurdle in the stop-and-go cycle that has marked the process since Moscow began its application shortly after the collapse of the Soviet Union." Putin "has repeatedly said that joining the 149-member W.T.O. was a major foreign policy goal, though Russia's oil-driven economy will get few direct gains from membership."

The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A3, Chazan, 2.04M) reports the "landmark deal" is "paving the way for Russia to join the [WTO] -- a goal that Moscow has doggedly pursued for the past 12 years and that has been one of the key objectives of Vladimir Putin's presidency." Such a "breakthrough" would eliminate "a major irritant in relations…that have been strained by disagreements over Iran and U.S. accusations that Russia is backsliding on democracy and human rights and using energy to bully its neighbors." Kremlin "officials said delegations of both countries were trying to make sure the deal would be ready for signing when Mr. Putin and President Bush meet during the [APEC] Forum summit in Hanoi, Vietnam during the week." Joining the WTO "would mark a milestone for Russia, demonstrating to the world that it adheres to the rules of global trade, has eradicated the last vestiges of socialism and is fully integrated into the world economy."

The Financial Times (11/11, Buckley, Beattie, Callan) adds Washington and Moscow "agreed in principle on the terms for Russian [accession], giving a significant boost to Moscow's hopes of joining the 149-nation body after 13 years of talks. … Russia, which has enjoyed an oil-fuelled economic recovery in the past eight years, is the last big market outside the aegis of the WTO." The Times notes, "Analysts had warned any deal could face difficulties winning approval in Congress, particularly after both houses came under Democratic control this week. Congress must repeal the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which subjects Russia's trading status to annual review, to ensure Russia is granted permanent normal trading relations by the US. But a Bush administration official characterised meetings with Democratic leaders on Friday to brief them on the deal as 'positive.'"

The AP (11/11, Aversa) notes, "A longtime economic goal of Russia — entry into the [WTO] — moved a crucial step forward Friday as U.S. and Russian trade negotiators reached agreement." Accession "would mean Russia would receive the same favorable tariff rates for its products as other members. Other countries also would have to follow WTO rules in trade disputes with Russia. And, Russia — a big exporter of oil and gas — would have to abide by WTO's trade rules." Bloomberg (11/11, Drajem, Alison) says a US-Russia deal will remove "one of the last hurdles for an agreement that may add $10 billion a year to the Russian economy." However, "two other obstacles remain: Russia must overcome Georgia's opposition to its entry to the world trade arbiter, and the U.S. Congress must vote to grant Russia permanent, normal trade relations if the two countries are to enjoy all the benefits of the trade opening."

The Washington Times (11/11, A1, Hirsch) adds, "As a [WTO] member, the Russian economy stands to grow by $10 billion annually through increased trade and foreign investment." USTR said the two sides "resolved issues over U.S. meat and poultry exports, and Russia agreed to cut tariffs on manufactured goods… The cuts are expected to help U.S. sales of civil aircraft and parts, medical and scientific equipment, agriculture, power generation, construction equipment, information technology, and chemicals."

Boucher Says Washington Committed To India Nuclear Pact. The AP (11/10) notes Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher "said Friday that Washington is eager to finalize a civilian nuclear pact with India, and urged it to work with neighboring Pakistan in the fight against terrorism when they resume peace talks next week." Boucher "said he was 'very hopeful' the matter would be taken up by the outgoing Senate. 'We want to do it as fast as possible because it is important to the U.S.,' he told reporters in New Delhi." AP says the agreement "is seen as a cornerstone of the emerging alliance between New Delhi and Washington after nearly a half-century of Cold War estrangement," and says it "has strong supporters in both U.S. political parties and was overwhelmingly endorsed by the House of Representatives in July." The pact "reverses decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy by shipping civilian nuclear technology to India in return for safeguards and inspections at certain nuclear plants. Critics say the deal would ruin global nonproliferation efforts."

Court Grants Light Sentences To Vietnamese-American Detainees. The AP (11/11, Mason) reports Vietnamese authorities "defused a political storm yesterday by issuing light sentences to three Vietnamese-Americans convicted of terrorism, preventing the closely watched case from clouding President Bush's visit next week." The Americans were sentenced to time served, as were their four Vietnamese national co-defendants, and will be deported next month. The sedition "case had attracted Washington's attention just before Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice planned to make their first visit to Hanoi for the 21-nation Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit." US Ambassador Michael Marine is quoted saying, "I am certainly pleased that they will be sent home. These individuals have been held for quite some time. That is allowed under Vietnamese law, but 14 months without being brought to trial is a long time for anyone." The AP notes a drawn-out case may have complicated the US Senate's vote to normalize trade relations with Vietnam, a prerequisite to WTO accession.

US Seeks To Revive Free Trade Talks At APEC Summit. The Wall Street Journal (11/11, A2, Hookway) reports that, "while North Korea will be in the spotlight" at next week's APEC Leaders Summit, "some substantive negotiating may be taking place on the sidelines to break another international impasse: how to revive global free-trade talks." US officials are "hoping to use the Hanoi gathering … to kick-start discussions on a long-term goal of creating a Pacific-wide free-trade area." While an "initial foray" into such a grouping "foundered" because "there wasn't enough appetite for a separate free-trade agreement focused on Pacific Rim countries," Japan and some others may now back the initiative. The Journal calls the APEC Summit "a useful venue to try to renew momentum for liberalizing trade and call for a resumption of the Doha round. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has already traveled to Vietnam to meet with other Pacific Rim finance ministers and put free trade firmly back in play." However, the Journal adds, "the Asian countries have plans of their own, and they don't necessarily include the U.S."

US Looking For Compromise On UN Force For Darfur. AFP (11/10) reports Washington "said it was considering compromises on the make-up of an international peacekeeping force for Darfur after Sudan rejected demands for deployment of UN troops." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Washington still wanted United Nations "involvement" in the Darfur force, "but he did not reiterate past US insistence the peacekeepers be deployed formally under the world body's banner." McCormack said US officials are "taking a look at how we can address the various concerns that have come up from the Sudanese government, as well as others in the region, about the nature of this international force."

US Figure Skater Selected As Good Will Ambassador. The New York Times (11/10, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) reports, "During the cold war, the State Department called on the Harlem Globetrotters to travel as good-will ambassadors to counter hostile images of America around the world. ... And during these troubled times? America's newest good-will ambassador is Michelle Kwan, the figure skater." The Times notes that "while many of the public diplomacy efforts by the United States in the past few years have been directed toward the Muslim world, it was unclear on Thursday whether Ms. Kwan would be sent to Iraq or Afghanistan."

Samuelson Calls For Candor On Global Warming. In his Washington Post (11/10, A31, 690K) column, Robert J. Samuelson writes that when it comes to global warming, "we need more candor. Unless we develop cost-effective technologies that break the link between carbon dioxide emissions and energy use, we can't do much. Anyone serious about global warming must focus on technological progress -- and not just assume it. Otherwise, our practical choices are all bad: costly mandates and controls that harm the economy, or costly mandates and controls that barely affect greenhouse gases. Or, possibly, both."

Ahtisaari Pushes Kosovo Final Status Plan To 2007. In a brief piece, the New York Times (11/11, A6, Wood) notes former Finnish Prime Minister Martti Ahtisaari "said he would hold back his recommendations — with independence or autonomy as options — until after parliamentary elections in Serbia, called earlier in the day for Jan. 21." While a final status plan "was to have been accomplished by the end of this year," some "diplomats have been concerned that it might increase support for Serbian ultra-nationalists in the elections." The Times adds that "Kosovo's ethnic Albanian leaders are also uneasy," and Kosovo Prime Minister Agim Ceku "said his government might unilaterally declare independence if negotiations fail to give them statehood."

WPost Urges Support For Kosovo Independence. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/10, A30, 690K) notes that the Serbian parliament formally adopted a new national constitution on Wednesday that "included a preamble that would have warmed [Slobodan] Milosevic's heart: a declaration that the province of Kosovo, which Serbia in effect lost seven years ago, is an 'integral' and 'inalienable' part of the country." The Post says, "By incorporating a claim to Kosovo into a new constitution, Serbia's leaders staked out yet another of the reckless nationalist stands that have caused their country so much damage in the past 15 years. They also set the stage for some difficult and potentially dangerous diplomacy between the Bush administration and Russia over the next two months." But the Post warns that "putting off Kosovo's independence would only enrage the province's 2 million Albanians and trigger the Balkan meltdown that the West hopes to avoid. It would also encourage Mr. Putin's growing tendency to use threats -- whether of energy-supply interruptions or violence -- to get his way with the West."

British, Irish Officials Claim Success In Meeting First Ulster Talks Goal. The New York Times (11/11, A7, Quinn) reports British and Irish officials "seized on guarded words of support from Northern Ireland's feuding Protestant and Roman Catholic political parties, saying that enough progress had been made by the first deadline they had set in a timetable for restoring local rule for the province that they could proceed to try to meet the next one." However, "a dispute about policing is casting doubt on whether the Democratic Unionist Party…and the main Roman Catholic party, Sinn Fein, can reach agreement by Nov. 24, when they are to nominate leaders for the power-sharing government." Officials from London and Dublin "said that they were satisfied that party statements had indicated support for a government," and "said that the St. Andrews Agreement remained the basis of reaching their goal."

In more negative tones, the Los Angeles Times (11/11, Murphy) reports, "The first key deadline for implementing a new power-sharing plan in Northern Ireland passed Friday with the parties still at loggerheads, but Britain and Ireland said they were satisfied that the pact 'represents the basis for a political settlement' of the long-running conflict." Sinn Fein and the DUP "only signaled conditional acceptance, apparently stuck on the same issue that has forestalled an agreement from the beginning: the unionist party's insistence that Sinn Fein endorse the local police force — with which its military wing, the Irish Republican Army, was virtually at war for years — before joining the government." Sinn Fein "has said it is prepared to accept the police force once it is assured that concrete reforms are in place, a timeframe is established for handing over control of the police to local authorities, and after the party's membership has agreed to take such a step."

US Military Official Claims Somalia Could Slide Further Into Anarchy. The New York Times (11/11, A6, Gettleman) carries comments by an anonymous "senior American military official" that "painted a dire picture of the escalating tensions in Somalia." The official "said the United States was at a loss about what to do," and "aid the current situation was even more explosive because it threatened to drag in Somalia's neighbors." The Times notes the nation "once again is at a crisis point, with rising prospects of a major war between the weak, so-called transitional government and the increasingly powerful Islamic forces that rule Mogadishu, the capital." However, the source "did not go as far as saying war was imminent or inevitable. The official and diplomats here in Nairobi have pointed to talks this week between the speaker of the transitional Parliament and top Islamic clerics as a speck of hope."

Norwegian Refugee Council Leaves Darfur. The Washington Post (11/11, A21) notes the Norwegian Refugee Council "said Friday that it was closing its humanitarian operations for nearly 300,000 people in Darfur because it was impossible to work in the troubled region of western Sudan." They "cited 'frequent disruption' of its work, saying it had been suspended five times for a total of 210 days since it started operations in mid-2004." NRC had been running two refugee camps serving a combined 228,000 people. The Post adds, "Aid agencies have repeatedly complained about government interference in their work in Sudan," and "rebels also have been accused of interfering with aid, in some cases by kidnapping aid workers."

WPost Says US Must Reinvigorate Darfur Peace Process. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (11/11, A26) says Sudanese authorities have "proved impervious to U.S. pressure." The regime's "back is against the wall, and it is prepared to be ruthless -- particularly so long as China, Russia and the Arab states provide diplomatic cover." The Administration "should certainly assemble commitments of peacekeeping troops and call Sudan's bluff. But it should also attempt to revive the failed Darfur peace plan negotiated this year, for without peace even a large peacekeeping mission may be doomed." To get the rebels to the table, "the United States needs to work with Sudan's diplomatic enablers in Beijing, Moscow and the Arab capitals." The Post concludes, "Darfur's violence is spilling into Chad and could precipitate the collapse of that country's government. It is also contributing to the risk of renewed north-south fighting. If there is no solution in Darfur, the world will witness Darfur-like atrocities elsewhere on a scale appalling to imagine."

LATimes Says Nigeria's Obasanjo Should Step Down When Term Ends. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/11) calls Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo his nation's "savior, and menace." He "has done more for Nigeria than any leader in its modern history," but his "legacy is endangered" by his attempts to prolong his rule. Obasanjo "has shown a worrying reluctance to step down as planned in April 2007," and that initiative could "perhaps plunge his country into civil war." The Times concludes, "Which course the Nigerian president takes will affect more than his legacy and his nation." Obasanjo "has a chance to become a respected elder statesman who could influence continental politics long after leaving office and bring much-needed international attention and aid to Africa. Or he could be another in a long line of Nigerian despots, cursed by his people and forgotten by history.

LATimes Says Delay In Turkey Bid To EU Would Be "Unfortunate." The Los Angeles Times (11/10, 850K) editorializes, "On Wednesday, the European Commission released a progress report on Ankara's bid to join the European Union. It was highly critical of the pace of Turkey's reforms on issues such as freedom of speech and its failure to recognize Cyprus. Cyprus is indeed the stumbling block of the day, but there is a more fundamental resistance across much of Western Europe to the idea that Turkey could join the EU. The EU is still digesting 10 new Central and Eastern European members with a lower standard of living, and there are some understandable concerns about absorbing 73 million Turks on the continent's periphery." However, the Times says a decision by EU commissioners at a summit in mid-December to "suspend accession talks with Turkey for a year or more" would be "unfortunate — for both sides of this courtship."

Posada a target of new federal probes; Authorities are building a new criminal case against Cuban exile Luis Posada Carriles, zeroing in on his alleged role as the mastermind of bombings in Cuba a decade ago.

BY ALFONSO CHARDY AND JAY WEAVER

One of the first things the businessman noticed about Luis Posada Carriles was that he spoke funny. Posada, who mumbled because of an old bullet wound in his jaw, frequently visited the businessman's Guatemala utility company in 1997 to meet with two co-workers.

The businessman grew suspicious after one of the workers told him about Cuban exile plans to assassinate Fidel Castro and after a Venezuelan politician confided that Posada, a CIA-trained explosives expert, was a "very dangerous individual."

Concerned that Posada was using his utility business to plot illicit activities, the businessman hid a transmitter in an office and overheard the two co-workers talk with Posada about placing a "putty-like explosive" in the shoes of Central

Americans paid to pose as tourists on trips to Cuba.

Soon afterward, the businessman became a "confidential source" for the FBI's investigation into bombs that exploded at Cuban tourist sites in 1997, killing an Italian and wounding seven others.

The businessman, a Cuban-American engineer who set up the utility company in Guatemala City in 1996, could turn out to be the central figure in the Justice Department's rekindled criminal investigation of Posada. The probe is back on track -- despite the fact that the FBI field office in Miami destroyed evidence in 2003 about the initial Cuba bombing case.

Federal grand juries in New Jersey and Texas are investigating the secret activities of Posada, 78, who is detained at an immigration facility in El Paso, Texas. The Texas probe focuses on whether he lied about how he sneaked into the country. The New Jersey investigation, aided by the FBI in Miami, is zeroing in on his role as the alleged mastermind of the dozen tourist-site bombings in Cuba that investigators think were financed by Cuban exiles in Union City, N.J.

Either of the probes could lead to the first indictment of Posada in the United States.

10-PAGE AFFIDAVIT

An insight into the Justice Department's case can be found in a 10-page affidavit obtained by The Miami Herald. In the June 10, 2005, sworn statement, FBI special agent Thomas H. Rice portrayed Posada as a dangerous man bent on killing Castro and spreading terror on the communist-run island to destroy its tourism economy.

"The FBI is unable to rule out the possibility that Posada poses a threat to the national security of the United States," Rice wrote.

Among the evidence cited in the sworn statement:

 In late August 1997, the businessman at the Guatemala utility company said he and a co-worker discovered "what appeared to be explosive materials" in the firm's office, where Posada regularly met with two other workers.

The businessman later told the FBI that the materials consisted of 22 transparent plastic tubes filled with a tan substance. They were labeled with the name of the manufacturer and "explosivos de alto poder, extremadamente peligrosos" -- high-power explosives, extremely dangerous.

 The businessman said he found funnels in the office that he thought were used to mix explosive materials with liquid inside shampoo bottles. He also found a diaper that may have been used to absorb the liquid in the bottles and yield the explosives.

The businessman then found a carrying case containing a note in Spanish, which said, "The tyrant has to be eliminated, regardless of how many others are killed." Also found in the case: a note pad with Posada's name written on the first page.

 During the FBI's investigation of the 1997 Cuba bombings, agents collected records showing about $19,000 in wire transfers from the United States to "Ramon Medina," one of Posada's aliases, in El Salvador and Guatemala between Oct. 30, 1996, and Jan. 14, 1998.

WIRE TRANSFERS

The FBI agent specifically refers to an Aug. 25, 1997, fax intercepted by the businessman's co-worker at the Guatemala utility company.

The cryptic fax is signed Solo. Investigators think Posada sent the fax from El Salvador to the utility company, addressed to two alleged co-conspirators who worked there.

Handwritten in Spanish, it refers to wire money transfers totaling $3,200 from four men in Union City to pay a "hotel bill."

It also alludes to some discussion Solo had about the need for publicity for certain actions. But there is no mention of Posada or bombings.

"As I explained to you, if there is no publicity, the work is useless," Solo wrote. "The American newspapers don't publish anything that hasn't been confirmed. I need all the information regarding the discotheque in order to try to confirm it. If there is no publicity, there will be no payment. I'll be awaiting news today, tomorrow I'll be leaving for two days."

CRUCIAL DOCUMENT

Since the fax became public in 1998, after it was reported first in The Miami Herald and then in The New York Times, it has come to be seen as a crucial document in the current investigation. It was included in the hundreds of pages turned over May 19 to the El Paso court considering Posada's custody.

In New Jersey, three of the people mentioned in the fax -- Abel Hernández, Rubén Gonzalo and his son, José -- have been approached by FBI agents and subpoenaed by the federal grand jury in Newark. Authorities wanted to know whether they helped finance the Cuba bombings.

Attorney Gilberto Garcia, who represents the three men and two other Cuban exiles also subpoenaed by the grand jury, said none had any role in the bombings.

"My clients had no knowledge about the financing of the bombings," Garcia said. "They had no participation."

Nevertheless, Garcia said two of the five refused to testify and invoked their right against self-incrimination -- then prosecutors excused them. Two others agreed to provide information to prosecutors, and one testified before the grand jury. Those three said they had not been involved in the bombings.

Garcia said his clients' names on the Solo fax were "misappropriated." "Someone was sending these money transfers to Guatemala using their names," he said.

Although Posada was suspected as the mastermind of the bombings, he was never charged in the initial probe, largely because federal investigators insist that the Cuban government failed to help them build a case against him. But the federal case was reactivated after Posada, a Cuban-born Venezuelan citizen, sneaked into the United States last year.

The U.S. attorney's offices in Newark and El Paso declined to comment.

Eduardo Soto, Posada's attorney, said his client has not received a so-called target letter from federal authorities alleging he is a suspect in a crime. Soto said his client did not lie about his entry into the country and was not involved in the Cuba bombings.

In El Paso, three Cuban exiles from Miami -- José Pujol, Rubén López Castro and Ernesto Abreu -- have refused to testify. At least two of them, Pujol and López Castro, are facing prosecution.

The current Newark investigation has gained momentum as the FBI pieces together evidence -- including the fax allegedly sent by Posada listing suspected U.S. co-conspirators involved in the financing of the bombing campaign.

The government has stepped up its effort to keep Posada in detention because the federal judge in El Paso has set a Feb. 1 deadline for the Justice Department to demonstrate why he shouldn't be released in the United States, since he cannot be deported.

The reason: No country has offered to take him. Also, an immigration\l "l" judge\l "l" has ordered that he not be sent back to Cuba or Venezuela.

PROPAGANDA WEAPON

Castro and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez accuse Posada of masterminding the 1976 bombing attack that brought down a Cuban airliner, killing 73 people.

Both leaders have used Posada as a propaganda weapon against the United States, which was embarrassed by his illegal entry into the country in the post-9/11 climate when antiterrorism defenses were supposed to be tighter. Castro and Chávez have accused federal officials of coddling a "terrorist."

For his part, Posada has blamed Cuban agents for a 1990 assassination attempt in which he was shot in the jaw and chest in Guatemala.

The Justice Department's renewed Cuba bombing probe was challenging at first because the FBI had destroyed some documents, such as Western Union cables and other case records, in the fall of 2003 -- after obtaining approval from the

U.S. attorney's office in Miami.

In the initial case, the Cuban government was cooperative with federal authorities. A team of FBI agents visited Cuban counterintelli- gence officials in June 1998. The Castro government said it shared information on the tourist bombing attacks and other alleged Cuban exile terrorism activities during the 1990s.

1998 IMPASSE

Ultimately, Cuban officials refused to allow FBI agents to talk with witnesses or suspects or to conduct forensic examinations of explosive materials recovered from the tourist-site bombings, according to federal authorities.

The final breakdown came in September 1998, when a federal grand jury in Miami indicted 10 Cuban agents on charges of infiltrating South Florida to spy on the U.S. government and the Cuban-American community.

One of the key pieces of evidence in the current Cuba bombing investigation is the mysterious fax signed Solo.

The link between Posada and the fax was reported first in The Miami Herald on June 7, 1998. A New York Times article the following month said a Cuban-American businessman in Central America, Jorge "Tony" Alvarez, had discovered the fax in his office. Alvarez claimed it had been sent by Posada from El Salvador.

`A BIG SCANDAL'

The article also asserted that Posada acknowledged being the author of the fax, and an accompanying story quoted Posada as saying he was responsible for the bomb attacks at Cuban tourist sites, including the one that killed the Italian.

"We didn't want to hurt anybody," the story quoted Posada as saying. "We just wanted to make a big scandal so that the tourists don't come anymore. We don't want any more foreign investment."

For investigators, Posada's statements amounted to a confession.

Last year, prosecutors from the U.S. attorney's office in Miami sent subpoenas to The New York Times and freelance writer Ann Louise Bardach, demanding the recordings and any other documents she might have that were connected to the interview. Lawyers sought to quash the subpoenas, and the government withdrew them.

In October, the grand jury in Newark issued a new subpoena to Bardach. She said her Miami lawyer is preparing a response to quash it.

Taken together, the fax, FBI witnesses and the tapes could be crucial pieces of evidence in indicting Posada.

In testimony to an immigration court in El Paso last year, Posada acknowledged that he had made those statements to Bardach -- but noted that he did not understand her questions and did not provide proper answers because his English was poor.

In the end, the Cuban government arrested several of the bombers.

And over the next decade, the tourism industry was far from disrupted. Travel to Cuba became all the more popular, with experts estimating the total number of visitors doubling to more than two million last year.

Where's the evidence for detaining Posada?
OUR OPINION: IN U.S., EVEN AN ACCUSED TERRORIST SHOULD GET DUE PROCESS

U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez made a tough but fair decision in the case against terror suspect Luis Posada Carriles. He gave the government three months to make the case for indefinitely detaining Mr. Posada. Yet the judge didn't order Mr. Posada released, as his lawyers asked.

Mr. Posada has a shady past as a Cold War operative. Nevertheless, he is entitled to the due process required by U.S. law. Immigration authorities must provide substantive evidence before condemning someone to what could be life in prison. Mr. Posada has been accused of being a terrorist by some, including his avowed enemy Fidel Castro. But allegations, rumors and speculation aren't enough to make the case that Mr. Posada is a "terrorist" or would be an ongoing public menace while in this country.

Detained 18 months

Judge Martinez acknowledged that Mr. Posada already has been locked up "well beyond" the six-month limit set by the Supreme Court for releasing a foreigner who hasn't been deported. In fact, Mr. Posada has been detained by immigration authorities for nearly a year and a half. An immigration judge barred U.S. authorities from deporting Mr. Posada to Cuba or Venezuela under a treaty that prohibits sending anyone to a country were they might be tortured. Meanwhile, U.S. officials haven't been able to find any other country that will accept him. That's why a federal magistrate has already recommended that Mr. Posada be released.

Clearly Mr. Posada is no choir boy. He is a former CIA agent who has continued to work on overthrowing the Castro regime for decades. He advocates using any means necessary, including violence against civilians.

Suspect in bombings

Mr. Posada has long been suspected of masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jet, which killed 76 people. He was acquitted of that crime by a military tribunal in Venezuela. He was imprisoned for nine years while awaiting trial for the same crime in a civilian court before he escaped in 1985. He has been a suspect in 1997-98 bombings at Cuban tourist sites, one of which killed an Italian visitor. Though a federal grand jury in New Jersey is investigating Posada's alleged involvement, he hasn't been convicted of those bombings, either. He was tried in connection to an alleged Castro assassination plot. For that, he was convicted of endangering public safety and pardoned in 2005.

We strongly disapprove of Mr. Posada's philosophy that the ends justify the means. Our eyes would be bone dry if a judge decides that he remain detained. But such a ruling must be based on the law and hard evidence. Justice Department officials say that Mr. Posada is "an admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks." Fine. Let them prove it.

Govt will ask for Hicks' return: Ruddock

The federal government still plans to ask the US to send terrorist suspect David Hicks home to Australia if fresh charges are not laid against him.

Attorney-General Philip Ruddock has reiterated that he expected Hicks to face new charges once the US worked out new rules for a revamped military commission system.

However, he said if no charges were brought against Hicks, the government would do the same as it did for fellow Guantanamo Bay detainee Mamdouh Habib and ask for him to be sent back to Australia.

"I assume that when the regulations are in place for military commissions ... that fresh charges will be brought," Mr Ruddock told a Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission forum.

"If they are not, we would seek exactly the same outcome as we did in relation to Mamdouh Habib, we would ask for his return."

State and territory attorneys-general last week demanded the federal government take urgent action to bring Hicks home after receiving a disturbing briefing about his case by his military lawyer Major Michael Mori.

Adelaide-born Hicks has been detained in the US detention centre on Cuba since he was captured with the Taliban in Afghanistan five years ago, but has yet to go to trial.

He had previously pleaded not guilty to charges of attempted murder, aiding the enemy and conspiracy, and was earmarked to appear before a US military commission.

The charges were struck out when the US Supreme Court in June ruled it was unlawful for the commission to try Hicks and other Guantanamo Bay detainees.

But US President George W Bush has since signed controversial new legislation allowing revamped military commissions to proceed.

DOJ_NMG_0093805

His fellow detainee, Mr Habib was released from Guantanamo Bay and returned to Australia in January last year after being held for more than three years without charge.

Mr Habib was arrested in Pakistan in 2001 on suspicion of training with al-Qaeda in Afghanistan.

He is now seeking compensation in the Federal Court over his imprisonment in Egypt and at Guantanamo Bay.

The Sydney father is claiming damages on a number of grounds including false imprisonment, complicity, wrongful detention and assault.

New Law May Cut Off Guantanamo Prisoners' Access to Their Lawyers

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico {BYLINE} By Andrew O. Selsky The Associated Press Guantanamo Bay prisoners could soon lose access to their lawyers -- one of their only contacts with the outside world -- because of a new law that eliminates their right to challenge their detention in civilian courts, the lawyers fear.

Even as lawyers are asking a federal court to rule that provisions of the law are unconstitutional, the government is seeking to restrict their access to the isolated Guantanamo military base. And for at least one detainee, the government is trying to ban civilian lawyers altogether.

For now, Guantanamo officials are holding off on restricting lawyers' access to the U.S. base in southeast Cuba, Navy Commander Robert Durand said. Lawyers say doing so will further shroud the detention center in secrecy and could invite abuses.

"If attorneys were kept from visiting Guantanamo, the only information regarding conditions there would be provided by the government," said Joshua Colangelo-Bryan, a New York lawyer whose Bahraini client tried to commit suicide at Guantanamo last year as Colangelo-Bryan was visiting him.

Signed last month by President Bush, the law says no court can hear a petition of habeas corpus -- a right enshrined in the U.S. Constitution -- from any non-U.S. citizen determined to be an enemy combatant or held under suspicion of being one.

Habeas corpus, which has been around since the Magna Carta of 1215, obligates officials to explain in court why those arrested are being held.

"This law doesn't apply only to Guantanamo," said Gaillard Hunt, an attorney for a detained Pakistani businessman. "It applies to every non-U.S. citizen. It empowers the executive branch to get anyone anywhere, and there's no habeas corpus for them."

The Detainee Treatment Act, signed by Bush almost a year ago, stripped enemy combatants of the right to file habeas petitions, but the newer law makes it retroactive. Durand said from Guantanamo that if the new law forces a federal court to throw out pending habeas cases, base commanders would then have the authority to stop or curtail lawyers' visits.

David Cynamon, whose law firm represents four detainees from Kuwait, said the military hearings are no substitute for a habeas court hearing. "They were averaging three a day. These things were a joke."

A federal court of appeals in Washington can review the finding of a Combatant Status Review Tribunal, but is limited largely to considering whether it is consistent with standards and procedures established by the new law.

The government is proposing that defense lawyers can have no more than four meetings with detainees pursuing cases with the Washington appeals court. The government said in court filings it also wants to tighten censorship of mail from attorneys and allow the military to restrict what lawyers discuss with detainees, arguing that they could become violent if they hear about world events.

Defense lawyers see the proposals as an attempted blackout on news from Guantanamo.

"It reflects a cynical attempt by the government to [stanch] the flow of information out of Guantanamo, a cynical effort by the government to conceal facts about who really is being detained at Guantanamo," said attorney Wells Dixon of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents several hundred Guantanamo detainees.

Germany weighs war crimes case against Rumsfeld

BY COLIN FREEMAN Chief Foreign Correspondent

DONALD RUMSFELD, the outgoing American defence secretary, faces the threat of a lawsuit in the German courts accusing him of involvement in prisoner abuses at Guantanamo Bay detention camp and in Iraq.

A writ brought by a US-based human rights group is due to be filed this week, taking advantage of German laws that allow for the prosecution of "war crimes" committed anywhere in the world. The Centre for Constitutional Rights says its will lodge charges against Mr Rumsfeld along with Alberto Gonzales, the US attorney-general, George Tenet, the former CIA director, and several other senior figures in President George W Bush's administration.

A decision by German prosecutors to allow the case to go forward would be deeply embarrassing to the chancellor, Angela Merkel, who has made efforts to improve relations with Washington since taking power a year ago. If Mr Rumsfeld were called to testify and refused, an arrest warrant applicable on German soil could be issued.

The lawsuit cites victims including 11 Iraqis held at Baghdad's Abu Ghraib prison and Saudi-born Mohammed al Qahtani, a suspected September 11 plotter who allegedly underwent torture on Mr Rumsfeld's orders at Guantanamo Bay.

A leading witness lined up for the case is Janis Karpinski, the former brigadier-general once in command of military prisons in Iraq. She is expected to testify that the controversial regime at Abu Ghraib was sanctioned by the top tier at the Pentagon. In a written statement that forms part of the court papers, she said: "It was clear the knowledge and responsibility [for what happened at Abu Ghraib] goes all the way to the top of the chain of command to the secretary of defence, Donald Rumsfeld."

Neither Mr Rumsfeld nor the German authorities have commented on the case. A previous request for a prosecution by the same human rights group was turned down by the German courts in 2004, although not before it had opened a rift between Washington and Bonn. Tensions were already high at the time because of Germany's refusal to send troops to back the US mission in Iraq. Prosecutors announced that they would not pursue the matter only after Mr Rumsfeld hinted that he would not attend a Munich security conference at which he was due to be the key speaker.

Campaigners behind the lawsuit believe that Mr Rumsfeld's resignation as defence secretary last week means the German courts will now be more likely to authorise a prosecution.

Trial to weigh cost of being framed; Cash compensation sought for lost years

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff | November 13, 2006

When small-time hoodlum Edward "Teddy" Deegan was gunned down in a Chelsea alley on March 12, 1965, the FBI had a pretty good idea who did it.

Agents knew from an illegal bug that notorious hitman Joseph "The Animal" Barboza and FBI informant Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi had sought permission from the boss of the New England Mafia to kill Deegan, according to FBI reports. And other informants named Barboza, Flemmi, and two other men as Deegan's killers, according to FBI memos.

But the case took a dramatically different turn when the FBI recruited Barboza to testify in a series of Mafia-related trials under a deal that gave him leniency for his own crimes. He admitted his role in Deegan's slaying and implicated others -- but not Flemmi -- leading to the wrongful convictions of four men who spent decades in prison before they were exonerated.

In a lawsuit that could cost the government more than $100 million in damages if it loses, lawyers allege the FBI sat on documents that would have helped those four men prove they were framed by Barboza. The suit is scheduled to go to trial Thursday in US District Court in Boston.

Peter Limone, now 72, and Joseph Salvati , 74, who were each in their early 30s with four children when convicted in 1968, spent more than 30 years in prison. Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo died in prison before being vindicated.

"It was like a perfect lie," said Boston attorney Juliane Balliro , who represents Limone, his family, and Tameleo's wife and children. "The feds insulated Barboza from any meaningful investigation in this case."

The lawsuit alleges the FBI failed to disclose critical evidence to state prosecutors, who tried the four men for murder, or to defense lawyers. It accuses the federal government of malicious prosecution, false imprisonment, conspiracy, negligence, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and depriving the men's families of their companionship. The suit was filed under the Federal Tort Claims Act, which does not allow a jury trial. The trial, expected to last four to six weeks, will be heard by US District Judge Nancy Gertner .

It's the second of a series of lawsuits alleging FBI negligence to go to trial this year in Boston. In September, a federal judge found that the FBI's mishandling of longtime informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi caused the 1984 murder of a Quincy fisherman. The judge ordered the government to pay $3.2 million to the victim's family.

Stephen and Vincent Flemmi, who died in prison in 1979, were brothers.

In their trial brief, lawyers for the men cite a series of wrongful-death convictions around the country in which more than $1 million in damages was awarded for each year of wrongful imprisonment.

By that calculation, the government would be forced to pay at least $109 million, just on the wrongful imprisonment claim. Limone spent 33 years in prison, Salvati 30 years, Greco 28 years before he died in 1995, and Tameleo 18 years before dying in 1985.

The lawyers said they are unaware of any other cases in which wrongful imprisonment lasted as long, and argued that the award should be high because the four "suffered phenomenally."

Charles Miller , a spokesman for the Department of Justice, declined to comment on the case last week. But in their pretrial memorandum, Justice Department lawyers argue that the federal government cannot be held responsible because the 1968 murder trial was prosecuted in state court by Suffolk County prosecutors who conducted their own investigation.

Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb wrote that the plaintiffs "cannot establish that the FBI owed them a duty to disclose to state authorities any information it had received from its informants or from electronic surveillance."

The FBI turned over some informant information about Deegan's slaying to state and local police, according to Lipscomb.

"I think it is totally outrageous that the federal government has had evidence in their files that my client has been innocent for over 40 years, and we have to put the family through a trial so they can rekindle the agony of all the years they had to visit him in prison," said attorney Victor Garo, who represents Salvati.

The FBI gave leniency to Barboza, who confessed to 26 killings, in exchange for his testimony against Mafia leaders. The federal Witness Protection Program was created to keep him safe.

The FBI memos that cast doubt on Barboza's credibility were uncovered six years ago by a Justice Department Task Force formed to investigate FBI corruption, after federal court hearings into the FBI's mishandling of Bulger and Stephen Flemmi.

One FBI report revealed that Barboza, who was killed in 1976, agreed to cooperate but told agents he would never provide information that would allow his close friend Vincent Flemmi to "fry." Lawyers for the four men say the document would have helped them prove that Barboza protected his friend Flemmi while falsely accusing the others.

Gail Marcinkiewicz , a spokeswoman for the FBI in Boston, declined to comment on the lawsuit, but said the agency's informant guidelines had been tightened as a result of the Bulger case. Currently, she said, "we have better oversight" on informants.

A state judge freed Limone from prison in January 2001 after the FBI memos about Barboza surfaced. Salvati was freed from prison in 1997 after then-Governor William F. Weld pardoned him.

Former governor Michael S. Dukakis , who rejected a recommendation from the state Parole Board in 1983 to grant Limone clemency, is expected to be called as a witness at the trial.

DOJ_NMG_0093808

In the cases of Greco and Tameleo, the government contends that malicious prosecution claims died with them, and that their families are not entitled to any damages for their years of imprisonment.

But attorney Howard Friedman , who represents Greco's son, Edward, said it would be unfair for the government to avoid paying damages to Greco's family just because he died in prison. "If you were to keep a cover-up going long enough for a person to die, you shouldn't benefit," Friedman said.

Brockovich suits thrown out / Activist had filed against health-care providers, saying they cheated the Medicare system

DANIEL YI

SANTA ANA, CALIF. SANTA ANA, CALIF. - Erin Brockovich built a career as a celebrity crusader for weighty causes. But this time she was wrong for the role, according to a federal judge in Santa Ana.

U.S. District Judge David O. Carter has dismissed several lawsuits Brockovich filed this summer on behalf of Medicare. Carter ruled that Brockovich has no standing to sue hospitals and convalescent homes to recoup allegedly illicit funds the health-care providers received from the federally funded health plan for seniors and disabled people.

Brockovich and her lawyers claimed in state and federal courts that health-care providers were pocketing millions of taxpayer dollars by charging Medicare for medical errors and then charging again to fix those errors. She brought the suits as a citizen acting on behalf of the government\l "l".

The lawsuits did not cite specific instances of wrongdoing, pointing instead to federal reports that estimated medical errors costs Medicare more than $9 billion a year. Brockovich and her lawyers hoped to find evidence in the course of trying the cases and would have collected legal fees if they were successful.

They sued some of the nation's biggest hospital and nursing home chains, including Tenet Healthcare Corp., Adventist Health, Country Villa Service Corp., Catholic Healthcare West, Kindred Healthcare Inc. and Longwood Management Corp.

But Carter said Brockovich, a 46-year-old former legal assistant who became a celebrity after her environmental crusade against a utility company was made into a movie starring Julia Roberts, cannot serve as a plaintiff.

That's because she is not an injured party, and there is no specific law that grants her the power to sue on behalf of the government\l "l" in this case, the judge ruled.

Carter dismissed five of the lawsuits last month and last week issued tentative dismissals on 24 more. The 29 cases represent the bulk of the more than 30 lawsuits Brockovich and her lawyers filed in California. Two more cases are pending in a federal court in San Diego.

Attorneys for the hospitals called her crusade a waste of resources.

"There were 25 lawyers sitting in the courtroom all morning" waiting for the ruling Tuesday, said Mark A. Johnson, an attorney with Hooper, Lundy & Bookman Inc., which represented several defendants. "What was that costing the health-care providers? That's resources that could have gone into actual health care."

The main law firm representing Brockovich, Wilkes & McHugh, has filed similar lawsuits elsewhere in the country using other plaintiffs. The law firm did not return calls for comment.

But Brockovich issued an statement through an assistant, saying she will appeal Carter's decision.

"I am proud to be a consumer advocate on this issue and will continue to be," she said.

Authorities: Mother Teresa's doctor used in Medicare scam

LOS ANGELES_An Agoura Hills man was charged with a $1.4-million Medicare fraud scheme that authorities say involved misusing the records of Mother Teresa's personal doctor and homeless people on Skid Row.

Rudik Avakyan, who was scheduled for arraignment Monday, was jailed on $1.1 million bail. Authorities contend that Avakyan, 55, ran a clinic where he submitted phony bills using the Medicare and Medi-Cal cards of people he recruited at a downtown rescue mission.

The clinic's medical director was Dr. Prasantha Nath, who once treated the late Mother Teresa. He worked at the clinic for only a few weeks before quitting, but his physician provider number was used without his knowledge, the state attorney general's office said in a statement.

The clinic submitted claims for hundreds of patients that Nath "could not possibly have treated" and even submitted bills for 35 dead people, authorities said.

Some bills were submitted for patients that Nath supposedly treated at a time when he was out of the country, helping tsunami victims in Sri Lanka and the needy in India, according to investigators.

Avakyan and co-defendants, Gayane Abramyan, 44, and Lusine Khatchatryan are charged with a 37 felony counts of grand theft, attempted grand theft and filing of false claims.

Attorneys for the defendants could not immediately be located for comment Saturday.

Editorial: Another good shot emerges for Cobell

With Congress headed back to Washington next week under a new Democratic majority, Indian Country can get to work on a real settlement to the Cobell trust fund lawsuit.

The case came close to resolution this summer when the Senate Indian Affairs Committee advanced an $8 billion settlement that the plaintiffs and Indian stakeholders were willing to accept. But Sen. John McCain, who spent more time investigating than legislating during his past two years as chairman of the panel, unwisely let the Bush administration delay the bill not just once, but twice.

Then he let the White House kill the settlement altogether by unleashing the October Surprise -- a plan to terminate the trust without paying for past mistakes. Former National Congress of American Indians president Tex Hall rightly called it the "weakest proposal I've ever seen in my 10 years as being a tribal leader."

No one knows for sure why McCain relented, especially after he boasted that he and Congress have never bowed to the wishes of the executive branch, or anyone else for that matter. "Excuse me," he said at a hearing, his code words for "You are wrong, I am right."

As a leader on Indian issues, McCain can definitely play an important role in the 110th Congress as the plaintiffs push for a fair settlement. "We will work closely with the new Congress to resolve the litigation fairly and expeditiously," Elouise Cobell, the lead plaintiff, said yesterday.

But he gave it his "one good shot" -- those were his words remember? -- and he failed. The Democratic takeover, though, gives everyone a new start that few could have envisioned a couple of weeks ago.

With that in mind, a settlement should do the following:

- Settle the Cobell historical accounting -- and only the Cobell historical accounting -- for billions. Tribal claims should not be touched.
- Establish a commission, panel, board or other entity that will develop fiduciary standards to manage trust funds and assets. The trustee should be held accountable to the standards.

- Eliminate the Office of Special Trustee, a move that will put the Indian back in Bureau of Indian Affairs. Ross Swimmer will be looking for a new job soon anyway.

Resolving fractionated heirships is a lofty goal but not one for inclusion in the bill. After all, didn't Congress just pass yet another round of amendments to the Indian Land Consolidation Act?

"It's not the root cause of the mismanagement we're talking about," Cobell said of fractionation on Native America Calling on Monday. It's obvious that it will take serious study, and resources, before more legislation on this issue.

Finally, Congress must adequately fund the BIA so that it can fix the problems and carry out future solutions. The money to do this can't come from the settlement.

Once the suit is settled, Indian Country can work on other equally pressing issues that the Bush administration cast aside in order to blame inaction on Cobell. The 110th Congress gives everyone another good shot.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US: Immigrants May Be Held Indefinitely (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

Immigrants arrested in the United States may be held indefinitely on suspicion of terrorism and may not challenge their imprisonment in civilian courts, the Bush administration said Monday, opening a new legal front in the fight over the rights of detainees.

In court documents filed with the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., the Justice Department said a new anti-terrorism law being used to hold detainees in Guantanamo Bay also applies to foreigners captured and held in the United States.

Ali Saleh Kahlah Al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar, was arrested in 2001 while studying in the United States. He has been labeled an "enemy combatant," a designation that, under a law signed last month, strips foreigners of the right to challenge their detention in federal courts.

That law is being used to argue the Guantanamo Bay cases, but Al-Marri represents the first detainee inside the United States to come under the new law. Aliens normally have the right to contest their imprisonment, such as when they are arrested on immigration violations or for other crimes.

"It's pretty stunning that any alien living in the United States can be denied this right," said Jonathan Hafetz, an attorney for Al-Marri. "It means any non-citizen, and there are millions of them, can be whisked off at night and be put in detention."

The new law says that enemy combatants will be tried before military commissions, not a civilian judge or jury, and establishes different rules of evidence in the cases. It also prohibits detainees from challenging their detention in civilian court.

In a separate court filing in Washington on Monday, the Justice Department defended that law as constitutional and necessary.

Government attorneys said foreign fighters arrested as part of an overseas military action have no constitutional rights and are being afforded more legal rights than ever.

In its short filing in the Al-Marri case, however, the Justice Department doesn't mention that Al-Marri is being held at a military prison in South Carolina — a fact that his attorneys say affords him the same rights as anyone else being held in the United States.

The Justice Department noted only that the new law applies to all enemy combatants "regardless of the location of the detention."

The Bush administration maintains that al-Marri is an al-Qaida sleeper agent. The Defense Department ordered a review of Al-Marri's status as an enemy combatant be conducted if, as requested, the case is thrown out of court.

Justice Department Wants Guantanamo Cases Dismissed (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, November 14, 2006

MIAMI - The Bush administration Monday defended a new law that strips enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay of recourse to traditional civilian court challenge, setting the stage for a U.S. Supreme Court showdown.

In a brief, the Justice Department argued at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit that the U.S. district courts must close the files of several hundred habeas corpus petitions because the new Military Commissions Act eliminated their jurisdiction.

Attorneys for many of the 440 or so captives, some approaching five years held without charge at the remote U.S. Navy base in Cuba, argue the law is at odds with a fundamental, constitutional right to file a writ of habeas corpus - their right to challenge their detention before a civilian judge.

Once the three-court appeals panel rules, both sides anticipate an overarching constitutional challenge of the new federal law to go before the Supreme Court, which earlier backed certain detainee rights in a series of rulings.

The brief signed by Solicitor General Paul Clement argues that Congress "unambiguously" stripped the U.S. district court of that right in the new legislation, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17.

"Because there can be no question that Congress has eliminated district court jurisdiction," Clement writes, "petitioners are left to argue that the Act is unconstitutional. These arguments are without merit."

Rather than have traditional review, he adds, Congress gave the circuit appeals court - the same venue deciding the constitutionality of the law - the power to review an enemy combatant's classification.

DOJ_NMG_0093819

In that review, a captive cannot argue that he is being held illegally and indefinitely, but can challenge his designation as enemy combatant.

Moreover, the U.S. government added, the Pentagon has established its own annual review process at Guantanamo, a parole-like board of military officers, where any captive can argue why he should be set free.

For about two years now, defense attorneys for the men have sought case-by-case independent reviews, arguing that the military requires civilian oversight.

Federal judges, however, have been reluctant to intrude.

In one instance, U.S. District Judge James Robertson found that two Uighur Muslims of Chinese citizenship were unlawfully held in indefinite detention at the Guantanamo facility, but said he did not know how he could offer relief.

Some time afterward, the Pentagon arranged to airlift them and three other Uigurs to faraway Albania for resettlement.

U.S. policy prevented their repatriation, for fear they would be subjected to religious persecution, as Muslims, in their communist-ruled country.

The showdown over the Military Commissions Act is currently being played out in a pair of cases named for two of the current detainees at Guantanamo - Fawzi al-Odeh, a Kuwaiti, and Lakhdar Boumediene, an Algerian - who had separately filed suits in the lower court over their right to habeas corpus.

Envoy: Islamic Extremists Seek Weapons (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, November 14, 2006

Islamic extremists, including members of al-Qaida, have tried to acquire chemical or radiological weapons to use in attacks against Britain and other Western targets, a senior British diplomat said Monday.

The warning followed an acknowledgment last week by Britain's domestic spy chief, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, that authorities are tracking almost 30 terrorist plots involving 1,600 people.

Britain's Foreign Office has evidence of efforts by the terror groups to purchase chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear materials for use in attacks, the diplomat said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of his work.

Dhiren Barot, the British Muslim convert who was sentenced to life in prison last week for plotting to attack U.S. financial landmarks and London hotels, had drawn up plans to build and detonate a so-called dirty bomb, which combines radioactive materials with conventional explosives, prosecutors said.

"We know the aspiration is there, we know the efforts to get the materials are there, we know the efforts to get the technology are there," the senior diplomat said.

The diplomat acknowledged that an attack with chemical or radiological weapons would most likely be mounted with crude technology and cause mass panic rather than mass casualties.

Britain's Foreign Office is concerned over the potential access terrorists could have to substances with legitimate uses that could also be used to create weapons and biological agents like smallpox or anthrax, the official said.

Manningham-Buller, head of the British domestic spy agency MI5, said last week that her agency is monitoring 200 cells actively engaged in plotting or aiding attacks in Britain and abroad.

She said agents had foiled five major plots since the July 2005 transit bomb attacks in London, which killed 52 commuters and the four bombers.

The Foreign Office official said hundreds of British Muslims were making terrorism-related trips between Britain and Pakistan each year.

Britons with family ties to Pakistan and Pakistani nationals who have no previous links to Britain were moving easily between the two countries to plan and raise funds for plots, the official said.

Though the majority of the hundreds traveling on terrorism-related trips relay messages, raise funds or pass on information and practical skills — dozens also attend terrorist training camps in Pakistan, the diplomat said.

Three of the July bombers visited Pakistan before the London attacks, but Pakistani officials have consistently denied claims the plot was directed from inside its borders.

CIA Acknowledges 2 Interrogation Memos (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

After years of denials, the CIA has formally acknowledged the existence of two classified documents governing aggressive interrogation and detention policies for terrorism suspects, according to the American Civil Liberties Union.

But CIA lawyers say the documents -- memos from President Bush and the Justice Department -- are still so sensitive that no portion can be released to the public.

The disclosures by the CIA general counsel's office came in a letter Friday to attorneys for the ACLU. The group had filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in New York two years ago under the Freedom of Information Act, seeking records related to U.S. interrogation and detention policies.

The lawsuit has resulted in the release of more than 100,000 pages of documents, including some that revealed internal debates over the policies governing prisoners held at the military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Many other records have not been released and, in some cases, their existence has been revealed only in media reports.

Friday's letter from John L. McPherson, the CIA's associate general counsel, lists two documents that pertain to the ACLU's records request.

The ACLU describes the first as a "directive" signed by Bush governing CIA interrogation methods or allowing the agency to set up detention facilities outside the United States. McPherson describes it as a "memorandum." In September, Bush confirmed the existence of secret CIA prisons and transferred 14 remaining terrorism suspects from them to Guantanamo Bay.

The second document is an August 2002 legal memo from the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel to the CIA general counsel. The ACLU describes it as "specifying interrogation methods that the CIA may use against top al-Qaeda members." (This document is separate from another widely publicized Justice memo, also issued in August 2002, that narrowed the definition of torture. The Justice Department has since rescinded the latter.)

The ACLU relied on media reports to identify and describe the two documents, but the CIA and other agencies had not previously confirmed their existence. McPherson wrote that neither document can be released to the public for reasons of security and attorney-client privilege.

"The documents are withheld in their entirety because there is no meaningful non-exempt information that can be reasonably segregated from the exempt information," McPherson wrote. A spokesman for the CIA declined to comment yesterday.

Amrit Singh, one of the ACLU's attorneys on the case, said the disclosures may make it easier for the group to argue in favor of releasing the documents.

"For more than three years, they've refused to even confirm or deny the existence of these records," Singh said, referring to the group's initial document request in October 2003. "The fact that they're now choosing to do so confirms that their position was unjustified from the start. . . . Now we can begin to actually litigate the release of these documents."

Levin Vows To Probe 'abuse' Of Renditions (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, November 14, 2006

Carl Levin, the incoming chairman of the Senate armed services committee, on Monday pledged to scrutinise the Central Intelligence Agency renditions programme.

The Bush administration this year revealed that the US had transferred 14 high-value al-Qaeda suspects from secret CIA prisons to Guantánamo Bay. But officials have been unwilling to discuss the fate of dozens of other detainees who were rounded up around the world for interrogation.

While Congress has enacted legislation aimed at preventing abuses of detainees, there has been relatively little public scrutiny of the renditions system itself.

Asked whether he would investigate the renditions programme, including the secret prisons and missing detainees, Mr Levin replied: "Yes. Yes, yes and yes."

"I'm not comfortable with the system," he said. "I think that there's been some significant abuses which have not made us more secure but have made us less secure and have also, perhaps, cost us some real allies, as well as not producing useful information. So I think the system needs a thorough review."

In addition to examining US policy on Iraq, Mr Levin said it was important to reassess the situation in Afghanistan, including asking whether the US's allies in Nato were hampered by restrictive rules of engagement.. "We need to review the progress being made in Afghanistan, including whether our Nato allies are asserting too many limits on the use of their forces."

The Pentagon has long complained that European Nato members are hampered in Afghanistan by restrictions on rules of engagement with Taliban and other hostile forces. Poland recently announced its intention to send a caveat-free contingent of 1,000 soldiers. European countries are coming under greater pressure in the lead up to the Nato Riga summit this month.

The US has been pressing its Nato allies to do more to tackle the insurgency in the south of Afghanistan, as have the UK, Canada and the Netherlands, the countries taking the lead in Nato's operations in the south.

DOJ_NMG_0093821

Asked about the nomination of Robert Gates, the former CIA director, to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary, Mr Levin said he wanted to examine allegations by George Schultz, former secretary of state, that Mr Gates had manipulated intelligence at the CIA to suit policy goals.

"We had enough manipulating intelligence, shaping intelligence in order to give the policymakers what they wanted to hear," said Mr Levin. "And we've got to make sure that if in fact there's any truth to what secretary Shultz said that Mr Gates did, that that is not going to happen again."

Justice Department Argues For Tougher Sentence For Ressam (SEATIMES)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, November 14, 2006

The judge who sentenced Ahmed Ressam to 22 years in prison should be ordered to impose a stiffer sentence on the man who planned to blow up holiday travelers at Los Angeles International Airport, a Justice Department lawyer argued Monday.

U.S. Attorney John McKay, in the unusual appeal, said U.S. District Judge John Coughenour had abused his discretion, failed to justify the sentence and misused Ressam's sentencing to criticize U.S. policy about having terrorism suspects held indefinitely or tried before secretive military tribunals.

"These are reversible errors," McKay told a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals convened in Seattle. If the sentence stands, Ressam "will be released in 15 years, leaving him, if he chooses, to rejoin his al-Qaida comrades when he is 54 years old," McKay said.

Ressam's attorney, Federal Public Defender Thomas Hillier, when questioned by Judge Pamela Ann Rymer, agreed that Coughenour needs to justify the length of the 22-year sentence to comply with case law and sentencing guidelines.

"We can't tell why he picked that number," Rymer said.

It will be many months before the case is decided. The U.S. Supreme Court last week agreed to hear two cases, about sentencing discretion, that may affect the circuit court's decision.

Ressam was arrested Dec. 14, 1999, in Port Angeles as he drove off a ferry from Victoria, B.C., in a rental car packed with explosives. The Algerian refugee later admitted he had been recruited by al-Qaida and trained at Osama bin Laden's terrorism camps in Afghanistan.

He was convicted in April 2001 of nine federal felonies, including conspiracy to commit an act of international terrorism. A month later, he began to cooperate with law enforcement.

Ressam identified at least 130 members of terrorism cells, testified in two terrorism trials and cooperated with the governments of Canada, England, France, Germany and Italy.

At one point, both prosecutors and the defense said that Ressam's sentence should be considerably lighter because of his help, and agreed to a 27-year sentence. However, Ressam's cooperation faltered in 2003 and ended by 2005. His lawyers and a government psychiatrist concluded that years in solitary confinement and repeated interrogations caused him to suffer a mental breakdown.

Last year, prosecutors argued for a 35-year sentence, saying it accounted for his cooperation but also for his failing to live up to his agreement.

Prosecutors said they had to dismiss indictments against two alleged terrorists whose cases were built on Ressam's testimony: Abu Doha, a British citizen reported to be an al-Qaida recruiter, and Samir Ait Mohamed, a Canadian who allegedly had planned to detonate a gas truck in a Jewish neighborhood in Montreal.

Defense attorneys argued for a 12 ½-year sentence, saying Ressam's information had been nearly invaluable.

When he sentenced Ressam, Coughenour ripped the Bush administration for holding suspected terrorists without trial or trying them before secret tribunals.

"I would like to convey the message that our system works," Coughenour said of the Ressam case. "We did not need to use a secret military tribunal or detain the defendant indefinitely as an enemy combatant, or deny him the right to counsel."

The judge's remarks and the 22-year sentence infuriated some prosecutors and law-enforcement officials.

At Monday's hearing, McKay argued that the appellate court should send a message back to Coughenour: that his statements were out of line.

Ressam's lawyers also asked the appeals court to reverse one of Ressam's five explosives-related convictions. That conviction, for possessing explosives while committing another felony, resulted in a mandatory 10-year sentence.

Ex-N.Y. Times Journalist Tells Of Visiting Interrogation Center (NSDY/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 14, 2006

CHICAGO -- Former New York Times journalist Judith Miller testified Monday that she saw no evidence that a grocer charged with providing money and recruits to Palestinian terrorists had been tortured when she secretly witnessed his interrogation by the Israelis in 1993.

"He was boasting. He was jaunty. There was no reason to believe that he had been subjected to that kind of treatment," Miller, who was the Times' Cairo bureau chief at the time, testified for the prosecution at Muhammad Salah's trial.

Salah, 53, and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, are charged in a federal racketeering indictment with providing money and fresh recruits to Hamas in its campaign to topple the Israeli government.

The two men say they merely tried to help impoverished Palestinians suffering under the Israeli army's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. They deny that they are Hamas members or support terrorism.

Salah was arrested in Israel in 1993 and served 4 1/2 years in Israeli prisons before his release and return to Chicago.

He claims that he was deprived of sleep, hooded and forced to sit in a tiny chair with his hands cuffed behind his back before he made a series of statements to agents of the Israeli security agency Shin Bet.

Shin Bet interrogators using aliases and testifying before a courtroom cleared of spectators have said that Salah's statements were voluntary.

Miller served 85 days in jail for civil contempt after refusing to testify before a federal grand jury in Washington's CIA leak investigation. She resigned from the Times in 2005 amid questions about whether she was insufficiently skeptical in her reporting about the possibility that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

Miller testified that she flew to Israel in 1993 after reading about Salah's arrest and contacted aides to Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, whom she described as a longtime friend.

Through Rabin and Shin Bet chief Yakov Perry, she was invited to visit the West Bank interrogation center in Ramallah provided that she would not reveal in any article she wrote that she had been there and seen Salah questioned.

She said she agreed to that condition after checking with an editor. On cross-examination, she was asked which editor had approved the visit.

"I don't recall. We had a lot of editors, sir," she said.

She also said that she could not remember whether she was allowed to use a tape recorder while watching the interrogation session on television from an adjacent room. She continued to say she could not remember after being reminded of a 1998 radio interview in which she said she had used a tape recorder.

Miller said she was taken to the interrogation center because the Israelis wanted her to write about Salah. He allegedly had already confessed that money to finance Hamas was coming out of the United States, and Israeli officials wanted to draw Americans' attention to that.

She said she was initially skeptical and believed that Salah might have been tortured into making such statements. She said she was willing to write a story only after seeing him under Israeli interrogation.

Defense attorneys repeatedly tried to portray her as biased in favor of Israel.

"Have you ever been used as a Mossad asset?" asked Salah attorney Michael Deutsch, referring to the Israeli intelligence service.

Miller said no.

Ex-NY Times Reporter Testifies At Terror Funding Trial (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, November 14, 2006

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified Monday that a Bridgeview man accused of helping to fund Hamas showed no signs of being mistreated during an interview with an Israeli agent she witnessed in 1993, even quibbling during the session about how his coffee had been prepared.

Lawyers for Muhammad Salah have argued that Salah was tortured into making a confession while being held by Israeli agents. But Miller told a federal jury in the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse that when she saw Salah, he was relaxed and "jaunty."

Miller, who was allowed to watch the interview on a video monitor in a separate room, said she stared at Salah for several minutes. "I was looking at him closely because I had been concerned that he might have been tortured."

Miller's appearance Monday was a rare example of a high-profile journalist testifying at a federal criminal trial. Lawyers for Salah and co-defendant, Abdelhaleem Ashqar, questioned her credibility given the controversies surrounding her reporting on the war in Iraq, among other things.

They asked about her reporting on supposed weapons of mass destruction in Iraq before the war and her decision not to answer a subpoena in the CIA leak case involving the identity of operative Valerie Plame.

Miller, a former Middle East correspondent and Cairo bureau chief of The New York Times, said she was only allowed to see Salah after making arrangements with ranking Israeli officials she knew, including Yitzhak Rabin, then Israel's prime minister.

Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch, asked Miller whether her job was to cultivate special access through high government officials, and whether she would then print the stories they wanted to see. As an example, he pointed to her stories in 2003 that said there were definitely weapons of mass destruction found in Iraq, which has since been disproven.

"I don't think I used the word 'definitely,'" said Miller, who denied she had made any deals to slant her writing on Salah.

Deutsch asked whether it is true that Miller is no longer at The New York Times because she had reported information fed to her by U.S. government officials in the run-up to the Iraq war.

"No, sir, that is not why I left The New York Times," said Miller, who left the paper a year ago after 28 years.

Defense lawyers also asked about the 85 days Miller spent in jail last year, which she said she chose to serve in order to protect a confidential source involved in the Plame case. She eventually did appear before a grand jury after her source—vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who has since been indicted on charges of obstruction of justice—gave her clearance.

"You wouldn't be just protecting your sources here, would you?" asked Ashqar's attorney, William Moffitt.

"Every source that was important to the Salah story was disclosed" either in her articles or in a 1996 book she wrote about the Middle East, Miller said.

Deutsch asked Miller if U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald—who also led the Plame investigation—made an agreement with Miller that if she testified for the government in the Salah case, he would not indict her for perjury in the Plame matter.

"He did not," Miller answered.

Lawyers on both sides of the case spent much of Miller's time on the stand asking her how she came to see Salah in Israeli custody on Feb. 11, 1993, and what she observed.

She said she watched an Israeli agent known as "Nadav" begin talking to Salah, who seemed very calm. At one point she heard Salah discuss the coffee he had been given.

"He complained that he usually took it this way, and Nadav had forgotten to bring something," she said. Nadav began to ask about Salah's Hamas activities, and Salah seemed to speak freely about his involvement, she said.

"I was struck by the fact that he seemed very comfortable talking about it," she said. He was boasting and jaunty, Miller said. "He was almost goading [Nadav] about how Hamas was getting the better of the Israelis. "He said, 'You shut Hamas down three or four times a year, and every time we regroup,'" she said.

"'You're actually teaching us how to do our jobs better,'" Miller said Salah told the agent

The defense lawyers asked whether her access to Salah could have been engineered to influence the U.S. into taking seriously Israeli claims that Hamas had operations inside America. Miller said she did not believe she was the target of a propaganda effort, though she said she agreed governments do try to use newspapers.

"It is my experience that everyone tries to spin," she said.

Musician Waived Rights After Terror Arrest, FBI Agent Says In NY (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 14, 2006

NEW YORK -- An FBI agent testified Monday that a jazz musician and martial arts expert looked as though "he'd been caught with his hand in the cookie jar" when he heard his voice on government audio tapes in a terrorism case.

U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska used the testimony by the agent, Brian Murphy, as a basis to reject defense arguments that Tarik Shah never waived his rights before making statements and briefly cooperating with the government after his May 2005 arrest.

"Mr. Shah knowingly and voluntarily waived his rights," the judge said after a two-hour hearing.

Shah and three others _ a Florida doctor, a Washington, D.C., cab driver and a Brooklyn bookstore owner _ are scheduled to stand trial in late spring on charges that they offered their skills to help terrorist organizations. All have pleaded not guilty.

Shah was accused of providing material support to terrorists by conspiring in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan.

Murphy said he played audio tapes of Shah and others discussing their plans after Shah asked him why he was being arrested. The agent said Shah looked down and sat back in his chair.

"He looked like he'd been caught with his hand in the cookie jar," Murphy said. "He said, `What do you want with me?'"

Shah's lawyer, Josh Dratel, said statements and other evidence obtained after his arrest should be suppressed because he never signed a waiver of his rights, including the right to remain silent and to speak with an attorney.

Murphy, though, testified that Shah waived his rights orally and followed up the words with actions, including going to Baltimore, where FBI agents had arranged for him to have a taped telephone conversation with another target of the investigation.

Murphy said Shah was completely relaxed and skillful at eliciting information, delivering on a promise he had made before he went into a Baltimore hotel room to help the government.

"I will do it my way. Don't worry. You'll be impressed with the results," Murphy recalled Shah telling him.

Later, Shah met with prosecutors to offer information in a bid to cooperate further, prosecutors say.

Prosecutors Deny Padilla Torture Claims (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

MIAMI — Federal prosecutors on Monday denied claims by suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla that he was tortured during his 3 1/2 years in military custody as an enemy combatant.

In papers filed in federal court, prosecutors said Padilla provided no evidence to back up his claims and urged that the case against him not be dismissed based on his allegations. They insisted that Padilla was treated humanely while in a Navy brig in South Carolina.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security," the government said in its filing. "His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner."

That included halal food, some outdoor exercise and medical attention when necessary. Prosecutors said Padilla never made any abuse claims while in military custody.

"Padilla's allegations of torture have no merit whatsoever," prosecutors said.

Padilla's lawyers last month asked a federal judge to dismiss the terror support charges against him based on their allegations that he suffered from "outrageous government conduct" while in military custody for more than 1,300 days. They claimed Padilla's interrogators threatened to execute him, and forced him to wear a hood and stand in stress positions for long periods of time.

Padilla's attorneys also said he believed he may have been given LSD or PCP as a "truth serum," and that he was forced to endure extreme heat and cold, bright lights or total darkness, noxious fumes and sleep deprivation.

Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush in June 2002, shortly after he was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. U.S. authorities initially claimed he was on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a U.S. city.

He was transferred to civilian custody in January to face federal terrorism support charges along with two others in Miami. Trial on those charges, which do not mention the "dirty bomb" allegations, is scheduled to begin Jan. 22.

U.S.Lawyers Deny Padilla Was Tortured (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors are denying an alleged Al Qaeda operative's claims that he was tortured during the more than three years he spent in a Navy brig.

"The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture, allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence," lawyers pursuing a criminal terrorism case against Padilla wrote in papers filed in federal court in Miami yesterday.

The prosecution did not address directly one of Padilla's most inflammatory claims, namely that a military team forcibly drugged him with "a sort of truth serum," possibly LSD or PCP.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security. His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner, including Halal (Muslim acceptable) food, clothing, sleep, and daily medical assessment and treatment when necessary," prosecutors wrote. "While in the brig, Padilla never reported any abusive treatment to the staff or medical personnel."

Padilla's defense team has asked a judge to throw out the case on the grounds of outrageous government conduct. Defense attorneys asserted that the Brooklyn native was threatened with execution and with being cut and having alcohol poured onto his wounds.

Prosecutors argued that even if Padilla was abused by the military, such abuse would not have an impact on the criminal case because the military and the prosecution teams are distinct.

A jailhouse convert to Islam, Padilla was arrested in Chicago in 2002 on a material witness warrant related to suspicions that he was plotting an attack involving a radioactive bomb. President Bush later designated Padilla as an enemy combatant and ordered him held without charge by the military. One federal appeals court rejected the unusual tactic, but another upheld it. Padilla was indicted last year on charges that prosecutors said were not related to the alleged dirty bomb plot.

In their new filing, prosecutors suggested that Padilla pursue a civil suit for damages if he believes he was tortured by the military.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

California Man Accused Of Mailing Threatening Letters To US Politicians, Celebrities (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A man was arrested and accused of mailing threatening letters laced with white powder to Congresswoman Nancy Pelosi, TV talk show host David Letterman and other high-profile figures, the FBI announced.

FBI agents took Chad Conrad Castagana, 39, into custody Saturday on charges of conveying false information and sending threats via the U.S. mail, the bureau said in a statement Sunday.

Castagana, of Los Angeles, was being held in a federal detention center pending an initial court appearance Monday, when prosecutors were expected to file charges.

Castagana could not be reached for comment; there was no phone listing for him and it was unclear whether he had retained a lawyer.

Authorities claim he mailed threatening letters to House speaker-in-waiting Pelosi, Letterman, New York Senator Charles Schumer, Jon Stewart of Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" and MSNBC host Keith Olbermann.

Some letters included phrases like "Death to Demagogues" and pictures of victims of the 2004 Asian tsunami, authorities said.

While the FBI is still trying to identify the white powder, preliminary tests revealed it does not pose a biological hazard.

The letters were sent with fictitious return addresses over the past three months to addresses in New York, New Jersey and San Francisco, officials said.

Authorities said they watched Castagana, who is unemployed, walk from his home to a public mailbox Thursday and deposit several letters. One was allegedly addressed to someone previously targeted and contained the white powder, the FBI said.

Anthrax Hoaxer Arrested (RC)

By John Mcardle And Paul Kane

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

The Justice Department on Monday began formally prosecuting the alleged perpetrator of a wave of threatening letters with suspicious, but ultimately harmless, powders that were sent to likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and a host of liberal-leaning media figures.

Chad Castagana, 39, appeared in a Los Angeles federal district court to face charges of sending threats via U.S. Mail after federal investigators linked him to 17 letters sent over a roughly two-month span that contained threatening statements and various amounts of baking soda, Ajax, laundry detergent and other white powders that could have been mistaken for anthrax.

Though none of the letters was sent to Capitol Hill, the incident once again has put a focus on Congressional mail screening procedures five years after letters containing anthrax were sent to two Senate offices, leading to the deaths of five people and temporarily shutting down the Capitol complex.

Castagana was arrested Saturday at his home in San Fernando Valley, Calif., and subsequently admitted to FBI investigators that he mailed the threatening letters to Pelosi's district office, Schumer's state office, and the homes and workplaces of Comedy Central star Jon Stewart, MSNBC anchorman Keith Olbermann, late-night talk show host David Letterman and Viacom Inc. President Sumner Redstone, according to court filings released Monday.

"Castagana described himself as a compulsive voter who votes Republican, and said that he sent the letters to specific individuals because he did not like their liberal politics," an FBI affidavit states.

Despite the timing of Castagana's letters coming near the anniversary of the Hill anthrax attacks, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said investigators have "no inkling whatsoever that it is related in any way, shape or form" to the October 2001 attacks.

Castagana's arrest comes as at least one more separate case of threatening hoax letters sent to former President Bill Clinton and Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) remains unsolved. On Oct. 23, in a previously unreported incident, Biden's office in Wilmington, Del., received a suspicious letter that had a powdery substance in it and a threatening letter, shuttering the incoming Senate Foreign Relations chairman's hometown office for hours as authorities investigated.

Wilmington Police confirmed that they responded to the call, along with a team from the local FBI office, and, after determining the substance was not dangerous, turned the case over to the FBI.

Four days later, on Oct. 27, Clinton's Harlem office housing his foundation was hit with a letter containing a white powdery substance and a letter that U.S. Secret Service officials described to The Associated Press as a "rambling diatribe."

The former president's office was closed down for several hours as hazardous materials response teams in yellow suits roamed about the office before giving an all-clear sign, according to sources familiar with the incident.

Biden and Clinton were not in their local offices when the suspicious packages were opened by junior staffers, aides said.

Authorities involved in the Castagana case said the Biden and Clinton letters were not part of their investigation, and a source familiar with those letters indicated that investigators' initial suspicions are that the Biden-Clinton letters are connected.

An aide at the Clinton Foundation referred all comment to the Secret Service office in New York, which is leading that investigation but did not return calls seeking comment.

The Castagana investigation is being handled by the Justice Department's Joint Terrorism Task Force, which currently includes a representative of the Capitol Police Department.

Castagana's hoax letters began just after Labor Day with the first batch of letters focusing on Stewart and Olbermann. The offices of Pelosi and Schumer were targeted with letters that came almost two weeks ago, just days before the midterm elections that presumably have thrust Pelosi into the Speakership and given Schumer, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, more prominence because of the Democratic takeover of the Senate.

A spokeswoman for Pelosi's office referred all questions regarding the case to the Capitol Police, and a spokesman for Schumer could not be reached for comment.

Alan Hoffman, Biden's chief of staff, said he has altered his office's policy dealing with mail that is sent to the two offices the Senator maintains in Delaware. Hoffman is now having all mail sent to his state offices first sent through irradiation procedures before coming into his staff's hands, a process that will delay mail delivery from constituents days or even weeks, but one Biden considers worth the wait given the most recent scare. "In retrospect, I wish I had done it sooner," Hoffman said.

Since the anthrax attacks on Capitol Hill five years ago, all mail sent to any Congressional office in the Capitol complex is routed through an irradiation process off-campus and then sent to Capitol Hill.

But Members of the House and Senate operate on an office-by-office policy in terms of handling mail sent to their state and district offices, with many opting to avoid the delays and skip the irradiation for letters and packages headed to those offices.

"There are mail screening procedures in place both on Capitol Hill and in district offices, but the committee is always looking for ways to improve the safety measures for both members and their staff particularly in light of this most recent incident," said House Administration Committee spokeswoman Salley Collins.

Senate Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Pickle was equally tight-lipped about mail screening procedures on the Senate side.

"The Senate has a very robust and aggressive mail screening process and we offer a screening service to state offices, but we do not talk about those protocols. We're always reviewing our processes and procedure," Pickle said.

The quick apprehension of Castagana came two months after the first threatening letter was meant to be sent to comedian Stewart — it actually went to a different Jon Stewart living on Manhattan's Upper West Side — standing in stark contrast to the now five-years-and-counting probe into the 2001 anthrax attacks.

As part of what was dubbed the "Amerithrax" investigation, thousands of FBI agents spanned the globe searching for the perpetrator or perpetrators of the attacks that left five people dead and dozens injured.

While FBI officials say the investigation is active and making progress, they have been at loggerheads with Congress over the probe and for almost three years have refused to brief any Member on the investigation because of alleged leaks from briefings on the Hill in 2003.

Bush Warns Against Pullout (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush cautioned Monday against holding talks with Syria and Iran and beginning a withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, two key proposals gaining support at home and abroad.

But the president said he was open to "new ideas" on his administration's approach to Iraq after meeting with members of the Iraq Study Group, a panel weighing U.S. options there.

Bush's warnings against talks with Syria and Iran came as British Prime Minister Tony Blair called for a Middle East strategy that could involve a "new partnership" with Iran. The Iraq Study Group is also considering whether greater U.S. involvement with Iraq's neighbors could aid the American effort.

Bush discussed Iran at a White House meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and told reporters afterward that any dealings were contingent on Tehran halting its uranium enrichment program.

"If the Iranians want to have a dialogue with us, we have shown them a way forward, and that is for them to verifiably suspend their enrichment activities," Bush said.

He cautioned against proposals for gradual or phased troop reductions in Iraq, which are gaining steam among Democrats, saying that no military option would work unless it recognized "conditions on the ground."

The developments came as the administration strained to chart a new direction for Iraq in response to a growing antiwar sentiment. Last week's midterm election, which analysts said showed a deep dissatisfaction with White House policies on the war, has increased the pressure.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice delayed a long-planned trip to Vietnam so she could meet at the White House with the Iraq Study Group. She also held planning sessions on the war with top-level State Department officials.

In Iraq, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, paid an unannounced visit to Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to press him on setting a timetable to take control of the nation's security.

Maliki, in turn, asked for greater authority to deploy Iraqi troops as he saw fit, said an Iraqi official who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions.

Abizaid and other top military commanders were among those being summoned to meet with members of Congress this week to answer questions on conditions in Iraq, where civil strife in Baghdad has continued despite a U.S.-led crackdown.

The Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), spent the day at the White House to begin a final round of interviews and meetings aimed at forging a new approach to Iraq.

The stakes are enormous. Administration and congressional officials are hoping the 10-member panel will come up with a plan that Republicans and Democrats can support. Iraq is riven by sectarian violence nearly four years after the U.S.-led invasion toppled Saddam Hussein.

Bush and panel members exchanged questions about Iraq during a closed session that lasted more than an hour. The president later described the meeting as a "general conversation about the situation there."

Bush emphasized his misgivings about talks with Syria and Iran after meeting with Olmert.

He and Olmert said Iran aimed to develop nuclear weapons, even though Tehran insisted its nuclear program was intended only for energy purposes. Bush said if Iran failed to suspend nuclear enrichment, world powers should take steps to economically isolate Tehran.

Olmert said Iran was "not just a threat for Israel but for the whole world."

However, Israel would not oppose U.S.-Iranian negotiations, a senior Israeli official said after the Bush-Olmert meeting. Although Israel had "no objection to talking," said the senior official, speaking on condition of anonymity, it would want the U.S. to use any diplomatic opening to emphasize the nuclear question.

Bush expressed skepticism about proposals for gradual troop withdrawals in Iraq despite new efforts by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who is expected to become the next chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Levin said he thought his proposal could gain a bipartisan majority in the Senate.

Giving Iraqi leaders a firm date for a U.S. drawdown would pressure the Shiite Muslim majority to make concessions to the Sunni Arab minority, Levin said. If they did not make concessions, Levin said, he expected the country's chaos would worsen.

There are "a number of Republicans who want us to change course and to do so in a way which will send a message to the Iraqis that this is their responsibility and we cannot save them from themselves," Levin said.

Members of the Iraq Study Group spent most of the day at the White House talking to administration officials, including Rice, Vice President Dick Cheney, national security advisor Stephen Hadley, National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte, CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace.

DOJ_NMG_0093828

Today, the group is to meet senior members of the Clinton administration, including former Secretary of State Warren Christopher, former national security advisor Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, former United Nations Ambassador Richard C. Holbrooke and possibly former President Clinton.

The panel also is scheduled to speak to Blair.

Although Bush is holding firm against some of the leading proposals for changes in Iraq, his choice of words has suggested an evolution in his goals.

The president has often declared that the U.S. aim in Iraq is to establish a democracy in the heart of the Middle East that could serve as an example to nearby countries. On Monday, Bush said his definition of success in Iraq was "a government which can sustain, govern and defend itself, and will serve as an ally in this war on terror."

He did not mention democracy.

In Iraq, U.S. military commanders have grown more emphatic about prodding the Maliki government, which they consider disorganized and unwilling to disarm militias.

Abizaid's meeting with Maliki was the third unannounced visit by a top U.S. official since the end of October. Abizaid's visit followed ones by Hadley and Negroponte.

Blair, while calling for engagement with Iran, also underlined the need to enlist moderate Arabs throughout the Middle East by demonstrating a commitment to resolving conflicts in the Palestinian territories and in Lebanon.

"Just as it is, in significant part, forces outside Iraq that are trying to create mayhem inside Iraq, so we have to have a strategy that pins them back, not only in Iraq but outside of it too," Blair said in a speech intended to clarify how America's strongest ally in Iraq viewed the next round of strategy to end the conflict.

In a briefing with reporters, Blair's official spokesman said British officials thought Syria and Iran should be given "a strategic choice" about cooperating on Iraq and elsewhere in the region.

The key, Blair said, is talking to Iran from a position of strength, once the "pressure points" Tehran is using elsewhere in the Middle East "to thwart us" are relieved.

"Offer Iran a clear strategic choice: They help the Middle East peace process, not hinder it; they stop supporting terrorism in Lebanon or Iraq; and they abide by, not flout, their international obligations. In that case, a new partnership is possible. Or alternatively they face the consequences of not doing so: isolation," Blair said.

The war in Iraq has claimed the lives of 125 British troops, and as early as 2004, Britain's army commanders expressed an interest in drawing down by at least a third the 8,000 troops deployed by the nation.

But London has been waiting for the U.S. to move first and has been hamstrung by the deteriorating security situation that has impeded the withdrawal of American forces.

Blair, who has faced strong criticism at home for appearing to follow Washington's lead too closely, made it clear that Britain intended to remain a strong ally of the U.S.

"Our partnership with America and our membership of the European Union are precisely suited to Britain," he said. "For that reason, it would be insane, in my judgment — yes, I would put it as strongly as that — for us to give up either relationship."

Bush Meets With Panel On Iraq, But Not On Policy (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The bipartisan Iraq Study Group spent Monday at the White House meeting with President Bush and his top advisers as the panel winds down its search for consensus on what to do next in Iraq.

Bush said he looks forward to recommendations from the group, which is headed by Republican former secretary of State James Baker and Democratic former congressman Lee Hamilton. The commission began its work last spring under the direction of Congress. It has gained political capital since voters upset with the war gave Democrats a majority in Congress last week.

The panel won't release its findings until later this month or early next month, but group members have hinted — and outside experts have predicted — that the recommendations are likely to involve pressuring the Iraqi government to make political compromises to enhance security, altering the priorities of U.S. troops and engaging in talks with Iraq's neighbors Iran and Syria.

“There are no good options, so the question becomes, what are the best of the bad ones?” says William Cohen, a former senator, R-Maine, who served as Defense secretary during President Clinton's second term.

Cohen, who is not a member of the group, and others lay out likely elements of the recommendations:

•Pushing Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to crack down on sectarian militias, increase political participation by minority Sunni Arabs and distribute Iraq's oil revenue fairly. “That's the agenda on the political side: How do we engage more effectively with the Iraqi government to move forward on the internal issues of reconciliation and national unity?" says Michele Flournoy, a military scholar at the non-partisan Center for Strategic and International Studies.

•Shifting more U.S. troops to training and advising Iraqi security forces. Some Democrats have called for U.S. forces to be brought home starting in the next several months. "As long as the Iraqis believe we're there in some open-ended way, we're taking the pressure off of them to make some very difficult decisions," says Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

•Negotiating with neighboring Iran and Syria, which have influence with factions in Iraq, to curb violence. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who is scheduled to talk with the commission via satellite today, has called for such talks. Bush repeated his insistence on preconditions: that Syria stop interfering in Lebanon and end its support for extremist groups, and that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, which the United Nations Security Council considers a step toward a nuclear weapon.

Cohen predicts that the recommendations also will include appealing to U.S. allies for more troops and funding.

Bush said Monday's meetings were to exchange information, not to discuss policy recommendations. He said he is open to suggestions from the commission as well as a review underway by top officials at the Pentagon. "I believe it is very important, though, for people making suggestions to recognize that the best military options depend upon the conditions on the ground," he said.

That means no troop withdrawals until Iraq is stable, White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters at his daily briefing. "The ultimate goal still has to be an Iraq that can sustain, govern and defend itself," he said.

The president has nominated former CIA director Robert Gates, a member of the commission until last week, to replace Donald Rumsfeld as Defense secretary. That means Gates will be familiar with the panel's recommendations and puts more pressure on Bush to endorse the Iraq Study Group's report, Cohen says. "I don't see any way the president could reject it."

Huge Task Before Iraq Study Group (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

For the bipartisan panel of luminaries known as the Iraq Study Group, the most important thing now may be hammering out a framework for peace in Washington, not drawing up new lists of options for US policy toward Iraq.

After all, despite all the Washington talk about cooperation since last week's elections, profound differences about the way forward remain between many Democrats and Republicans, as well as among them. Yet all sides say they are willing to listen to one another, and look for common ground.

Enter the Iraq panel, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic congressmen Lee Hamilton. Timing - plus the nature of its members - may have thrust the group into a central role in perhaps the most important policy debate now facing the nation.

"Maybe an outside group can craft a policy that both sides can accept, though they don't want to have responsibility for drafting it," says William Martel, an associate professor of security studies at the Fletcher School at Tufts University in Medford, Mass.

The 10-member Iraq Study Group was created by Congress last spring. At the time the move generated little notice, apart from a flurry of activity among Washington think tank experts eager to serve as advisers to the panel.

Now its final report, expected before the end of the year, is something Washington is eagerly anticipating.

On Monday group members met with White House officials, including President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. They were to interview British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Tuesday via videoconference.

As to Mr. Bush's appearance before the group, presidential spokesman Tony Snow characterized it as a conversation in which both sides shared views. "This is not a deposition," Mr. Snow said.

Bush himself said he was not sure what the Iraq Study Group's report would say but that he looked forward to seeing it. "I'm not going to prejudge" the group's work, said Bush.

The full Iraq Study Group is set to meet the week after Thanksgiving to begin the contentious process of drawing up final recommendations. Messrs. Baker and Hamilton did not want to produce any lists before the election that could have been leaked for political gain.

Bush's nominee to replace Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, former Director of Intelligence Robert Gates, was a panel member. Last Friday, Baker and Hamilton announced that Gates had resigned from the group and been replaced by former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger. The panel remains split between five Democrats and five Republicans.

Given its nature, the Iraq Study Group seems unlikely to produce a report calling either for a continuation of current policy or an immediate and rapid drawdown of US forces in Iraq.

In appearances promoting a recent book, Baker, for his part, has been somewhat critical of the administration's slowness to react to Iraq's intensifying violence.

When he was secretary of State, Baker was open to talking even with US adversaries, to the point where he endured hours-long harangues from the late Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad. As commission co-chairman, Baker has already met with Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the US.

It is possible the Iraq Study Group may urge some sort of regional roundtable meeting on Iraq's future that includes Iran and Syria - a recommendation the White House has previously opposed.

Former Ambassador to the UN Richard Holbrooke, a Democrat, recently said that a regional conference similar to the one he used to craft an end to the Bosnian war in 1995 might be useful.

"This war is being waged on the ground by ferocious forces which aren't necessarily going to be much interested in what regional and international players say," Mr. Holbrooke, who is not an Iraq Study Group member, said in a Council on Foreign Relations analysis. "Still, I think it's worth trying."

Of course, given the presence of Baker and other old-hand Republicans on the panel, it is also unlikely that the study group will urge any sort of timetable for a troop pullout - even a vague one. That's something Democrats might find hard to accept.

As to possible middle-ground solutions, the panel has reportedly been weighing an option called "Stability First," which emphasizes withdrawing US resources from much of the country to focus all efforts on Baghdad stability; and an option called "Redeploy and Contain," which would involve withdrawing most US forces to surrounding nations, where they would serve as a mobile reserve for Iraqi national forces.

Hamilton has said it is possible his group won't be able to come to consensus at all. As a party, Democrats remain split over the degree to which Iraq might still be saved, as well as over the nature of any troop withdrawal deadlines.

Not that the GOP, as a whole party, is now a unified front. Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona has said what's needed now is, in fact, an increase in US force levels in Iraq, at least for a time.

As to the dialogue between the parties, while key Senate Democrats have vowed to push for a resolution that would call for troop withdrawals in a matter of months, a withdrawal timetable appears to remain an anathema to the White House.

"I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out," said Bush's chief of staff, Joshua Bolten, in a weekend broadcast interview.

At work since April, the bipartisan panel is expected to suggest changes in US policy in Iraq by year's end. Its members are:

• James Baker III, former secretary of State (George H.W. Bush), co-chairman
• Lee Hamilton, former congressman (D) of Indiana, co-chairman
• Lawrence Eagleburger, former secretary of State (George H.W. Bush)
• Vernon Jordan, attorney, presidential adviser (Clinton)
• Edwin Meese, former US attorney general (Reagan)
• Sandra Day O'Connor, former Supreme Court justice
• Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff (Clinton)
• William Perry, former secretary of Defense (Clinton)
• Chuck Robb, former governor of Virginia (D)
• Alan Simpson, former senator (R) of Wyoming

Bush Trades Ideas On Iraq With Panel (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum And Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 14, 2006

President Bush traded ideas on Iraq with a bipartisan commission Monday and promised to work with the incoming Democratic majority toward "common objectives." At the same time, he renewed his opposition to any timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops.

As Bush met with the Iraq Study Group, the Democrat in line to lead the Senate Armed Services Committee, Carl Levin of Michigan, said the administration didn't see that "we're getting deeper and deeper into a hole."

Levin and other Democrats called for some troops to come home right away, suggesting that would pressure the Iraqi government into assuming more responsibility.

Bush in turn had stern words for the Democrats, less than a week after they won control of both chambers of Congress in midterm elections in which the Iraq war figured prominently.

Asked about proposals by Levin and others for a phased troop reduction, Bush said, "I believe it is very important ... for people making suggestions to recognize that the best military options depend upon the conditions on the ground."

While Democrats agree that troops should leave Iraq sooner rather than later, they remain divided on the specifics. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a contender to become the next majority leader, supports an immediate withdrawal of all troops, whereas Levin and others favor a slower phased withdrawal and have been reluctant to suggest a firm timetable.

Whereas Murtha and some others contend violence in Iraq will continue so long as U.S. troops are present, Levin and others warn that any withdrawal of troops must be done slowly to avoid a collapse in security.

Baker's panel has been briefed on the Democrats' proposals and is considering a range of options. In addition to considering whether there should be any timetable to pull out troops, the panel is studying many other options, including whether to solicit Iran and Syria to help stop the fighting.

The president met for more than an hour with a 10-member panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton. He was joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley.

The panel then stayed around for a longer session that included other members of the president's national security team, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Baker and Hamilton later put out a joint statement. "We were pleased to meet with senior administration officials today and look forward to our consultations with some top Democrats tomorrow. We are working expeditiously to complete our report and recommendations," the statement said.

Bush discussed the meeting with reporters during a picture-taking session in the Oval Office with visiting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"I was impressed by the questions they asked. They want us to succeed in Iraq, just like I want us to succeed. So we had a really good discussion," Bush said.

As to newly empowered Democrats, he said, "What's interesting is they're beginning to understand that with victory comes responsibility, and I'm looking forward to working with the Democrats to achieve common objectives."

White House spokesman Tony Snow described the meeting with the Iraq panel as a "general conversation about the situation there," rather than a preview of what the group will recommend. "This was not proposal-shopping by the Iraq Study Group," Snow said.

The members asked questions of Bush, and he of them, Snow said, "but there was care taken not to sort of try to prejudge, or also to get a jump on what they are going to do."

Lawmakers barely had begun their postelection session Monday when debate broke out over the war in Iraq and over Democratic proposals to start bringing home U.S. troops.

Levin said in a news conference that the military had done what it could and it was up to Iraq's politicians to find consensus. "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves," he said.

In addition, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada went to the Senate floor to lend support for a change in Iraq policy.

But Republicans shot back, saying they would oppose any timetable because it could cause Iraq to collapse into chaos.

Opponents of Levin's proposal — at least for now — include Sen. John Warner, R-Va., outgoing chairman of the Armed Services Committee. He says Congress must wait until the Baker-Hamilton panel releases its recommendations.

Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, two GOP members of the Armed Services Committee, said they would oppose an arbitrary withdrawal of troops. Collins and Graham have both criticized the Bush administration for its handling of the war.

Graham recently said Iraq was on the verge of chaos and demanded accountability, but on Monday he stood firm on his position that more troops, not fewer troops, are needed to settle the violence there.

Opposing views could deadlock Congress on the matter. While Republicans have the majority until the new session begins in January, they do so by a slim margin. And when Democrats take over, they too will have a razor-thin majority — far short of the 60 votes needed to cut off delaying tactics.

Meanwhile, Democratic leaders are lining up behind legislation that would extend an investigative office that unearthed millions of dollars in waste and fraud associated with the rebuilding of Iraq. Republican Collins and Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin introduced legislation that would allow the office to continue through October 2008.

Under current law, it will expire in October 2007.

Collins and Feingold offered the measure as an amendment to a military construction and veterans' spending bill that the Senate will debate Tuesday. Collins said she will press for the legislation to be taken up separately as well to improve its chances.

Rep. Ike Skelton, the incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee, introduced a similar bill Monday that would be likely to keep the inspector general's office in business through 2009 by asking it to investigate another $1.7 billion in Iraq funding.

Even before the Iraq Study Group's work is finished, the panel's report is widely seen as an opportunity to give the campaign-weary Democratic and Republican parties a chance at consensus — or at least a framework for agreement.

Also on Monday, Gen. John Abizaid, head of the U.S. Central Command, met with the Iraqi prime minister to "reaffirm President Bush's commitment" to success in Iraq, the government said.

Baker, who served as the first President Bush's secretary of state, has said the report's recommendations are likely to fall somewhere between the troop withdrawal strategy that Republicans like to say Democrats favor and the stay-the-course policy until recently used by Bush and widely ridiculed by Democrats.

Proposed Iraq Pullout Lacking Specifics (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

The White House yesterday rejected Democrats' proposals for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq as lacking specifics or "meat on the bones," as President Bush met with the Iraq Study Group, which is seeking to advise the administration on ways to realign Iraq policy.

Democrats have claimed a mandate after last week's elections to force a change in Iraq policy, and key Senate Democrats yesterday called for the first troops to be withdrawn within six months as a signal to Iraqis that the United States is not their "security blanket."

"That's the message that came through so clearly and powerfully last Tuesday from the American people. Most Democrats share the view that we should pressure the White House to commence the phased redeployment of U.S. troops from Iraq in four to six months," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, who is in line to become the next chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

His call was echoed by Sen. Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, who is likely to become the Senate majority leader when Democrats assume control next year. Meanwhile, House Democrats' leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, has made Iraq the central issue in the race for House Democrats' No. 2 position by endorsing Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, based on his opposition to the war.

Faced with the election results and emboldened Democrats, Mr. Bush is trying to keep control of the debate while still being open to suggestions from the soon-to-be new majority party on Capitol Hill.

"What's interesting is, is that they're beginning to understand that with victory comes responsibilities. And I'm looking forward to working with the Democrats to achieve common objectives," the president told reporters after a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said that Democrats have not settled on a proposal and that Mr. Levin's idea isn't even fleshed out enough to respond.

"Democrats now have to put meat on the bones," he said.

The White House has turned to the Iraq Study Group, boosting the congressionally mandated panel's profile in the past week both in a postelection press conference and again with a day full of meetings between the group's members and administration officials.

Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten met yesterday with the group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana for 75 minutes yesterday.

The group spent the day at the White House, also meeting with the secretaries of defense and state, the national intelligence and CIA directors, top generals and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Today, its members will meet with Democrats such as former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger, former Assistant Secretary of State Richard C. Holbrooke and former Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

Expectations for the group are growing, and those on both sides of the political divide say it could be a chance for the White House to achieve a face-saving way forward in Iraq.

The group said it wants to have a report by the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0093833

But Mr. Snow said the study group is just one of the voices Mr. Bush will listen to, and said Mr. Bush is responsible for making final decisions. He also cautioned against putting too much weight on the group's meetings yesterday with administration officials, saying that it was an exchange of information about what is going on in Iraq and that the group was not pitching suggestions.

"There seems to be this notion that somehow this is like a board game, where you just sort of neatly sweep all the pieces off, and then it's all done," he said.

Still, Mr. Bush's tone has already changed to the point where he is now drawing fewer lines and sounding more welcoming to outside ideas.

Asked yesterday whether he would accept recommendations from the group that included timetables, Mr. Bush did not rule it out, instead saying he will not "prejudge" the report. At a press conference last week, he announced the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and nominated Robert M. Gates, who until Friday was a member of the study group, as a replacement.

Mr. Levin said the change in attitude was apparent.

"I didn't hear anything about cutting and running," he said. "I didn't hear anything about if you are proposing that we begin a phased redeployment in four to six months, that somehow or other that will help the terrorists."

A Committee's Platform (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

Now that the campaign is over, the campaign has begun. And as it was in the 2006 midterm elections, Topic No. 1 for the opening stage of the 2008 presidential campaign is the war in Iraq. The Senate Armed Services Committee is holding a hearing tomorrow on Iraq and Afghanistan. The committee's members include the widely perceived front-runners in both parties, Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John McCain of Arizona.

The committee's Democratic ranks also include Senators Evan Bayh of Indiana, who is almost certain to run for president, and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, probably the strongest advocate of the war in his party. This committee provided Mrs. Clinton the forum this summer in which she excoriated Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld for "incompetence in executing the war."

Bush Says He's Open To Change In Iraq, But ... (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — President Bush spent more than an hour on Monday with the independent panel examining strategic options for Iraq, and cautioned afterward that while he was open to new ideas, it was important for "people making suggestions to recognize that the best military options depend upon conditions on the ground."

The president's brief remarks seemed aimed at Democrats, who are demanding a phased withdrawal of troops from Iraq, beginning in a matter of months. Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted any timetable, and his comments on Monday offered the first hint of how he might respond.

Addressing reporters in the Oval Office, Mr. Bush shed little light on the substance of his hour-and-15-minute session with members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, the former congressman. The president said that they had "a good discussion," and that he was "looking forward to interesting ideas."

Mr. Bush is under intense pressure to change course in Iraq, from Democrats and from some Republicans. One leading Republican, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said in an interview on Monday that the election results were a clear cry for a new Iraq strategy.

"The American people have spoken with regard to their deep concern about the loss of life, the loss of limb, the enormity of the expenditures, the credibility of our country," Mr. Warner said.

But Mr. Warner, who created a stir among Republicans this fall when he said the situation in Iraq was "drifting sideways," appealed to his colleagues not to rush to conclusions before a report by the commission, which is expected in December.

Other Republicans also weighed in. Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a leading member of the Armed Services Committee, said in a statement that he would "adamantly oppose" any effort to set a deadline for withdrawal, calling it "equivalent to surrendering in the central battlefront in the war on terror."

Democrats, for their part, continued their offensive, saying the American people had given them a mandate. In a news conference on Capitol Hill, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, who will be the next Armed Services chairman, accused the administration of "ignoring obvious reality on the ground in Iraq, that we're getting deeper and deeper into a hole that we should stop digging."

The debate will soon move to the Armed Services panel. Among the senators on that committee are leading contenders in the nascent 2008 presidential campaign, Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain, who has been talking about increasing rather than decreasing the numbers of troops in Iraq.

On Wednesday, the committee will hear testimony from Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top military commander in the Middle East.

Iraq policy will also no doubt play a role in the confirmation hearings next month for Robert M. Gates, the former C.I.A. director, who is the president's choice to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense. Mr. Gates was a member of the Iraq Study Group but stepped down when his new appointment was announced.

Senator Warner said he invited Gen. Peter Pace, who as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is conducting his own review of Iraq policy, to appear before the committee.

The Iraq Study Group, formed at the request of Congress, is in Washington this week for a last round of interviews before making its final recommendations. Vice President Dick Cheney attended the Oval Office session on Monday, and the group met with other members of the Bush foreign policy team.

In his comments, Mr. Bush appeared to be walking a fine line — declaring that he was open to new tactics in Iraq, but seeming to foreclose some options.

Before their meeting at the White House, some commission members said they sensed that the White House and the commission members were, in the words of one, "feeling each other out, trying to sense where this is going."

Mr. Baker has made no secret of his belief that the Bush administration must talk to its enemies, Syria and Iran included. In a speech on Monday, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain said the West should be open to Iran and Syria — but only if they take a cooperative stance.

Mr. Bush did not budge on those points. Asked about Syria, he said, "We do have an embassy there in Syria," without mentioning that contacts with the Syrian government have been limited. The president then laid out preconditions for talks with the Syrian government. Nor did Mr. Bush give any ground on Iran, instead reiterating his long-held stance that the Iranian government must suspend the enrichment of uranium before Washington will join talks.

Many officials inside and outside the administration are looking for signs that Mr. Bush will modify his views, especially now that he has nominated Mr. Gates, who led a committee of the Council on Foreign Relations calling for more engagement with Iran. But Bush aides say talking to Syria or Iran is simply not enough.

"Talking isn't a strategy," Mr. Hadley, the national security adviser, said in an interview last month. "The issue is how can we condition the environment so that Iran and Syria will make a 180-degree turn."

Expectations are high both inside and outside the administration that the Baker-Hamilton group will provide a face-saving way forward for Mr. Bush. But one leading Republican, Representative Duncan Hunter, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said lawmakers should not delude themselves by thinking there would be easy answers.

"No matter what the commission recommends, the day after the recommendations come out, you're going to have American troops in Iraq continuing to train and stand up the Iraqi forces," Mr. Hunter said. "You have to do that. There's no shortcut to that. There's no silver bullet and there's no easy way to do it."

In Call For More Troops, McCain Places His Bet On Iraq (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — Senator John McCain is accustomed to staking out a lonely piece of ground, but on Iraq he is virtually an army of one. Nearly alone among major political figures in calling for an increase in American forces in Iraq, Mr. McCain is either taking a principled stand or a huge political gamble. Or both.

A majority of Americans now say they think invading Iraq was a mistake and would like to see the withdrawal of at least some of the nearly 150,000 troops there, polls say. Only one in seven Americans agrees with Mr. McCain that the United States should send more soldiers and marines. Even President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, who assert that victory is the only acceptable outcome of the war, have not dared publicly to advocate additional deployments.

Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, has all but announced his intention to run for president, and his position on Iraq could be a major complication for him, particularly if violence there continues to grow and American casualties mount.

Mr. McCain contends that the war in Iraq is worth fighting and is worth winning. He has said consistently from the start of the conflict that the only way to prevail is to send enough soldiers to do the job. His current proposal is to send 20,000 additional troops in hopes of bringing Baghdad and the restive western provinces under control.

The alternative, he said, is humiliation for the United States and disaster for Iraq.

"We're paying a price for the failure of our policy in the past," Mr. McCain said Sunday on "Meet the Press" on NBC, "and the question, then, before the American people is, are we ready to quit? And I believe the consequences of failure are chaos in the region, which will spread."

Mr. McCain said that the fate of the Iraqi venture would be decided in the next six months or so and that signaling the intention to depart, regardless of facts on the ground, only guaranteed defeat. But he also said he was willing to reach a different conclusion if the generals in charge of the American military operation or if the members of the commission led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, came up with a workable alternative.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of United States forces in Iraq, and top intelligence officials will go before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Wednesday to face questioning about the war for the first time since last week's election, which many viewed as a referendum on Iraq. The Baker study group is expected to report its preliminary findings and recommendations next month.

Leslie H. Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said Mr. McCain had painted such a dire picture of the consequences of defeat that he almost had to advocate a more forceful effort to win. If Mr. McCain were to join the chorus of those agitating for a fast or slow withdrawal, he could alienate a large swath of voters he needs to win the Republican presidential nomination, Mr. Gelb added.

"He's making the bet — and it's not a crazy bet — that the country doesn't want to lose," he said. "The public realizes we can't afford to win and probably can't win, but it doesn't want to lose. And the Republicans probably won't nominate anyone who's prepared to accept that now."

Other analysts said Mr. McCain was risking his reputation as a realist and someone who knows when to fold a losing hand by sticking obstinately to his current position.

"He would just repeat the mistake of Vietnam," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution, the liberal-leaning research group in Washington. "If McCain refuses to acknowledge that some wars can become simply unwinnable, he may be exposing a weakness in his thinking that ultimately deprives him of the presidency."

Last week's election robbed Mr. McCain of a prize he had sought for many years, the chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee. If Republicans had retained control of the Senate, he was in line to assume the gavel and the ability to call witnesses and set the terms of the Iraq debate in the Senate, at least in part. But the defeat of Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, tipped the balance of power to Democrats, putting Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, an early opponent of the war, in position to assume the post in January.

Mr. McCain can still play his gadfly role from the minority, and some welcome his voice.

"God bless him, he's about the only serious person in this whole debate," said Joshua Muravchik, resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, the conservative research organization in Washington. "Even a supporter of the war like myself would have to acknowledge that we're in a mess, so the question is what to do about it. And McCain is saying we ought to do what we should have done in the first place, which was send enough troops to do the job. That seems counterintuitive because the whole momentum of emotions in the country at this point is to get out of there."

Father Knows Best? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

As president of Texas A&M University, Bob Gates abolished admissions preferences for the children and grandchildren of alumni, reportedly saying it was "unworthy of a great university." Funny, then, that he should be returning to Washington on the strength of his reputation as daddy's boy.

"Daddy," of course, is former President George H. W. Bush, for whom Mr. Gates served as deputy national security adviser and director of Central Intelligence. Today, the elder Mr. Bush is being celebrated as a foreign-policy sage whose adroit stewardship of the world stands in flattering contrast with current management. Mr. Gates, along with Bush 41 hands James Baker and Larry Eagleburger of the Iraq Study Group, are now supposed to play the part of the posse come to the rescue of the wayward son. Newsweek even commissioned a poll that found that "67% favor Bush Senior's internationalist approach to foreign policy over his son's more unilateral course."

Curiously, a similar percentage of Americans voted for someone other than Mr. Bush during his 1992 re-election bid. So it's worth reprising just what his "internationalist approach" achieved, and where it failed. The senior Mr. Bush is justly remembered as the architect of the broad coalition that evicted Saddam Hussein from Kuwait -- and of the Coalition of One that took down Manuel Noriega of Panama. Bush 41 also deserves great credit for engineering the North American Free Trade Agreement and supporting German reunification when it was opposed by the likes of Margaret Thatcher.

But consider four other shorthands for the Bush 41 record. One is "1-202-456-1414," the number for the White House switchboard. As secretary of state, Mr. Baker read it aloud in congressional testimony in 1990, ostensibly for the benefit of Israelis once they got "serious about peace." A year later, and for much the same reason, the Bush administration threatened to withhold $10 billion in commercial loan guarantees, which Israel needed to cope with the influx of some one million Russian Jews -- fully a fifth of its population.

For its efforts, the Bush administration brought Arabs and Israelis together for the Madrid Peace Conference, which set the groundwork for the Oslo Accords. These were touted as historic achievements, but for Israel it meant more terrorism, culminating in the second intifada, and for the Palestinians it meant repression in the person of Yasser Arafat and mass radicalization in the movement of Hamas. Worse, Mr. Baker fostered the fatal perception that the failure of Arabs and Jews to make peace was the root of the region's problems, not a symptom of them, and that the obstacle to peace was intransigent Israel, not militant Islam. Bob Gates later gave voice to that perception when he wrote, in a 1998 New York Times op-ed, that the road to Mideast peace must "not kowtow to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's obstructionism."

Or take "Lawrence of Serbia," the moniker Mr. Eagleburger earned for his initial indulgence, as the State Department's point man on Yugoslav affairs during the early 1990s while the country was coming apart, of Serbia's Slobodan Milosevic. Mr. Eagleburger, who had longstanding business ties in Belgrade, spent the early period of the war largely ignoring Mr. Milosevic's depredations on his neighbors, including paramilitary slaughters in Vukovar and concentration camps in Omarska. "There was a kind of preference for stability and an attachment to the old Yugoslavia over our interests in human rights," Patrick Glynn of the American Enterprise Institute told Newsday in 1992, adding the administration had "been standing by, waiting while the final solution is played out."

Which brings us to "Chicken Kiev," Mr. Bush's spectacularly misconceived August 1991 speech in what was shortly to become the capital of independent Ukraine. Mr. Bush's reluctance to acknowledge -- and better manage -- the breakup of Yugoslavia was partly a function of his reluctance to acknowledge the impending breakup of the Soviet Union and the fall from grace of his friend Mikhail Gorbachev. The U.S. was the 39th country to re-establish diplomatic ties with Lithuania, after Iceland and Mongolia had already paved the way. Once Mr. Gorbachev was gone, Mr. Bush was equally reluctant to help the new Russia get on its feet, prompting Richard Nixon to complain about the administration's "pathetically inadequate response in light of the opportunities we face in the crisis in the former Soviet Union."

But surely no Bush 41 failure was as great -- or as consequential -- as his apparently flip suggestion, following "victory" in the Gulf War, that the "Iraqi people . . . take matters into their own hands and force Saddam Hussein, the dictator, to step down." Tens of thousands of Shiites and Kurds took him seriously, and tens of thousands paid with their lives as Saddam quelled the revolt while the Bush administration stood by, lest it exceed its U.N. mandate.

None of this is to say that Mr. Gates is merely an avatar of Bush the Father, much as his nomination is being played that way in the media, or that he hasn't learned from past mistakes. But critics of the current administration and the "disaster" visited on Iraq by neoconservative ideologues might usefully reflect on the previous disasters visited by the non-ideologues on Iraqis, Croats and Bosnians, among others sacrificed in the name of prudence. A decade from now, they just might find themselves ruing the day Bush 43 abandoned his idealism -- and the people that idealism has liberated or inspired -- in the service of "realism," suffused by panic.

Get Jim In Here, Pronto! (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

If I told you that there was something in Washington called the Baker commission but didn't tell you what it was about, you still could probably name many of its members. If you are of a certain age, you might wonder, "Jim or Howard?" And you might have a quibble or two.

Where is Dick Holbrooke? Does Sandra Day O'Connor's new availability mean that Madeleine Albright is out of luck from now on? Are they sure that Larry Eagleburger is still alive? But Vernon Jordan is there, along with Ed Meese and Alan Simpson and Lee Hamilton. This is one torch that has not been passed to a new generation, although former Virginia senator and presidential son-in-law Charles Robb (age 67) is a fresh face in the pool of Washington Wise Men. Welcome, Chuck.

The Baker commission -- that's James Baker, of course -- was appointed by Congress to look into the situation in Iraq. It is expected to report early next month, and it is duly bouncing around and staffing up and holding hearings and all the things that prestigious commissions do.

Ordinarily a commission such as this has two possible purposes: action or inaction. Sometimes a problem is referred to a prestigious commission so that the commission can recommend doing things that everybody knows must be done but that nobody has the nerve to propose -- at least nobody who has to run for office. The commission can ram this policy down the politicians' allegedly unwilling throats. If it is bipartisan -- and what fun is a commission that isn't bipartisan? -- the commission also protects both parties against a stab in the back by the other. This is how Social Security was reformed and saved the last time, when the chairman of the commission was Alan Greenspan, and undoubtedly this is how it will be reformed and saved again. Hey, Greenspan's available again. Come to think of it, why isn't he on this one? He is no expert on Iraq -- but neither is Leon Panetta, another recent initiate into the Pantheon.

Welcome, Leon.

On the other hand, sometimes a problem is referred to a commission simply to get it off the table. Action is widely perceived as necessary, and the creation of a commission can be made to look like action.

So which is the Baker commission? It's got elements of both. Part of the idea, certainly, was to get the politicians over the hump of the election and give them something to say in the meantime. ("We desperately need new ideas and fresh thinking about Iraq and, indeed, the entire Middle East. I look forward to the recommendations of the Baker commission and urge them to interpret their mandate widely and boldly.") And part of the idea is to legitimize some impalatable solution. But the Baker commission may be nearly unique in that there is no obvious solution waiting to be imposed. People actually hope that it will come up with something that no one has thought of.

Good luck. The chance that this group of aging white men, plus Vernon Jordan and Sandra Day O'Connor, will come up with something original is not enormous. It's a nutty and not very attractive idea to turn an urgent issue of war and peace over to a commission. Commissions have usually been trotted out for long-run social problems: immigration, debt, health care. Going to war is something that ought to be decided by the people we elect. Congress, in recent decades, has virtually abandoned its duty under the Constitution to make the decisions about when American soldiers are sent to kill and die.

Presidents have foolishly claimed that authority. And now, inevitably, we have a president who is stuck with a war that he insisted on and a citizenry that has no interest in it.

If we had wanted our country to be run by James Baker, we had our chance. He was interested in running for president in 1996 but discovered that his interest in a James Baker presidency was not widely shared. Although he has held a variety of government posts, from undersecretary of commerce under Gerald Ford to secretary of state under Bush the Elder, and has all the trappings of enormous consequence and wisdom, such as a Presidential Medal of Freedom and his own James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University, Baker is essentially a political operative. His place in history is Florida 2000, where he secured the presidency for George W. Bush. Reporters were awed by his brilliance and ruthlessness. History may be less admiring of his willingness to make inconsistent arguments and to lie with a straight face.

Being a Washington Wise Man does not require much wisdom. Baker has a "conviction," said a Baker colleague quoted in The Post on Sunday, "that Iraq is the central foreign policy issue confronting the United States." Wow. Now there's an insight. Actually, it is a nice small insight into the Baker mentality that he apparently can imagine a war that is killing large numbers of young Americans every month but that is not our central foreign policy issue. Baker also believes that "the only way to address that issue successfully is to first build a bipartisan consensus." Now, that is a conviction you can sink your teeth into. People like Baker always favor a bipartisan consensus.

They don't really believe in politics, which is to say they don't really believe in democracy.

Gunmen Seize 100 At Iraq Ministry (BBC)

BBC News, November 14, 2006

Gunmen in military-style uniforms have kidnapped more than 100 men from a research institute belonging to Iraq's higher education ministry.

A ministry spokeswoman said the gunmen arrived in new pick-up vehicles and stormed the ministry's Research Directorate in central Baghdad.

They ordered women into one room and seized the men, including employees, guards and visitors to the building.

Academics and researchers have been frequent targets of violence in Iraq.

Correspondents say many Iraqis believe mass kidnappings like this latest incident are committed by members of the Shia Muslim-dominated security forces or take place with their collusion.

The head of the parliamentary education committee, Alaa Makki, said the abductees had been both Shias and Sunnis.

Mr Makki interrupted a televised parliamentary session with the news and urged the prime minister and interior and defence ministers to respond rapidly to what he called a "national catastrophe".

Eyewitnesses say the gunmen closed off roads around the institute in Karrada district and took away their captives in handcuffs.

The higher education minister is a member of main Sunni Arab political bloc in Iraq - where most ministries are fiefdoms of the various sectarian groups.

U.S. Presses For Security Timeline (WT/AP)

The Washington Times/AP, November 14, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The U.S. Central Command chief confronted Iraq's prime minister yesterday over how Iraqi forces would halt raging violence and signaled a possible prelude to shifts in American policy on engaging Iran and Syria.

The meeting came as sectarian attacks killed at least 91 persons throughout Iraq, 46 of them showing signs of torture. The U.S. military announced the deaths of four additional American soldiers. So far this month, 34 American service members have been killed or have died in Iraq.

Gen. John Abizaid, commander of all U.S. forces in the Middle East, sternly warned Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he must disband Shi'ite militias and give the United States proof they were disarmed, according to senior Iraqi government officials with knowledge of what the two men discussed.

Beyond that, Gen. Abizaid asked the Iraqi leader to give the U.S. military a firm timetable for when Iraq's security forces could take full control of the country, the officials said on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the talks.

Mr. al-Maliki has been pressing Washington to move more quickly to hand security affairs over to his army, asserting it could crush violence in the country within six months. Gen. Abizaid apparently called Mr. al-Maliki's bluff by asking the prime minister to give a detailed explanation of how he would do that. The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, recently said it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraqi security forces were ready to control the whole country with some U.S. backup.

The United States did not respond to requests for comment on yesterday's meeting.

But a brief statement by the Iraqi government said Gen. Abizaid told Mr. al-Maliki he had come to "reaffirm President Bush's commitment" to success in this country. It also said the two discussed the impact of "neighboring countries on the security situation in Iraq," a clear reference to Iran and Syria.

The reference to Iraq's neighbors coincided with a call by British Prime Minister Tony Blair for Iran and Syria to help stem bloodshed in Iraq and to join efforts to stabilize the Middle East.

The Syrian ambassador to Washington affirmed a readiness to work with the United States.

"We in Syria believe that engagement with the United States on Iraq can help a lot, because we believe that we need to stabilize the situation in Iraq and support the political process there," Imad Moustapha told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Gen. Abizaid was the third top U.S. official to visit Iraq since Oct. 30, and the meeting comes a day after Mr. al-Maliki promised to shake up his government in a bid to end the sectarian slaughter.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley was first to visit, followed five days later by U.S. National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte.

Before Gen. Abizaid pushed the same theme, Mr. Negroponte also demanded Mr. al-Maliki disband militias by year's end -- but was met with a flat rejection. Mr. al-Maliki told Mr. Negroponte such a move would be political suicide. Mr. al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, relies heavily on two major Shi'ite political groups that run the heavily armed militias.

U.S. General Confronts Iraqi Leader On Security (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 13 -- The U.S. Central Command chief confronted Iraq's prime minister on Monday over how Iraqi forces would halt raging violence and signaled a possible prelude to shifts in American policy on engaging Iran and Syria.

The meeting came as sectarian attacks killed at least 90 people throughout Iraq, 46 of them showing signs of torture. The U.S. military announced the deaths of four additional American soldiers.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, sternly warned Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he must disband Shiite militias and give the United States proof that they were disarmed, according to senior Iraqi government officials with knowledge of what the two men discussed.

One of the militias, the Mahdi Army, is loyal to anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. On Monday night, U.S. forces raided the homes of some Sadr followers, and U.S. jets fired rockets on Shula, their northwest Baghdad neighborhood, residents said. Police said five residents were killed, although a senior Sadr aide put the death toll at nine. The U.S. military said it had no comment.

In their meeting, Abizaid also asked the Iraqi leader to give the U.S. military a firm timetable for when Iraq's security forces could take full control of the country, according to the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the talks.

Maliki has been pressing the United States to move more quickly to hand security affairs over to his army, claiming it could crush violence in the country within six months.

On Monday, Abizaid asked the prime minister to give a detailed explanation of how he would do that. The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., recently said it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraqi security forces were ready to control the whole country with some U.S. backup.

U.S. officials did not respond to requests for comment on Monday's meeting.

Also on Monday, police said a bomb detonated on a bus in the northeast Baghdad neighborhood of Shaab shortly after noon, killing 20 people. Sunni insurgents have frequently targeted Shiite bus passengers in sectarian reprisal killings.

Hours earlier, Mohammed al-Ban, a cameraman for Iraq's independent al-Sharqiya satellite television network, was gunned down in the northern city of Mosul. His wife was wounded, police said.

Iraqi Premier And U.S. General Discuss Syria And Iran (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 13 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq met here on Monday with Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, as Iraqi political leaders prepared new candidates for about 10 cabinet posts, lawmakers said.

In the third visit by a senior American official in recent weeks, General Abizaid and Mr. Maliki discussed the “influence of the neighboring countries on the security situation,” according to a statement from the prime minister’s office.

The reference was to Syria and Iran, which the Bush administration has accused of providing financing and weapons to militias in Iraq. But as the administration begins a broad reassessment of its Iraq policy, some — including Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, the closest ally of America — are proposing opening talks with the two governments.

At least 79 Iraqis were killed or found dead across Iraq on Monday, Iraqi officials said, including 10 commuters on a minibus who were killed when another passenger blew himself up, a photographer and two bodyguards for Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite. The military announced the deaths of four American soldiers, in Baghdad and Salahuddin Province.

Iraqi political leaders pressed ahead with a planned cabinet shuffle, presenting Mr. Maliki with candidates for the ministry posts that he wants changed.

Mr. Maliki has not said publicly which ministers he plans to replace, but he has been under pressure from the Bush administration to make progress toward stabilizing Iraq. The cabinet moves appeared aimed, at least in part, at demonstrating that he was making an effort.

Some officials say, though, that the problems among Iraqi leaders run far deeper than a rearrangement, even a sweeping one, can fix. Shiites and Sunnis are barely able to tolerate one another, and the tense relations make progress on improvements all but impossible.

It is a problem that the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress in the United States will immediately face.

“No matter how many new ministers, they are still going to have the same institutional problems,” said one American official in Iraq, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not have permission to discuss the subject publicly. American policy is about to change, and the shift will emphasize effectiveness over sectarian balance, the official said. “Instead of having a rainbow coalition, they will have people who can get stuff done,” the official said. “I think the U.S. will take a more hands-off approach.”

Mr. Maliki has not said publicly which ministers he wants to replace, but lawmakers said Monday that he had indicated they might include the ministers of health, electricity and oil. Sunnis have accused the Health Ministry — controlled by the powerful Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr — of sectarian bias. They also contend that it has sheltered Shiite militias that have carried out killings.

The security ministries — Interior and Defense — did not appear to be part of the shuffle.

"Most of his problems are with the Sadrists," said Jalal al-Din al-Sagheer, a Shiite lawmaker from a rival party. There were also hints that two Sunni ministers and a Kurdish one would be replaced, Mr. Sagheer said by telephone on Monday.

But Adnan Dulaimi, a member of the largest Sunni bloc, said the replacements were distributed across sects and ethnicities. Ten of 36 cabinet posts were affected, he said.

Under the current rules, pressed on the majority Shiites by American officials early this year, Mr. Maliki cannot take sects or ethnicities out of the government altogether, and the blocs, groupings made up of political parties, will retain their allotment of ministries.

But Mr. Maliki can choose from among political parties within the blocs, which could mean that entire parties might be left out.

"He's not going to reallocate the ministries to the same parties," said Maysoon al-Damaluji, a secular lawmaker. The process, she said, could take several months.

Baha al-Aaraji, a member in Mr. Sadr's bloc, the largest in Parliament, said it presented Mr. Maliki with 18 résumés, three candidates for each of its six ministries — transport, health, civil society, tourism, agriculture and a subministry for provincial affairs. In public remarks over the past few days, Mr. Maliki has tried to press his fractious coalition to work together better. In a speech to governors of Iraqi provinces on Monday, he struck a nonsectarian tone.

Regarding taking action against militia members, he warned the governors not to "look at his background or who he represents, or what sect or group or party he is from."

The American military said Monday that on Sunday it captured four Iraqis suspected of killings, kidnappings and bomb attacks in a Sunni militant stronghold south of Baghdad. In a raid in Baghdad, it killed eight people and detained 41 Iraqis suspected of ties to Al Qaeda.

Iraqi authorities reported that the American military raided homes of supporters of Mr. Sadr in the northern Baghdad neighborhood of Shuala, The Associated Press reported. Helicopters and jets were called in and gun battles were heard by residents nearby.

Sunni Needs Not Met, General Says (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook,

USA Today, November 14, 2006

RAWAH, Iraq — The Shiite-dominated central government is starving Iraqi security forces in the Sunni heartland of the resources needed to fight the insurgency, according to American officers.

In Anbar province, a Sunni region west of Baghdad, many police officers haven't been paid for three months. "It's difficult to ask a man to risk his life if you can't even pay him," said Marine Brig. Gen. Robert Neller, deputy commanding general of Multinational Force West.

Winning over Sunnis is critical to achieving a political solution to the violence in Iraq. Retribution killings between the two Muslim sects have been growing this year. The dispute in Anbar highlights a growing fear among Sunnis that the government isn't sincere about helping them.

"That's why people in Anbar think the government in Baghdad doesn't want them to succeed," Neller said. "Sometimes I wonder if the government in Baghdad wants them to succeed."

Anbar is among the most dangerous areas of Iraq. Of 104 American troop deaths in October, at least 40 were in Anbar.

There are about 33,000 American troops in Anbar, spread across 53,000 square miles. The population is 1.2 million, about 80% of which are Sunnis.

In September, Marine Maj. Gen. Rick Zilmer, the commander of troops in the region, said he had enough forces to complete his primary mission of training Iraqi forces but not enough to defeat the insurgency.

That job will depend largely on the abilities of Iraqi forces. There are about 7,000 Iraqi police officers and 13,000 Iraqi army soldiers in the province.

Haider al-Ibadi, an adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said corruption in Anbar has prevented the government from paying officers more quickly. Some Iraqi officials in Anbar have submitted fake names of officers and fraudulently pocketed the money, he said.

Neller said U.S. and Iraqi army forces are making progress in recruiting police despite the difficulties.

On a visit to the village of Rawah on the Euphrates River, a police officer asked Neller for American forces to provide local police with more protection.

"Let's be honest with each other," Neller told the officer. "There are not enough Marines, Iraqi army or police to cover all this ground. And I can't tell you there will be more Marines coming."

Bishops Call For 'Responsible Transition' In Iraq (BSUN)

By Liz F. Kay

The Baltimore Sun, November 14, 2006

The president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops called Monday for dialogue and action on a responsible transition in Iraq, a statement quickly affirmed by the national group's members at their fall meeting.

"The statement offers a constructive contribution at a critical time," Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., told the 250 prelates gathered at the Baltimore Marriott Waterfront.

"Our nation's military forces should remain in Iraq only as long as their presence contributes to a responsible transition. Our nation should look for effective ways to end their deployment at the earliest opportunity consistent with this goal," the statement reads.

The observance of Veterans Day this weekend reminds the bishops and most Americans of the issue of Iraq, said Bishop Thomas G. Wenski, the bishop of Orlando and chair of the conference's international policy committee, at a news conference Monday.

"We don't want to ally ourselves with the extremes of the divisive debate that has taken place until now, the extremes between 'stay the course' and 'cut and run,'" he said.

Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore said in an interview that "it's essential that we lift up the moral component of the situation in Iraq. We have to extract as much of the morality issue as we can."

The Iraq statement, which builds on a response issued in January, was a last-minute addition to the agenda for the fall meeting.

"The bishops read the exit polls and saw that the voters felt the biggest moral issue facing the country was Iraq, and so they felt they needed to say something about it," said the Rev. Thomas J. Reese, the former editor of America magazine, who attended the conference Monday.

John Carr, the conference's secretariat for social development and world peace, said some bishops had asked whether the national group would address the Iraq war at their fall meeting.

The bishops' conference has issued 18 statements and letters on the war, said Carr and Wenski.

"The work has been ongoing, but the decision that the bishops could not meet without addressing Iraq came in the last 10 days," Carr said.

The bishops also voted unanimously Monday to spend $335,000 of $1 million reserved last year to support a study into the causes and context of sexual abuse by clergy.

Researchers at John Jay College of Criminal Justice at the City University of New York will conduct the analysis and raise the remainder of the money for the project, which is expected to cost between $2 million and $3 million.

Voice of the Faithful, a group of Catholic laity calling for church reform, issued a statement Monday calling for full funding of the study if necessary.

"We would hope at least some bishops would encourage the USCCB to guarantee the funding of the entire study in the event John Jay College is not able to raise all of the remaining funds necessary," according to the news release.

In other business, the bishops considered the text of documents for the laity about the church's teaching on contraception and preparation for the Eucharist and guidance for bishops about ministry for "persons with a homosexual inclination."

The bishops are expected to vote on those documents Tuesday.

U.S. Bishops Call For ‘responsible' Iraq Withdrawal (USAT)

By Cathy Lynn Grossman

USA Today, November 14, 2006

BALTIMORE — The nation's Roman Catholic bishops, on record for years opposing the Iraq war, approved a statement Monday saying U.S. troops should remain in Iraq “only as long as their presence contributes to a responsible transition.”

The statement was a last- minute addition to the agenda for nearly 300 bishops gathered at the annual fall meeting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. Also on the agenda: controversial documents on Communion, ministering to homosexuals and contraception. Drafted at the request of several bishops, it began with “prayerful concern” for military personnel, their families and suffering Iraqis and calls for an end to “divisive rhetoric.”

It says, “Our nation should look for effective ways to end (troops') deployment at the earliest opportunity” consistent with contributing to a responsible transition.

The statement, issued in the name of conference president Bishop William Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., reiterated bishops' "grave moral concerns" about the war and condemned torture. It calls for human rights and religious freedom for Sunni, Shia and Christian communities in Iraq.

"This is still a conservative statement. The key word is 'contribute,' " says the Rev. Thomas Reese, a fellow at the Woodstock Theological Center at Georgetown University. "The bishops can't answer this question. That's a military and political answer, but this statement points to the crux of the matter: Does American involvement contribute to improving the situation?"

Bishops will vote today on several documents that reflect their efforts to communicate core Catholic doctrine. These include:

•A document on Communion spelling out who is "worthy" to receive the Eucharist and telling believers not to seek Communion if they knowingly violate church teachings. Anyone — gay or straight — who is having sex outside marriage and married couples who are using artificial contraception should refrain, bishops say.

Rather than expecting priests to play cops over Communion, this document is directed to all the faithful "to help people form their conscience," said Bishop Arthur Serratelli of Paterson, N.J. "Moral law applies to all."

•Pastoral guidelines for bishops ministering to "persons with a homosexual inclination." It repeats the church's stance that homosexuals should be welcomed and treated with respect but should not have positions of ministry or leadership unless they are chaste.

It takes no stance on whether homosexuality is inborn or a matter of choice and says no one is morally obligated to seek therapy. The church condemns gay sexual behavior as a sin.

"The focus of the document is getting individuals to live a virtuous Catholic life," Serratelli said Monday. "The tenor is to be more welcoming than condemning."

Groups representing gay Catholics complained the bishops drafted the guidelines without consulting homosexual Catholics and said it will likely alienate them even further. DignityUSA called for gay Catholics to be able to participate in "all sacraments and roles of ministry, leadership and service."

•The bishops considered a Q&A text on the theology of marriage and procreation designed "for the first time with engaged and married couples in mind," said Baltimore Archbishop William Keeler. An accompanying report notes Catholics use artificial contraception, condemned by the church, as much as the general population.

Also, bishops approved spending $335,000 for the first year of a study into causes and context of clergy sexual abuse of minors.

U.S. Catholic Bishops Call For 'Honest Dialogue' On Iraq (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

BALTIMORE, Nov. 13 -- The president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops said Monday that the United States should keep its troops in Iraq only as long as they are contributing to a "responsible transition" to Iraqi rule.

Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., noted that both the U.S. bishops and top Vatican officials sharply questioned the decision to invade Iraq in 2003. As a result of the invasion, he said, the United States now has "additional moral responsibilities" to help Iraqis secure and rebuild their country.

In a four-page statement authorized by the entire body of bishops but issued in his name alone, Skylstad called for Americans to move beyond the "shrill and shallow" preelection rhetoric that "reduces the options to 'cut and run' versus 'stay the course.' " He said the nation needs an "honest dialogue" that acknowledges past mistakes, recognizes positive developments and seeks agreement on concrete steps.

The statement came as the Bush administration and the soon-to-be Democratic-controlled Congress reexamine U.S. policy in Iraq, and as the bishops primarily are focused on internal church matters, including deep cuts in their budgets and staffs.

Their agenda for three days of meetings in Baltimore this week includes statements reaffirming church teachings on contraception, Holy Communion and homosexuality. But it originally did not contain any discussion of Iraq, leading some bishops to wonder aloud whether they were avoiding the most important moral issue facing the country.

In an opening address, Archbishop Pietro Sambi, the new Vatican ambassador to the United States, said there has been a "loss of credibility in the church" because of the actions of a "small but very damaging number of its ministers and its faithful."

By a unanimous voice vote, the bishops approved spending $335,000 for research of the "causes and context" of the clergy sex abuse scandal in the church. The study will be conducted by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, which previously researched the scope of the problem and concluded that nearly 5,000 U.S. priests and deacons have molested more than 12,500 minors since 1950.

Pakistan Link Seen In Afghan Suicide Attacks (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Nov. 13 — Afghan and NATO security forces have recently rounded up several men like Hafiz Daoud Shah, a 21-year-old unemployed Afghan refugee who says he drove across the border to Afghanistan in September in a taxi with three other would-be suicide bombers.

Every case, Afghan security officials say, is similar to that of Mr. Shah, who repeated his story in a rare jailhouse interview with a reporter in Kabul, the Afghan capital. The trail of organizing, financing and recruiting the bombers who have carried out a rising number of suicide attacks in Afghanistan traces back to Pakistan, they say.

"Every single bomber or I.E.D. in one way or another is linked to Pakistan," a senior Afghan intelligence official said, referring to improvised explosive devices like roadside bombs. "Their reasons are to keep Afghanistan destabilized, to make us fail, and to keep us fragmented." He would speak on the subject only if not identified.

A senior United States military official based in Afghanistan agreed for the most part. "The strong belief is that recruiting, training and provision of technical equipment for I.E.D.'s in the main takes place outside Afghanistan," he said. By I.E.D.'s he meant suicide bombers as well. He, too, did not want his name used because he knew his remarks were likely to offend Pakistani leaders.

The charge is in fact one of the most contentious that Afghan and American officials have leveled at the Pakistani leadership, which frequently denies the infiltration problem and insists that the roots of the Taliban insurgency lie in Afghanistan.

The dispute continues to divide Afghan and Pakistani leaders, even as the Bush administration tries to push them toward greater cooperation in fighting the Taliban, whose ranks have swelled to as many as 10,000 fighters this year.

A year ago, roadside bombs and suicide attacks were rare occurrences in Afghanistan. But they have grown more frequent and more deadly. There have been more than 90 suicide attacks in Afghanistan this year. In September and October, nearly 100 people were killed in such attacks.

Afghan security forces say that in the same period, they captured 17 suspected bombers, two of them would-be suicide bombers; NATO forces say they caught 10 people planning suicide bomb attacks in recent weeks.

Last week, for the first time, a Pakistani intelligence official acknowledged that suicide bombers were being trained in Bajaur, a small Pathan tribal area along the border. In a briefing given only on condition of anonymity, the official cited the training as one reason for an airstrike this month on a religious school there that killed more than 80 people.

The arrests of Mr. Shah and others like him, Afghan and NATO officials say, show that groups intent on carrying out attacks in Afghanistan continue to operate easily inside Pakistan.

Mr. Shah said he was one of four would-be suicide bombers who arrived in Kabul from Pakistan on Sept. 30. One of them killed 12 people and wounded 40 at the pedestrian entrance to the Interior Ministry the same day.

The attack was the first suicide bomb aimed not at foreign troops but at Afghans, and it terrified Kabul residents. The dead included a woman and her child.

By Mr. Shah's account, it could have been far worse. Mr. Shah said he and his cohort had planned to blow themselves up in four separate attacks in the capital. That they failed was due partly to luck and partly to vigilance by Afghan and NATO security forces. But their plot represented a clear escalation in the bombers' ambitions in Afghanistan.

Wearing a black prayer cap and long beard, Mr. Shah recounted his own involvement in the presence of two Afghan intelligence officers at a jail run by the National Directorate of Security. The Afghan intelligence officers offered up Mr. Shah because, unlike others in custody facing similar charges, his investigation was over. He is now awaiting trial.

Mr. Shah showed no signs of fear or discomfort in front of his guards. But after two weeks in detention, he complained of tiredness and headaches from a longstanding but unspecified mental ailment, something his father confirmed in a separate interview at the family home in Karachi, the southern Pakistani port city.

At first Mr. Shah, who was educated through the sixth grade, denied that he intended to be a suicide bomber, but said he had gone to Afghanistan only to fight a jihad, or holy war. "I was just thinking of fighting a jihad against the infidels," he said. "I was hearing there was fighting in Afghanistan and seeing it in the newspapers."

But by the end of the hourlong conversation, he admitted that he had intended to blow himself up in Kabul, and said he regretted his actions. He was vague about the target of his suicide mission. "I did not know where I was going to do it," he said.

After he was arrested, Mr. Shah said, he learned that one member of his group, whom he called Abdullah, succeeded in carrying out a suicide attack outside the Interior Ministry. "When I was arrested I heard about it and I thought it must be him," he said.

"They came here to be martyred," he said of his three companions, all Pakistanis, all around the same age, and all also from Karachi.

Mr. Shah himself is one of the 2.5 million Afghans who live as refugees in Pakistan and who, officials on both sides of the border agree, frequently cycle through the ranks of the Taliban and other militant Islamic groups.

The would-be suicide bombers arrested recently, the Afghan intelligence official said, emerge from two clear strands.

Some are linked to extremist groups that have long been set up and run by Pakistani intelligence as an arm of foreign policy toward rival governments in Afghanistan and India. They are technically illegal and the government now says it has cracked down on them.

Others are allied with Afghan groups like the Taliban and the renegade militia commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, also a longtime protégé of Pakistani intelligence, who has now allied himself with the Taliban, Afghan and NATO officials say.

Like Mr. Shah, several other would-be bombers arrested recently have come from Pakistan or were run by commanders based there, they said.

After a bombing cell of 12 people was picked up in Kabul recently, two of the men continued to receive cellphone calls while in custody, urging them to explode their bombs, the intelligence official said. The calls came from an Afghan commander called Pir Farouq, who lives in the Shamshatoo Afghan refugee camp in Peshawar, a frontier town, and is closely allied with Mr. Hekmatyar.

When Afghan intelligence, at NATO's behest, passed on the cellphone number of Pir Farouq to Pakistani intelligence officers, their informer, a member of the commander's inner circle, was swiftly killed, his body cut into eight pieces and dumped in the camp. NATO officials described the killing to journalists.

Another group of bombers was captured as they were planning attacks on NATO forces in northern Afghanistan. That cell was also connected to Mr. Hekmatyar, but organized by another of his commanders who lives in Quetta, a Pakistani border town, the intelligence official said.

In Mr. Shah's case, he and his companions had all studied at the same religious school, or madrasa, at Masjid-e-Noor, a mosque in Mansehra Colony, a working-class district in northeastern Karachi. Mr. Shah said he studied there for four years, earning the title hafiz, given to one who has memorized the Koran.

The madrasa was run until recently by Maulavi Abdul Shakoor Khairpuri, who, Mr. Shah said, was a member of a banned jihadi group, Harkat-ul-Mujahedeen. Mr. Shah said it was the maulavi who sent them on the suicide mission.

The maulavi had given him a note addressed to a man called only Umar, who was waiting for them when they arrived in Kabul. Bearded, aged 28 or 29, Umar was a Taliban member from Kandahar, Mr. Shah said.

The note directed Umar to give the group explosives and stated that the equivalent of about $1,400 would be given to the families of each bomber after they finished their mission, Mr. Shah said.

Umar handed them a white rice bag. Inside were four khaki vests, with three pockets sewn on each side of the chest where the explosives were placed. "It has wires leading to a remote control and when you press the button it explodes," Mr. Shah said.

"The vests were heavy," he added. "There were a lot of explosives."

Mr. Shah then started looking for a taxi. Someone, apparently an intelligence agent, offered to show him but led him instead to the intelligence office, where he was arrested. The other bombers slipped away with their vests. So did Umar.

The Afghan intelligence official confirmed much of Mr. Shah's story. So did Mr. Shah's father, Ahmed Shah, interviewed last month at his home in a run-down tenement on the east side of Karachi, though he said he did not know where his son had gone after leaving home three weeks before. The gaps and discrepancies in the father's and son's accounts seemed to indicate that neither was telling the full story.

When told why his son was in jail in Kabul, the father grew angry, but showed no surprise. "How can one feel when someone leaves the house without caring for his children — he has two small children," he said, a boy of 4 and a girl of 2.

"We got tired of talking to him; you could not talk to him," the father said. "Such a disobedient child, who does not care about anyone, who does not look after his parents, should go to hell."

Mr. Shah's teacher at the local mosque also contradicted Mr. Shah's account.

Maulavi Khairpuri, interviewed at his home next to the Noor mosque, denied being a member of the banned Harkat-ul-Mujahedeen, as Mr. Shah had said. But he did acknowledge being the local secretary of a pro-Taliban party, Jamiat-ul-Ulama-i-Islam.

The maulavi said he had no idea that Mr. Shah had gone to Afghanistan. He denied sending Mr. Shah on the suicide mission. "He was not brave enough to do that," he said dismissively.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Qwest Case Involving Privilege Protections (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider a case in which Qwest Communications International Inc. had been ordered to produce 220,000 pages of documents to shareholders in a civil securities fraud lawsuit.

Qwest attorneys had argued the documents were protected by attorney-client and work-product privilege.

Many shareholders involved in the lawsuit reached a $450 million class action settlement with Qwest, but claims are pending against former Chief Executive Officer Joseph Nacchio and former Chief Financial Officer Robert Woodruff.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court's decision that the company waived its privilege when it gave the documents to the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department.

The shareholders sued the company in 2001, about a year before the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department opened separate investigations into accounting improprieties that eventually led Qwest to remove billions of dollars in improperly reported revenue from its books.

Based in Denver, Qwest is the primary phone service provider in 14 mostly Western states.

The case is Qwest Communications International Inc. v. New England Health Care Employees Pension Fund, 06-343.

Daimler Audit Sparks Scrutiny As Executives Are Suspended (WSJ)

By STEPHEN POWER And CHRISTOPH RAUWALD

Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Disclosures About Bus Unit Prompt New Questions Tied to Internal Controls

FRANKFURT -- The suspension of several DaimlerChrysler AG executives, following an audit that disclosed what the company called irregularities at its commercial-bus business, is generating fresh scrutiny of the auto maker's internal-control and accounting mechanisms.

DaimlerChrysler, the world's fifth-largest auto maker by vehicle sales, said it detected the irregularities "in the context of a routine investigation of its own business." As a result, the company suspended an unspecified number of executives, effective immediately. A company spokeswoman said the number of employees suspended is in the "single-digit" range.

The spokeswoman declined to describe the nature of the alleged irregularities.

The auto maker also said the head of its bus operations, Wolfgang Diez, had resigned for "personal reasons" but declined to elaborate. Mr. Diez couldn't be reached.

The disclosure marks the second time this year DaimlerChrysler has publicly acknowledged having to take disciplinary action against employees as a result of possible ethical lapses within its business units. In March the company said it had dismissed or suspended several employees after an internal bribery probe found the company made "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe. As previously reported, the U.S. Justice Department is conducting a criminal investigation into the bribery allegations and whether senior executives were aware of the practice, and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is pursuing a parallel civil inquiry.

The DaimlerChrysler spokeswoman said the new actions aren't related to the bribery probe.

Public scrutiny of the company's control and accounting mechanisms has intensified recently as a result of the auto maker's admission on Sept. 15 that it expected its Chrysler unit to post a third-quarter loss of about €1.2 billion ($1.54 billion) -- more than double the amount it had predicted only seven weeks earlier.

The company has acknowledged being overly optimistic in continuing to build Chrysler vehicles even as inventories mounted. It has said that its practices for accounting for unsold inventories are consistent with industry practice and that it is aiming to return to profitability in the fourth quarter with new models like a compact Jeep and a redesigned Chrysler Sebring sedan. Many of the vehicles whose inventories swelled were Ram pickup trucks, Jeep sport-utility vehicles and Dodge minivans, the kinds of light trucks that U.S. auto makers have had trouble selling amid higher gasoline prices.

"They have to improve their controlling mechanisms internally," said Christoph Dolleschal, an analyst with Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein in Frankfurt. "There are already people saying 'how good is your controlling and auditing?' "

A DaimlerChrysler spokeswoman said company officials discovered the alleged irregularities at the bus division "on our own" and said the auto maker has taken steps to improve internal oversight. It established a "corporate compliance operations" department this year that examines its business practices to ensure compliance with anticorruption laws and the company's own ethics rules. The company last year set up a "sales-practices hotline" that employees can call when they have questions and to report "questionable events."

Wynn Resorts' CEO To Gain About $147 Million From Dividend (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Wynn Resorts Ltd. Chairman and Chief Executive Steve Wynn stands to reap about $147 million from the company's decision to issue a one-time special dividend of $6 a share.

Flush with roughly $1.4 billion in cash, Wynn Resorts declared the dividend -- its first since going public in 2002 -- to holders of shares of record as of Nov. 23. The total payout will amount to about $660 million. The company will pay the dividend Dec. 4.

"We have so much excess cash and had the opportunity to return capital to shareholders," Mr. Wynn said in a telephone interview from Macau.

Much of Wynn's cash on hand is a result of a $900 million windfall from the sale of a casino license in Macau to Australia's Publishing & Broadcasting Ltd. this year. Mr. Wynn opened his own casino in the Chinese enclave of Macau in September. The company also operates a namesake casino-resort in Las Vegas. Wynn Resorts shares jumped almost 8% on the news.

Mr. Wynn owned 24.5 million shares of the company, or roughly 24.2%, according to the company's most recent proxy filing. His Japanese partner in Wynn Resorts, Kazuo Okada, owns the same amount through a holding company. Each stands to reap about $147.3 million from the dividend.

For Mr. Wynn, the payday is about the same amount that he was forced to forgo last month when he was involved in a bizarre accident involving valuable art. In a much-publicized incident, Mr. Wynn, an art collector, accidentally tore a hole in the canvas of Pablo Picasso's 1932 painting "Le Rêve," which he was showing off to guests at the Wynn Las Vegas. Unfortunately, Mr. Wynn had agreed to sell the painting for $139 million to investor and art collector Steven Cohen. The sale was subsequently called off.

When asked if there was a correlation between the canceled sale and the dividend, Mr. Wynn said, "There is no connection whatsoever; that's a calculation I never came up with."

Analysts said they hadn't been expecting the dividend. Nonetheless, "the decision does not come as a surprise given Wynn's significant financial flexibility as a result of their sound operations to date," Joe Greff, casino analyst at Bear Stearns in New York, wrote in a research note.

And in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing, Wynn Resorts said the company's stockholder agreement was amended on Nov. 8 to require written consent from either Mr. Wynn or Mr. Okada's company Aruze USA Inc. before either party sells shares.

"We want to make it clear we're one shareholder," Mr. Wynn said. He added, "It creates one shareholder and makes life simple going forward especially if you want to increase your ownership, which both of us would do."

Separately, Wynn said that casino industry icon Jack Binion, whom Mr. Wynn hired in August to help open the new Macau casino, would no longer be involved in day-to-day operations in Macau. Instead, Mr. Binion will become a director of the company's Macau subsidiary. His restricted stock agreements and employment agreement will be terminated Friday. Mr. Binion wasn't able to be reached to comment.

Sticking With One Conviction (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, November 14, 2006

Prosecutors in broadband case agree four can go, but not the fifth

The government has conceded that four of five federal convictions against the former finance chief of Enron's long-defunct broadband unit should be tossed aside because they won't stand up on appeal, according to court papers.

If U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore follows the government recommendation and throws out those counts, Kevin Howard would face a maximum of 10 years in prison rather than 30 — and that's if she upholds the fifth count.

The government said in a filing that a flawed theory presented by prosecutors may have prompted jurors to convict Howard on four counts of conspiracy and wire fraud, so they should be vacated.

Howard's lawyers say the fifth conviction of falsifying books and records also was tainted and should be thrown out. Prosecutors disagree, saying it stands apart from the other counts and should stand.

"It's great news for Kevin," Jim Lavine, one of his attorneys, said Monday of the government's concessions. "It would be even better news if the judge grants it on all five counts."

The Justice Department didn't respond to requests for comment. Gilmore has yet to rule. Howard is slated to be sentenced in February.

Last May, a jury convicted Howard, 44, of the five counts for his role in a deal where Enron sold future profits in a video-on-demand deal to an investor so the energy company could book immediate earnings. Prosecutors said the deal was a sham because Enron promised to repay the investor.

Howard's co-defendant, former in-house accountant Michael Krautz, was acquitted of the same charges.

Stems from August rulingThe government's filing last week stems from an August ruling by a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that threw out most 2004 convictions against four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in another Enron case. In that trial, prosecutors said the Merrill executives deprived Enron of their "honest services" because they participated in a sham deal to help the energy company book bogus earnings.

The appeals panel ruled that the honest services theory didn't apply because the defendants' actions were aligned with corporate goals and didn't rob Enron of property or money. The panel threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions of three Merrill defendants because prosecutors wrongly applied the honest services theory, but upheld perjury and obstruction of justice convictions against one of them.

The panel also threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions against a fourth Merrill defendant for lack of evidence.

The appeals court rejected the government's request that the entire panel hear arguments on the issue. The Justice Department has not said whether it will appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, retry the case or walk away.

But the move by prosecutors in Howard's case appears to have bypassed another potential reversal by conceding before sentencing that most of the convictions should be thrown out.

"They have to maintain their credibility in the court of appeals," said Peter Henning, a law professor at Wayne State University Law School in Detroit. "It doesn't do any good to go in and make an argument that you know is going to be a loser."

He added that Gilmore could toss out the fifth count as well.

"The question will be whether the court views that there's spillover, and whether the books and records conviction was tainted by the prejudice of having honest services in counts one through four," Henning said.

Howard and Krautz were among five former broadband executives whose first trial in 2005 ended with a handful of acquittals. Jurors were hung on dozens of other counts.

Howard and Krautz were the first of the five to be retried. Second trials of the other three are postponed indefinitely pending appeals.

Trading On The Enron Mystique (WSJ)

By Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Enron is dead. Long live Enron.

Five years after the Texas energy-trading giant collapsed, the traders behind some of Enron Corp.'s brashest efforts to carve out new markets are pushing further into those frontiers.

Enron alumni have joined hedge funds and trading operations capitalizing on fast-growing commodity markets that the company once dominated or helped develop, from its stronghold of natural-gas and power trading to experimental futures markets in pollution-emission credits and weather contracts. A few Enron refugees have even joined industrial or consumer-goods firms, where they negotiate contracts to reduce the risks of volatile energy, food and raw-materials prices.

The growth of commodity markets popularized by Enron, and the ability of its veterans to raise money in budding areas, is to some a validation of at least part of the company's model: trading commodities of all kinds.

"In the general population, there is an Enron stigma. In the trading community, there is Enron mystique," says Vince Kaminski, a former quantitative expert at Enron. After Enron's Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing five years ago next month, the sought-after risk guru moved to hedge-fund giant Citadel Group, and then to Citigroup Inc.'s commodities desk. He now teaches prospective energy traders at Rice University.

Before imploding amid accounting-fraud accusations, Enron plowed big sums and talent into markets criticized after its fall as quixotic or a distraction from its core business of transporting and selling energy. It even had investigated whether it could launch movie-box-office futures as a way for studios to manage the risks of a big flop, a former Enron executive who panned the idea recalls.

While most markets besides gas and power weren't big moneymakers for Enron, ex-traders today are piggybacking on the company's early investments in everything from pulp-and-paper products to coal trading. And they are finding their background a selling point, much as the collapse and bankruptcy of junk-bond pioneer Drexel Burnham Lambert launched dozens of careers elsewhere in the 1990s.

"Employers look at having worked at Enron as a risk-management experience, and they think people might have learned from the Enron mistake and those traders might have become better," says Michael Karp, chief executive of Options Group, an executive-search firm that works for many banks and hedge funds. The traders' renaissance comes as some Enron executives from other areas of the company have forfeited assets and begun serving prison terms. Even Enron trading veterans whose reputations were tarnished by criminal and civil probes are making inroads.

Former high-ranking executive Lou Pai, who oversaw Enron's efforts to push into a number of new trading markets, has put some of his Enron-related earnings to work as a silent backer of a Houston-area firm prominent in brokering pollution-emission credits, Element Markets LLC, court documents show.

Mr. Pai left Enron before its troubles came to light, selling hundreds of millions of dollars of stock to meet a divorce settlement, according to interviews and legal records and proceedings. He still faces civil litigation and potential regulatory scrutiny for his role in Enron's financial management, lawyers following Enron matters say.

His affiliation with Element Markets emerged after he attempted this spring to buy a portfolio of emissions credits from an Enron unit operating in bankruptcy protection. Officials of the Enron estate overseeing the sale alleged that Mr. Pai failed to disclose his identity as a former company insider in an auction. They said selling to a former insider posed a conflict and sold to another buyer.

Mr. Pai nonetheless landed the assets; he repurchased them from the winning bidder without Enron's knowledge, according to a consultant advising the Enron estate. Now Mr. Pai is working to break into trading carbon-dioxide emissions, several Enron veterans familiar with his plans say. Mr. Pai didn't return calls to his home or office.

David Delainey, a former high-ranking trading executive, pleaded guilty to insider trading in connection with Enron's collapse. Nevertheless, Louis Dreyfus Energy Services, an arm of privately owned global commodity merchant Louis Dreyfus, hired him to oversee a trading operation in Calgary, Alberta. Mr. Delainey was sentenced last month by a federal judge in Houston to 2½ years in prison. He didn't respond to interview requests before his sentencing.

Citigroup snapped up Stuart Staley, a successful coal trader at Enron. Mr. Staley, 40 years old, now runs the gas- and power-trading operations of Citigroup from Houston, where traders he sought to hire already resided or wanted to return. Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. and Bear Stearns Cos. are building energy-trading operations in Houston, among other cities, with former Enron traders. Barclays PLC's Barclays Capital unit and Deutsche Bank AG employ former high-level Enron traders.

Constellation Energy Group Inc., a large energy merchant, is ramping up its trading of coal and emissions credits in the U.S. and Europe with former Enron traders. Tyson Foods Inc., the meat and poultry producer, hired an Enron trader to run its commodity-trading and risk-management operations.

Nowhere is the Enron "mystique" stronger than with 32-year-old trader John Arnold, who founded hedge fund Centaurus Energy LP in Houston with $8 million a few years ago and employs other Enron alumni. The firm now has an estimated $3 billion in assets and would be larger if Mr. Arnold hadn't returned many investors' cash and winnings to keep his fund from growing unwieldy, investors and traders say.

Primarily a natural-gas trader, Mr. Arnold did well last month in volatile markets even as rival Brian Hunter at Amaranth Advisors LLC suffered multibillion-dollar trading losses, commodities players familiar with Centaurus's performance say.

Investors are rushing to back other Enron veterans. A Chicago-based fund of hedge funds has invested in a firm called Top Shelf Capital in Calgary, operated by senior former Enron trader John Lavorato and an Enron colleague, Jonathan McKay. They declined interview requests.

A former colleague of Mr. Hunter at now-liquidating Amaranth, Harry Arora, also was an Enron trader. Mr. Arora founded a new hedge fund, ARCIM Advisors LLC, this summer while Amaranth was still doing well.

Also hanging out a shingle: Jeff Shankman, the former president and chief operating officer of Enron's second-largest trading division. He is launching his energy-focused hedge fund, Trident Asset Management, this week.

Enron "created a fantastic alumni network," says Mr. Shankman, 39. "The thing I regret most at Enron is having to defend my tenure there," when "most of us were hardworking, decent people who did our best for a company we believed in."

Mark Tawney and another Enron alumnus, Bill Windle, were involved in Enron's early efforts to structure weather instruments for energy companies and other firms with payouts based on precipitation and temperature that affect their businesses. They moved on to insurance giant Swiss Re to build up its weather desk and then left to form a weather-derivatives-trading hedge fund in Houston last year. After finding that the capital-intensive transactions worked best with a large financial institution as a credit partner, they returned investors' money and have just launched a weather-risk-management desk in Houston for a unit of RenaissanceRe Holdings Ltd., a Bermuda reinsurer.

Some days, it almost feels like they are still trading for Enron: The Tawney-Windle group bought 10 of Enron's actual trading desks from a used-furniture vendor.

Apple Hires IBM's Rosenberg To Fill General Counsel Vacancy (WSJ)

Apple Computer Inc. said it hired Donald J. Rosenberg from International Business Machines Corp. as senior vice president and general counsel, filling a post vacant since the spring.

Mr. Rosenberg had spent more than 30 years at IBM, most recently as the technology giant's senior vice president and general counsel. Before taking over IBM's legal department in January, Mr. Rosenberg was assistant general counsel for litigation and was responsible for IBM's interaction with government regulatory agencies. He also served as IBM's lead in-house counsel in a number of lawsuits and settlements.

"We're thrilled to welcome such a seasoned professional to our executive team," said Apple Chief Executive Steve Jobs in a press release. "Don has a broad range of experience that includes litigation, securities, intellectual property and antitrust, and he will be responsible for overseeing all legal matters and government affairs for Apple."

Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel, left the Cupertino, Calif., company in May, not long before it announced "irregularities" in options grants from 1997 to 2001.

The appointment comes as Apple faces legal challenges amid problems with past stock-option grants. The company said last month that Mr. Jobs, a tech-industry icon, knew that Apple manipulated some of its stock-option grants, citing the conclusions of an internal probe that found 15 instances of improperly backdated options and raised "serious concerns" about the conduct of two former Apple executives.

Authorities are examining whether companies fabricated the date on which options were granted to executives and other employees -- a practice known as backdating -- to give the options extra value. Backdating can run afoul of securities laws. To date, more than 100 companies are under federal investigation.

Apple said Mr. Rosenberg received a B.S. in Mathematics from the State University of New York at Stony Brook and a J.D. from St. John's University School of Law.

The Options Blood Bath (WP)

IN THE WAKE of the Enron Corp. scandal, we argued vigorously for new rules on corporate governance, but we never took pleasure in the demise of Enron's audit firm, Arthur Andersen LLP, which reduced competition in the over-concentrated accounting business and hurt employees who had done nothing wrong. In the current executive options scandal, likewise, defenestrating senior executives shouldn't be the priority. What matters is that the rules should prevent future abuses.

The latest scandal involves the practice of granting executive options on a day chosen retrospectively for the cheapness of a company's shares. This has the effect of enriching executives at the expense of shareholders: If a company's share price is $100, but a grant of 100,000 options is backdated to a day when the share price was $90, then the executive has been given $1 million. There's nothing wrong with such grants if they are disclosed properly. But frequently they haven't been. So far, more than 160 companies have been embroiled in the backdating scandal. More than 50 senior managers have been ousted, including, most recently, Bruce E. Karatz, chief executive of KB Home, a home-construction company, who will forfeit ill-gotten gains of about $13 million.

This loss of senior talent may be justified if the transgressions are serious. William W. McGuire, the ejected boss of UnitedHealth Group Inc., may have led his insurance firm to spectacular growth, but his greed in amassing $1.1 billion in stock options plus a pension of $5.1 million a year is matched only by the revelation that the board member who chaired the compensation committee had conflicts of interest. Even so, there are reasons to feel queasy about the broader options blood bath. The offenses mostly date from the years between Congress's 1994 obstruction of an accounting rule that would have caused the cost of executive options to be accounted for properly and the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which signaled that Congress had turned serious on accounting honesty. So however regrettable it might be, the fact is that Congress sent a signal of tolerance to which executives responded.

Moreover, there has been little consistency among companies as to what merits an executive's ejection. The board of Apple Computer Inc. appears to have gone lightly on Steve Jobs, chief executive and high-tech icon. If that is acceptable, it's hard to feel certain that other chief executives, some of them with statures approaching that of Mr. Jobs, truly deserved to go.

If the ousting of executives provokes mixed feelings, what of reforms that might prevent abuses? Backdating was partly a way of granting executives "in-the-money" options -- ones that grant the right to buy a share for less than its current value -- without having to report them as an expense. But the accounting rule that Congress obstructed 12 years ago was finally pushed through in the wake of the Enron scandal, so now all executive stock options must be treated as an expense, whether they are in-the-money or not. So one incentive for backdating has already been abolished.

But it's still fair to ask whether the use of executive options should be reined in, if not by regulation then at least by company directors. Because options are opaque, they invite abuses. Why not give managers a stake in their company by granting them restricted stock instead?

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Allows Evidence In Leak Case (NYT/AP)

The New York Times/AP, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (AP) — Classified information will be crucial evidence in the C.I.A. leak trial and the special prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, went too far in his proposal to limit its release, a federal judge ruled Monday.

The defendant in the case, I. Lewis Libby Jr., former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is accused of lying about his conversations with reporters about a Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Wilson. Mr. Libby wants to use classified material at his trial in January to show that he had a lot on his mind and could not remember details of his conversations about Ms. Wilson when questioned by investigators.

Judge Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court said that Mr. Libby had a right to use some classified material at trial in January and that Mr. Fitzgerald's proposed redactions were too restrictive. "He is alleging both that the volume of his work would have impacted his memory and that some of the information presented to him as the vice president's national security adviser was so potentially catastrophic to the well-being of the country that the focus he had to devote to this information also impacted his memory," Judge Walton said.

Judge: Libby May Use Classified Data (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

Classified information will be key evidence in the CIA leak trial and Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald went too far in his proposal to limit its release, a federal judge ruled Monday.

Former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is charged with lying to investigators in the case and wants to present classified material at his trial in January to show jurors that he had a lot on his mind and couldn't remember details about the leak.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said Libby has a right to use some classified material at trial in January. Walton has not said publicly what must be allowed, and both sides are arguing behind closed doors over how the information will be blacked out for jurors.

In a ruling Monday, Walton said Fitzgerald's proposed redactions were too restrictive. The memory argument is a key part of Libby's defense, Walton ruled, and he must be allowed to use classified information to make that case.

"He is alleging both that the volume of his work would have impacted his memory and that some of the information presented to him as the vice president's national security adviser was so potentially catastrophic to the well-being of the country that the focus he had to devote to this information also impacted his memory," Walton said.

Walton said he isn't going to give Libby a free pass to allow all classified information into court. He said the two sides must balance Libby's need to defend himself with the government's need to protect sensitive material — a compromise that he believed could be achieved.

Walton told Fitzgerald to "go back to the drawing board and come forth with a more balanced proposal."

Libby is charged with lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame believes her identity was leaked to the press as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Complete Isolation Urged For Aryan Brotherhood Leaders (MCT)

By Kimberly Edds, The Orange County Register

McClatchy Newspapers, November 14, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - Four Aryan Brotherhood leaders who used an elaborate communication network to order murders and incite race wars to bolster the gang's control in prison should spend the rest of their lives cut off from almost all human contact, federal prosecutors said Monday.

Brotherhood chief Barry "The Baron" Mills, top lieutenant Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham and midlevel leaders Edgar "Snail" Hevle and Christopher Gibson were convicted in July of conspiring from behind bars to order the murders of rival gang members to protect their nationwide extortion, gambling and drug-traffic operation.

All four men, already serving time for other crimes, face life in prison without the possibility of parole.

Mills, Bingham and Hevle appeared in federal court briefly Monday to be sentenced for their role in the conspiracy. Gibson, who is recovering from back surgery, did not appear.

U.S. District Court Judge David O. Carter called the proposed conditions - which would keep the men from seeing or talking to anyone other than their attorney - "tantamount, if not worse, than death."

In court papers filed last week, Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe also asked that the men be banned from having any writing instruments and papers and barred from having books, magazines and other reading materials unless they came directly from the publisher.

"These are horrendous conditions," Carter said. "There is no human contact."

Carter refused to consider the restrictions without the signature of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He also asked for assurances from the U.S. Bureau of Prisons that they are up to the costly task. Sentencing was postponed until Nov. 21.

Just 11 federal inmates are incarcerated under such stringent conditions, Carter said. Among them are Unabomber Ted Kaczynski and Yousef Ramzi - the self-proclaimed mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing - and Hung Thanh Mai, an Asian gang member who executed rookie California Highway Patrolman Don Burt in a Fullerton parking lot and then tried to hire a hit on the trial judge and state prosecutor.

Prosecutors argue the measures are necessary to keep the Aryan leadership from commanding more violence in some of the nation's most violent prisons.

Even with Mills and Bingham housed in the nation's most heavily guarded prison in the nation - the Administrative Maximum Security Facility - in Florence, Co., the white supremacist Aryan Brotherhood has managed to communicate - and order violence, prosecutors said.

Mills, 58, was convicted of ordering the murders of a dozen people, six of which were carried out. Bingham, 59, was found guilty of calling for the death of five people. Two of those were carried out.

Defense attorneys have argued that federal prisons are violent, dangerous places and the four men were just doing what it took to survive. Forbidding access to the outside world is "draconian and cruel," lawyer Mark Fleming said.

Witnesses during the four-month trial painted the Aryan Brotherhood leaders as a ruthless group who directed murders and other violent attacks using notes written in code or with invisible ink made from fruit juice or urine that were passed from inmates to friends, family members and even corrupt prison guards.

Their orders traveled between state and federal prisons hundreds of miles apart, sparking a 1997 violent race war between Aryan and rival gang members inside a Lewisburg, Pa., prison that left two black inmates dead.

Since the indictments were handed down in 2002, the four have posted stellar progress reports, with no behavior violations, Fleming said.

"They were nothing but gentlemen throughout the entire trial."

Judge Says U.S. Attorney General Must Approve Sentencing Request For Aryan Brotherhood Leaders (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ANA, California-A judge postponed the sentencing of four leaders of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang Monday, saying that any request by prosecutors to bar the defendants from receiving visitors, letters or phone calls behind bars must come from the U.S. attorney general himself.

The four men were convicted of murder, conspiracy and racketeering in a case aimed at dismantling the Aryan Brotherhood, a white supremacist organization accused of dealing drugs and spreading terror inside some of the United States' most dangerous prisons.

Prosecutors asked U.S. District Judge David O. Carter to bar the defendants from communicating with anyone but their attorneys. The government also asked that the convicts be prevented from keeping writing implements, paper or previously used reading material in their cells, but federal prosecutor Stephen Wolfe said he would drop that request.

The judge said such restrictions were "horrendous" and had been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. He postponed sentencing until Nov. 21.

Inmates subjected to similar restrictions include convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, Sept. 11 figure Zacarias Moussaoui and Ramzi Yousef, mastermind of the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

"If you're really serious about this ... the attorney general is going to make the specific request of this from the court," Carter said.

Barry "The Baron" Mills, 58, and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, 59, were expected to receive life sentences. Edgar "The Snail" Hevle, 54, and Christopher Overton Gibson, 46, face anywhere from 20 years to life in prison.

Mark Fleming, Mills' lawyer, said the proposed prison conditions are "draconian."

"They're cruel and unusual in my opinion," Fleming said. "It's worse than the death penalty."

Heir To Norfolk Shipyard Gets 17-1/2 Years In Child Porn Case (VP)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-Pilot

Virginian-Pilot, November 14, 2006

NORFOLK - Willoughby Warren Colonna IV, heir to a shipyard worth millions, was sentenced Monday to 17 1/2 years in prison for possessing and sharing child pornography.

A federal court jury convicted Colonna in August on 10 child pornography charges, including advertising on the Internet movies depicting girls, one younger than 5, having sex with an adult.

Colonna, 26, known as Bill or Billy, testified during his trial that he had no idea his computer contained child pornography.

FBI agents, however, told the jury that Colonna admitted the images and movies were his when they raided his parents' Chesapeake home in the summer of 2004.

Family members wept in the courtroom as U.S. District Judge Robert G. Doumar handed down the sentence, which fell at the low end of federally recommended guidelines but above the mandatory minimum sentence of 15 years.

Colonna declined to make a statement at the sentencing hearing.

Colonna's grandfather, however, testified at the hearing that he had hoped his namesake would one day take over the family business, started 131 years ago by the original Willoughby Colonna.

"It's always been my dream to have it continue in the family name," Willoughby Warren Colonna Jr. said.

"I've had numerous opportunities to sell the business," he continued, "but I wouldn't feel right selling the place."

He said his grandson had worked in the shipyard along the Elizabeth River in Norfolk but had left to attend college. At one point, Colonna worked delivering pizzas.

Colonna's father testified that his son never exhibited any sexual attraction toward children.

"He's always been a good boy," said Willoughby Warren Colonna III.

"He's a very conscientious person."

Doumar asked whether he thought it peculiar that his son moved in with one of his former high school teachers when he was 18.

"Did you think that was a little odd?" the judge asked.

"Yes, I did," he answered.

The evidence at trial showed that Colonna had 400 videos on his computer that depicted prepubescent children in sexually explicit scenes, including one child younger than 5.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael C. Moore told the judge that Colonna could have made it easier on himself.

"This could have been a different story had he come in and pled guilty and said, 'I've got a problem and I need help,' " Moore said. "That's not the case here."

Colonna was sentenced under the federal Protect Act of 2003, which toughened child pornography and sexual abuse penalties, including mandatory minimum prison terms of 15 or 20 years for certain offenses.

"He had the promise of a great future," Doumar said in court, "which he did not seem to utilize at all."

"I don't understand any of it," he said.

Study: Way Less Porn On The Web Than You Might Think (MERCN)

By Elise Ackerman

The San Jose Mercury News, November 14, 2006

A confidential analysis of Internet search queries and a random sample of Web pages taken from Google and Microsoft's giant Internet indices showed that only about 1 percent of all Web pages contain sexually explicit material.

The analysis was presented during a federal court hearing last week in Philadelphia in a suit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union against Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and obtained on Monday by the Mercury News.

The ACLU said the analysis, by Philip B. Stark, a professor of statistics at the University of California, Berkeley, did not appear to substantially help the Department of Justice in its effort to prove that criminal penalties are necessary to protect minors from exposure to sexually explicit information on the Internet.

The Justice Department had commissioned the study as part of an effort to resurrect the Children's Online Protection Act, which was signed by President Clinton in 1998, but immediately challenged by the ACLU.

A federal district court in Philadelphia and a federal appeals court found the law to be unconstitutional. In June 2005, the Supreme Court upheld the ban on enforcement of the law but sent the case back to district court for more fact finding regarding Internet filters.

``One of the things we think came out of the government's study is that the chance of running into graphic content on the Web when filters are on is extremely low," said Catherine Crump, staff attorney at the American Civil Liberties Union.

Stark's study found that only 6 percent of all queries returned a sexually explicit Web site, despite the consistant popularity of queries related to sex. It also found that the filters which did the best job blocking sexually explicit content also inadvertently blocked lots of content that was not explicit.

Government witnesses argued that while the percent of sexually explicit Web pages was small, it still amounted to a huge number. ``A lot of sexually explicit material is not blocked by filters," Stark wrote in the conclusion to his study.

Attorneys for the Justice Department were not available for comment on Monday afternoon.

The eight-year-old lawsuit ignited widespread public debate last year after Google objected to a subpoena it had received to turn over billions of Web site addresses and two months of search queries to government attorneys. Google argued in federal court that the request would put both the private queries of Google users and the Mountain View giant's trade secrets at risk.

A federal judge subsequently ordered Google to turn over 50,000 random copies of Web pages from its index, but did not require Google to produce search-engine queries. Microsoft's MSN and Yahoo provided a sample of 1 million Web sites. MSN, Yahoo and AOL also provided a week of search queries.

Seth Finkelstein, a programmer and civil-liberties activist, said Google's stance was ``horribly self-serving."

``There were no privacy implications in the sense that the data was restricted to a very small set of researcher who were under various sets of protective orders," Finkelstein said.

Finkelstein said Stark's findings about the prevalence of pornography on the Internet are similar to other academic studies.

``What we are learning about the Internet is that it reflects life and that the Internet is not -- contrary to what some people might think -- more sexual than people are in general."

Dare Enters Guilty Plea (ALBANYTU)

Real estate investor blamed for Urban League collapse admits to fraud, faces 27 years in prison

ALBANY -- Aaron R. Dare, a real estate investor who was once widely regarded as a visionary and rising star in Albany's minority community, pleaded guilty Monday to felony fraud charges in U.S. District Court as part of a sweeping FBI investigation of his troubled business dealings.

Dare, 37, who was accused of driving the now-defunct Urban League of Northeastern New York into financial ruin in 2001, has been plagued for years with allegations of underhanded business dealings, mismanagement of his rental properties and a series of unpaid debts. He faces up to 27 years in prison.

The FBI investigation blew open last year when federal agents raided the downtown office of Dare and his former business partner, Albany Police Detective Kenneth P. Wilcox, who died in an April car crash while on duty. The Times Union applied last month to have the search warrant unsealed, and the request is still pending before a federal magistrate.

Meanwhile, a federal grand jury is continuing to investigate multiple real estate transactions involving Dare and his business associates, according to a source familiar with the case. Dare avoided indictment Monday when he abruptly pleaded guilty and pledged to cooperate with authorities, including testifying before the grand jury examining the case.

His attorney said he has met numerous times with Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Storch to hammer out his plea and cooperation agreement.

Dare pleaded guilty to three felony charges. The first involved a scam to inflate the price in an $8.5 million real estate deal in 2001 when he purchased three major multiunit properties: The converted Hinckel Brewery near Lincoln Park in Albany; the Pastures Apartments in the Albany's South End; and the Old Franklin School Apartments in Schenectady.

Dare and the seller, Bernard Watkins, were later accused in an unrelated lawsuit of privately negotiating their deal to avoid paying $400,000 to a broker who had been marketing the properties. The outcome of that lawsuit could not be determined late Monday.

In 2004, taxpayers bailed Dare out of his debt-ridden real estate business as the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, which had insured Dare's purchase of the properties, took over the three apartment complexes and paid off the $7.4 million mortgage.

Watkins, who is not identified in Dare's plea agreement, is a target in the ongoing investigation, according to a source close to the case. Watkins could not be reached for comment and it's not clear whether he has retained an attorney.

In a separate charge, Dare pleaded guilty to conspiring with an unnamed business associate to falsely inflate the prices of 31 residential properties that were sold to so-called straw purchasers, including several convicted criminals, according to public records examined by the Times Union over the past year.

The mortgage fraud transactions took place between 2003 and December 2005 and allegedly involved Wilcox, according to a federal law enforcement official and another person familiar with the investigation.

The plea and cooperation agreement signed by Dare states only that a business associate, who is identified in the court papers as a "conspirator," took on the role of recruiting borrowers to obtain mortgages for residential properties that were controlled or owned by Dare and his partner.

Federal prosecutors declined to identify the properties, or the purchasers, in Dare's plea agreement.

Dare personally prepared the purchasers' mortgage applications and often falsely represented their financial backgrounds so that a bank would approve the deal, according to his plea agreement.

"As part of this scheme, the conspirator of defendant Dare would and did obtain cashier's checks in the names of borrowers as purported proof of their access to capital when, in truth and fact, this was not the borrowers' capital and the checks were retained after the closings by the conspirator of defendant Dare," the plea agreement states.

Dare and his partner in the scheme reaped the benefit of selling properties with inflated appraisals to purchasers who often had no means to pay the mortgages.

Mortgage fraud, fueled in part by a hot housing market and low interest rates, has been one of the nation's fastest-growing white-collar crimes, according to a special report last year by the Chicago Tribune.

Over the past several years, Dare and Wilcox jointly operated several limited liability corporations, including title and real estate companies. Through those companies, they bought and sold, or handled closings for, dozens of homes, most of them in Albany's inner-city neighborhoods.

Dare was just 27 when he took over the Urban League, spearheading economic development plans that included building affordable housing, sponsoring the New Covenant Charter School and constructing an office building that the city bought for its public safety headquarters after a finance company that was supposed to occupy it, NFC Corp., went bankrupt and its top official was later convicted of federal fraud charges.

Dare's expansive vision caught the attention of Gov. George Pataki and former Vice President Al Gore, both of whom visited Urban League projects in Arbor Hill.

But all the while, the group was losing millions borrowed from banks and donated by charities. It ended up broke and owing $1.8 million it could not repay.

After the Urban League collapsed, Attorney General Eliot Spitzer cited Dare for misconduct in handling its finances and barred him from leadership roles in New York charities for 10 years.

"I'm disappointed because I've known Aaron since he was a freshman at Albany High School, and I've always liked the young man," Mayor Jerry Jennings said. "It's very unfortunate that he chose to do this."

Albany Police Chief James Tuffey, who took over the department in December, said he was not aware of the federal investigation. However, several departmental sources said it was known by certain police officials that the FBI investigation was unfolding.

Dare's attorney, Arnold Proskin of Loudonville, told U.S. District Court Judge Lawrence E. Kahn that Dare agreed to plead guilty in the face of overwhelming evidence.

"I made my recommendation and he made his decision," Proskin said in court. "Ultimately, it would be a negative result at trial, and Aaron knows this."

DOJ_NMG_0093855

Dare faces a maximum potential penalty of up to 27 years in prison and fines totaling $750,000, plus restitution. Kahn ordered Dare released on recognizance, but under the supervision of U.S. probation authorities, pending his sentencing, which is scheduled for March 6.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, which take into account factors such as a person's criminal history, Dare could face much less than the maximum penalties.

But Kahn, citing those guidelines, warned Dare that "my discretion in sentencing you is somewhat limited."

Outside court, Proskin and Dare both declined to discuss the case.

"The agreement speaks for itself," Proskin said. J. Lyons can be reached at 454-5547 or by e-mail at blyons@timesunion.com.

Guilty Plea In Housing Projects Fraud Case (ALBIZ)

Albany Business Review, November 14, 2006

The former head of the Urban League in Albany, N.Y., pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to three felony fraud charges related to financing agreements for the purchase of multi-family housing projects and other residential properties in Albany and Schenectady, according to federal authorities.

Aaron R. Dare, 37, of Albany, faces 27 years in prison and/or a fine of up to $750,000 and other penalties when he is sentenced March 6, 2007.

Dare pleaded guilty to one count of wire fraud and one count of causing false statements to be made to obtain loans to purchase the Hinckel Brewery Apartments at 201 Park Ave. in Albany, the Olde Franklin School Apartments at 1675 Ave. B in Schenectady and the Historic Pastures Village Apartments in Albany, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Dare also pleaded guilty to conspiring with another person to commit wire fraud as part of a scheme to defraud private mortgage lenders to obtain loans to buy various residential properties in and around Albany.

The pleas were entered before U.S. District Court Judge Lawrence E. Kahn.

The scheme involving the Hinckel Brewery, Olde Franklin School and Historic Pastures took place between late 2000 and August 2002. Dare provided false information to the private mortgage lender, AMI Capital Inc., of Bethesda, Md., and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development concerning the experience, qualifications of himself and his purported investors, according to the Justice Department.

Promissory notes in the amounts of $1.8 million and $700,000 were prepared and executed between Dare's company, Emerge Real Properties LLC, and entities affiliated with the seller that falsely made it appear to AMI and HUD that Dare and/or Emerge had approximately $2.5 million in equity and credit to apply toward the purchase of the properties.

In fact, the promissory notes were false and fraudulent, according to the Justice Department. Dare and his companies did not have the equity and credit to apply toward the purchase of the properties. As part of the scheme, another promissory note was prepared and executed, which was not provided to AMI or HUD, that effectively cancelled out the purported equity reflected in the fraudulent $1.8 million promissory note.

Also, the stated purchase price of the properties was inflated from about $6 million to about $8.5 million to take into account the bogus promissory notes, according to the Justice Department.

AMI loaned Dare's company $7.5 million to buy the three housing projects. The loans were insured by HUD. Shortly after closing on the loans in August 2002, Dare fell behind on payments and eventually defaulted. HUD foreclosed on the properties and sold them, suffering a loss of about $1.9 million.

Former Urban League CEO Admits To Defrauding HUD (NOCOGAZ)

North Country (NY) Gazette, November 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093856

ALBANY---The former chief executive officer and president of the Urban League of Northeastern New York pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to fraud charges, admitting to committing wire fraud and making a false statement in order to obtain loans from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

Aaron R. Dare, 37, could be sentenced to 27 years in federal prison and be fined $750,000 when he is sentenced March 6.

Dare's plea related to financing agreements he made for the purchase of residential properties in Albany and Schenectady. He pleaded guilty to one count of wire fraud and one count of making a false statement in order to obtain loans to purchase the Hinckel Brewery Apartments at 201 Park Ave., Albany; the Olde Franklin School Apartments at 1675 Ave. B in Schenectady and the Historic Pastures Village Apartments between late 2000 and August 2002.

He also admitted to conspiring with another person to commit wire fraud as part of a scheme to defraud private mortgage lenders to obtain loans to buy various residential properties in and around Albany.

The U.S. Justice Department said that Dare prepared and executed promissory notes in the amount of $1.8 million and $700,000 between his company, Emerge Real Properties LLC; the mortgage lender, AMI Capital Inc. of Bethesda, Md., and HUD, to falsely make it appear to AMI and HUD that Dare and/or Emerge had approximately $2.5 million in equity and credit to apply towards purchasing the properties. DOJ said that Dare had neither the equity nor credit.

On the basis of the promissory notes and statements, AMI loaned Dare and his company $7.5 million to buy the three housing properties, the loans being insured by HUD. After the closing on the loans, Dare failed to make payments and defaulted. HUD then foreclosed on the properties and sold them at a loss of about $1.9 million. 11-13-06

4 National Guards Plead Guilty To Wire Fraud (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, CBS 2, Los Angeles, November 14, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES Four National Guard members from the Southland who served together in Iraq pleaded guilty to federal charges for an embezzlement scam that cost the Army more than $340,000 in unauthorized pay, federal authorities said Monday.

Derryl Hollier and Luis Lopez of Los Angeles, Jennifer Anjakos of Chula Vista and Lomeli Chavez of Oceanside each pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy and one count of wire fraud, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Prosecutors say the four were members of the 223rd Finance Detachment, which processes pay for Army National Guard members. They were deployed together to Iraq from March 2004 to February 2005, when they returned to Compton, according to the government.

From March to December last year, an unnamed co-conspirator accessed a Defense Department computer that processed payroll, according to court documents. The co-conspirator entered more than $340,000 in unauthorized pay and entitlements for himself and the defendants, the court papers state.

Hollier, Lopez and Anjakos then kicked back at least $150,000 of the money to the co-conspirator, according to the government.

The four are set to be sentenced Jan. 29, when they face up to five years in prison and a fine of as much as $250,000.

The defendants have agreed to cooperate with the ongoing investigation, according to the Justice Department.

GOP Fundraiser Guilty In Ohio Coin Case (AP-Y)

By John Seewer, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

A former GOP fundraiser was convicted Monday of embezzling from a rare-coin investment fund in a scandal that contributed to the rout of Ohio's Republican Party on Election Day.

Tom Noe, a coin dealer and former Republican fundraiser, was convicted of 29 of the 40 counts against him, including theft, corrupt activity, money laundering, forgery and tampering with records.

The corrupt activity charge was the most serious, carrying a mandatory 10-year prison sentence.

The scandal surrounding the investment became a political liability for the GOP in Tuesday's election. Voters elected Democrats to the governor's office, a U.S. Senate seat and three of four other statewide offices after 12 years of Republican rule.

Noe stood still and stared straight ahead when the verdicts were announced. He nodded when the judge said he would be taken into custody. He did not look at jurors while the judge asked them to confirm their verdicts.

After Noe was taken from the courtroom in handcuffs, his wife, Bernadette, and their three children huddled together and hugged in a front row.

The Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation gave Noe $25 million in 1998, followed by another $25 million in 2001 to invest in rare coins.

Noe, 52, was accused of using some of the money to pay off business loans and finance a lavish lifestyle. Prosecutors did not say whether he used the money to make campaign contributions to Republicans, including President Bush.

Defense attorneys declined to comment after Monday's verdict. During the trial, they insisted Noe had permission to invest the money and that the coin fund produced $7.9 million in profits over seven years.

Separately, Noe pleaded guilty to funneling $45,000 to Bush's re-election campaign and was sentenced in September to two years and three months in federal prison.

Sentencing in the rare-coin case was set for Nov. 20.

Investigations into the coin investment led to ethics charges against Republican Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest to failing to report golf outings and other gifts. Four former Taft aides pleaded no contest to similar charges.

Investigators began looking at the coin investments after The (Toledo) Blade revealed the funds' existence in April 2005. State officials initially defended the investment, saying it earned more than $15 million. But then Noe's attorney told investigators the fund had a possible shortfall of $10 million to $12 million.

Authorities raided Noe's businesses, where they seized coins, several $10,000 bills and collectibles such as a Christmas card signed by Jackie Onassis and Beanie Babies.

Before the investigation began, Noe was a star of the Republican Party and was once a member of state boards that oversee the Ohio Turnpike and Ohio's public universities. He was a top GOP fundraiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans including Bush and Taft in 2004.

Ohio Jury Convicts Ex-GOP Fundraiser (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

CHICAGO, Nov. 13 -- A federal jury in Toledo concluded Monday that former Republican fundraiser and coin dealer Tom Noe swindled the Ohio government in a risky investment scheme that raised doubts about GOP leadership and contributed to last week's virtual Democratic sweep of statewide offices.

Jurors convicted Noe, 52, a former county chairman who helped raise more than $100,000 in 2004 for the Bush-Cheney ticket, of 29 of 40 counts, including theft, corruption and forgery. He faces at least 10 years in prison for stealing from the state workers' compensation fund and trying to hide his actions.

Noe's trial, with its vivid testimony of lined pockets and bogus transactions, made headlines in the three weeks before Election Day. The details -- starting with the very idea of investing $50 million in rare coins -- provided fodder for Democratic advertisements and voter angst.

The damage to the chances of Republicans, who held every statewide office before last week's vote cost them a seat in the U.S. Senate, as well as the governor's chair, was significant even before the 12 jurors and four alternates took their seats in the courtroom.

Along the way, the investigation touched Gov. Bob Taft (R), who pleaded no contest in August 2005 to accepting secret gifts from Noe and others. Members of the governor's staff admitted to borrowing money from Noe or using his Florida home.

Noe pleaded guilty this past May to a charge of illegally funneling $45,000 to President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign. Prosecutors said he arranged for friends, including elected officials, to donate money, then reimbursed them. He was later named one of 19 Ohio "Pioneers," who had raised more than $100,000 for the ticket.

Critics used the charges against Noe, who soon resigned from the Ohio Board of Regents and the Ohio Turnpike Commission, to argue that Republicans had become the party of corruption from Columbus to Washington.

Noe's misdeeds were mentioned in tandem with wrongdoing of Rep. Robert W. Ney (R), who quit the House after pleading guilty to accepting gifts and contributions in return for official actions. Among the benefactors and beneficiaries were lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his clients.

The Toledo coin case involved two chunks of money entrusted to Noe by the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, which gave him $25 million to invest in 1998 and another $25 million in 2001. The idea was to diversify a $15 billion portfolio, but things did not work out.

Evidence from Noe's bookkeeper showed that on the day he received the first $25 million, he paid off a $396,000 bank debt and transferred $1 million to his coin shop. As time went on, investigators said, Noe wrote himself $1.8 million in checks, bought a boat and wrote $1.5 million in checks to contractors and vendors.

He bought only a few coins.

"Tom thought that we could always make up the money and always make it good," testified Timothy LaPointe, Noe's business partner, who said he falsified invoices to trick state auditors and profited nicely.

DOJ_NMG_0093858

"I did it for the money," LaPointe said, "and I did it for Tom."

Noe did not present any witnesses in his defense. His attorney told the jury that his client had done nothing wrong.

Assistant Lucas County prosecutor John Weglian offered a different version, telling jurors in closing arguments on Election Day: "The moment he got control, he began stealing."

Analysis: Missed Red Flags On Israeli Spy (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, Upi Homeland And National Security Editor

United Press International, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (UPI) -- The Navy counter-intelligence officer who garnered a confession from Israeli spy Jonathon Pollard says that U.S. agencies missed a forest of red flags about him and risk repeating the same mistakes today they made more than 20 years ago.

Ron Olive, the investigator who debriefed Pollard in 1985, says in a new book that "The warning indicators and the problems were clear from the beginning of (Pollard's) career" and even before, and that his bizarre behavior should have prevented him from ever working for the U.S. government.

"It's a wake-up call to U.S. intelligence today," he told United Press International, about his account: "Capturing Jonathon Pollard," published by the Naval Institute Press.

The book discloses what Olive says are fresh details about the sensational spy case -- a whirlwind 11-day-long investigation which eventually revealed that Pollard passed 360 cubic feet of "the most classified intelligence material the United States possesses" to his Israeli handlers.

Olive's book reveals that administrative convenience and bureaucratic bungling allowed Pollard to be recruited and promoted despite being "a dreamer, a fantasist," who repeatedly exhibited behavior that should have barred him from working for any U.S. government agency.

Among the red flags that investigators missed when Pollard was being considered for a top secret clearance from the Navy was his prior rejection by the CIA, where Pollard had applied for work in 1978.

Pollard told a CIA polygraph examiner that he had used marijuana 600 times and told nine foreign nationals that he was going to work for the agency. "Not surprisingly, he didn't get the job," Olive told UPI.

But when Defense Department investigators asked the CIA if they had any record of Pollard, they were told no.

"If they had told (background investigators) that Pollard wasn't hired because of drug use, he would never have been in the history books," Olive said, adding that "It was CIA policy at the time" not to disclose the results of pre-employment polygraph tests to other U.S. agencies. He said the policy was based on a misunderstanding of federal privacy law.

Following Pollard's guilty plea, Olive says the CIA agreed to change the policy and share that kind of information during background checks.

"The agency should at least get credit for keeping him out," said one retired CIA counter-intelligence veteran.

Olive also faulted the background investigators, from the Pentagon's Defense Investigative Service, for not even bothering to check whether Pollard had a masters degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University, Boston, as he claimed. In fact Pollard had dropped out and never completed the degree.

"If they had talked to one or two of his roommates" from Stamford University, where he got his first degree, said Olive, they would have come across accounts of his bizarre behavior.

Pollard told acquaintances at Stamford that he worked for the Israeli intelligence service Mossad, and had been made a colonel in an elite Israeli army unit, Olive said.

He added that on one occasion, Pollard had run through the corridors of a university building waving a firearm, shouting "everyone's out to get me."

In the event, Pollard was issued with his clearance via a waiver, said Olive, and was never actually subjected to a proper background check.

Olive said he fears a repetition of that kind of mistake is almost inevitable given the huge numbers of people being recruited to intelligence agencies and contractors to fight the war on terror.

Growing pressure for clearance investigations to be completed on a foreshortened timetable, so that people could begin work, is "a disaster waiting to happen," he said.

Even after Pollard started work for the Navy, Olive pointed out, his bizarre behavior continued, and should have raised serious questions about his reliability.

On one occasion, Olive relates, Pollard excused his lateness and disheveled appearance at a job interview for a naval intelligence post by claiming that his wife had been kidnapped by the Irish Republican Army.

DOJ_NMG_0093859

Another time, he approached senior officials, asking for permission to run a "back-channel" collection effort against South Africa.

Pollard claimed that he knew a South African naval attaché in Washington, which was true, and that his father had been CIA station chief in South Africa -- an easily checkable lie.

"We've got a kook on our hands," said then-Director of Naval Intelligence Adm. Sumner Shapiro in April 1980, after a meeting where Pollard outlined his South African scheme.

Moreover, Olive said, Pollard was in desperate financial straights, "getting eviction notices, borrowing money from friends."

"You can't do that with a clearance," said Olive, noting that one object of the clearance process is to weed out people who might have a financial motive to betray their country.

Despite all this, Olive said Pollard was repeatedly promoted and eventually his clearance, which had been reduced to a "Secret" level because of concerns about his stability, was restored after he repeatedly threatened to sue the Navy.

Olive also recounts how FBI agents interrupted his interrogation of Pollard after he had begun confessing. He had acknowledged spying for Israel, but had not yet begun to reveal details of what he stole. Two agents arrived at the interview room and told Olive that Pollard had to be taken to the magistrate's court for an initial appearance.

"I said, 'Are you crazy? ... This man has waived his Miranda rights, he is confessing to espionage.' They just said it was FBI policy that suspects be taken to court on the day of their arrest and they had to take him."

"If they would have let us (continue to) talk to him ... I was convinced in the next two or three hours, we could have gotten the whole story," said Olive.

An FBI spokesman told UPI that the policy was based on U.S. Supreme Court rulings that arrestees have to be taken before a court within "a reasonable period" of time.

"I've had the same thing happen to me (during an investigation)," said the Bureau's Michael Brooks, "and it's frustrating. But those are the rules."

FBI: Pollard Passed Info To Pakistan And Australia (JERP)

The Jerusalem Post, November 14, 2006

According to new evidence released by the FBI on Monday, Jonathan Pollard not only passed classified information on to Israel, but also to Pakistan and Australia.

In a presentation given by FBI agent Ronald Olive, which was broadcast on Channel 10, it was revealed that Pollard was also involved illegally in arms sales to Taiwan, France, Kenya, Afghanistan, and Argentina.

In his report, Olive made no mention of what type of information Pollard passed to Australia and Pakistan, nor of how it was transferred.

Olive also said the FBI had initially believed Pollard was spying for the Russians, and that they'd had no idea at the time that Israel was involved or that Pollard was even Jewish.

Justices Reinstate California Killer's Death Sentence (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, reversing the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, restored a death sentence Monday for a Central California man who robbed and brutally killed a young woman 25 years ago.

The justices, in a 5-4 decision, concluded that jurors who decided the fate of Fernando Belmontes had weighed all the evidence — good and bad — before condemning him to die for the murder of 19-year old Steacy McConnell in Victor, Calif.

Monday's decision, the first of this term, was the latest of many over the last decade in which the high court's conservative majority clashed with the liberal-leaning appeals court based in San Francisco.

In this case, two sides differed over how jurors would have understood the instructions they were given in California death penalty cases in the early 1980s.

Those instructions were changed in 1983 to tell jurors they could consider "any other aspect of the defendant's character or record" that might call for life in prison, rather than death, for a convicted murderer.

Before that change, jurors were given a long list of factors to consider, including whether the defendant had a mental defect or disturbance, was dominated by another person or was intoxicated at the time of the crime. Finally, jurors were told they could consider "any other circumstance which extenuates the gravity of the crime." That phrase caused considerable confusion. Some judges said it allowed jurors to consider all factors that call for leniency, such as the defendant's conversion to Christianity while in prison. Others said it barred jurors from considering evidence that did not involve the crime.

Belmontes had a long criminal record in March 1981 when he went to McConnell's home, armed with the steel bar of a dumbbell. He clubbed the young woman over the head as many as 20 times, breaking her skull. He emerged from the house covered with blood and carrying her stereo. He and his accomplices later sold it for $100.

Belmontes was arrested and put on trial in San Joaquin County and convicted of burglary and murder. During the sentencing hearing, prosecutors described his violent crimes, including a recent beating of his pregnant girlfriend. A defense lawyer described Belmontes' impoverished and troubled childhood and his embrace of Christianity while behind bars.

After hearing its instructions, the jury unanimously sentenced Belmontes to die. The California courts upheld his sentence, as did a federal judge in Sacramento.

But when his appeal eventually reached the 9th Circuit in 2003, his death sentence was reversed in a 2-1 ruling.

Judges Stephen Reinhardt and Richard Paez, both of Los Angeles, concluded there was a "reasonable probability" that jurors would have spared Belmontes had they been free to consider evidence of his "future conduct" behind bars. Reinhardt believed the instructions incorrectly told jurors to look back only at the crime and not at evidence that showed Belmontes "would adapt well to prison."

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer appealed the case to the Supreme Court, which last year overturned Reinhardt's opinion in a brief order. The high court said the case should be reconsidered in light of its ruling in another case that same year, in which it had reversed the 9th Circuit and restored a death sentence for an Orange County murderer who had become a Christian while incarcerated.

Undaunted, Reinhardt and Paez reaffirmed their original ruling in favor of Belmontes.

Lockyer appealed again to the Supreme Court. This time, the justices heard arguments in the case and Monday issued a 16-page ruling reversing the 9th Circuit.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said the appeals courts "erred by adopting a narrow, and we conclude, an unrealistic interpretation" of the jury instructions. Two prison chaplains and Belmontes' church sponsors testified to his religious conversion at the sentencing hearing, he noted, after which the judge told jurors to weigh "all the evidence."

Kennedy wrote that it was "improbable" that the jury would hear such testimony and not take it into account.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined Kennedy's opinion in Ayers vs. Belmontes.

The four dissenters said "the natural reading" of the instructions given to the jurors wrongly barred them from considering evidence that did not involve the crime. By this reading, good conduct behind bars could not "extenuate the gravity of the crime" and therefore did not count.

"The incremental value to California of carrying out a death sentence at this late date is far outweighed by the interest in maintaining confidence in the fairness of any proceeding that results in the state's decision to take the life of one of its citizens," said Justice John Paul Stevens. Joining him in dissent were Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

A pro-law enforcement group in Sacramento welcomed the ruling. "This well-deserved sentence should have been executed many years ago," said Kent Scheidegger of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation. "Claims such as this one, having nothing to do with actual guilt or innocence, should only be reviewed once, not litigated over and over for decades."

But a lawyer for Belmontes, now 44, said the case is not over yet.

"This is not the end of the road," said Eric Multhaup, a defense lawyer from Mill Valley, Calif. "This is an unwelcome setback, but there are other issues that the 9th Circuit did not address," he said, including claims that his trial lawyer was "ineffective."

Supreme Court Upholds Death Sentence In California Case (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

The Supreme Court's first decision of its young term was a swift but divided opinion upholding the death penalty for a California man who killed a young woman during a burglary more than 25 years ago.

Yesterday's 5 to 4 decision was the second time the fate of Fernando Belmontes reached the Supreme Court, and once again the justices sent it back to the California-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, saying the appeals court had misinterpreted the high court's rulings in overturning Belmontes's death sentence.

The court heard arguments in the case on Oct. 3, its first day hearing cases. The court's initial decisions in a term often are ones easily reached, and while yesterday's vote could not have been closer, it reflected a common split between conservatives and liberals on the court.

After Belmontes was convicted of bludgeoning to death 19-year-old Steacy McConnell with a dumbbell bar, he and his attorneys presented evidence at the sentencing phase about his troubled childhood and also his conversion to Christianity. They offered what is known as "forward-looking" mitigating evidence, arguing that if given a life sentence, he could lead a productive existence in the structured atmosphere of a prison and perhaps even help others.

But his attorneys said the trial judge misled and confused jurors by not specifically instructing them that they could consider such evidence. Instead, the judge, after listing specific mitigating factors, issued a more generic direction to consider any other circumstance that "extenuates the gravity of the crime even though it is not a legal excuse for the crime."

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the majority, said the judge's directions were adequate.

"It is improbable the jurors believed that the parties were engaging in an exercise in futility when respondent presented (and both counsel later discussed) his mitigating evidence in open court," he wrote.

He noted in the opinion, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., that it was the third time the court has upheld the specific instructions. Scalia, joined by Thomas, also issued a concurring opinion that said an additional Supreme Court decision, which Kennedy said he did not need to rely on, made this "an easy case."

But Justice John Paul Stevens said the trial judge's decision not to expressly instruct jurors to consider the mitigating evidence resulted in a confusion that "pervaded every aspect of respondent's sentencing hearing."

He wrote: "I simply cannot believe that the jurors took it upon themselves to consider testimony they were all but told they were forbidden from considering." Stevens was joined in the dissent by Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg, David H. Souter and Stephen G. Breyer.

The case is Ayers v. Belmontes, 05-493.

The court also announced yesterday that it was declining to review two highly publicized cases.

Without comment, justices decided against hearing the appeal of Michael Skakel, the nephew of Ethel Kennedy's who was convicted of beating to death his Greenwich, Conn., neighbor Martha Moxley when the two were teenagers 31 years ago. Skakel is serving a 20-year sentence. His attorneys had argued that the statute of limitations on the crime had passed before he was arrested in January 2000. He was convicted in 2002. The case is Skakel v. Connecticut, 06-52.

The court also declined to review author Lewis Perdue's contention that the blockbuster novel "The Da Vinci Code" is substantially similar to his own book, "Daughter of God." A federal judge had ruled that "Da Vinci" author Dan Brown had not copied the premise of Perdue's book, and an appeals court had upheld the decision. The case is Perdue v. Brown and Random House Inc., 06-213.

Justices Uphold A Death Sentence Twice Overturned (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — The Supreme Court on Monday reinstated a death sentence that a California jury imposed in 1982 and that was twice overturned by the federal appeals court in San Francisco.

Ruling 5 to 4, the justices held that a disputed instruction that the appeals court found had improperly constrained the jury's discretion to consider all the defendant's mitigating evidence in fact gave the jurors adequate advice and had probably not confused them.

The decision was the first of the court's new term, which began on Oct. 3, the day on which this case, Ayers v. Belmontes, No. 05-493, was argued. Usually, the first decision of a term is unanimous, or nearly so, a logical result of the fact that unanimous decisions are easier to produce than those that must await a dissenting opinion.

No one at the court on Monday could remember a term that began with a 5-to-4 decision. But while this decision might, on the surface, suggest that the current court is on the way toward setting a record for internal division, that is not necessarily the case. A more likely explanation is that much of the majority opinion was in fact drafted last spring, before the court agreed to hear California's appeal.

The entry on the court's public docket shows that while the state's appeal was pending the justices discussed it nine times at closed-door conferences. With cases typically being discussed only once or twice, if at all, nine is an unusually high number. It suggests that a group of justices was trying to win majority support for an opinion that would decide the case summarily, without argument or further briefing.

The failure of such an effort typically results in a compromise decision to accept the case for argument, with much of the opinion already having been drafted.

In any event, the dispute among the justices, as disclosed in the opinions issued on Monday, with Justice Anthony M. Kennedy writing for the majority and Justice John Paul Stevens writing for the four dissenters, was one of nuance rather than disagreement on basic principles of death penalty jurisprudence.

The question was whether the jury instruction, which the court had found to be adequate in two earlier decisions involving different defendants, had given the jurors the impression that they could consider only one type of mitigating evidence.

The court's death-penalty precedents require that the jury be able to give open-ended consideration to any mitigating evidence the defense chooses to offer. Except for Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, who do not accept these precedents, there is general agreement on that point; those two justices nonetheless signed the majority opinion on the basis of their agreement with other, more specific precedents at issue in the case.

The defendant in this case, Fernando Belmontes, was convicted of beating a 19-year-old woman to death with a steel bar in the course of burglarizing her home. He wanted to present mitigating evidence not about the circumstances of the crime, but about his record during an earlier incarceration in a juvenile prison.

Mr. Belmontes was a model prisoner there who underwent a religious conversion. He wanted to argue that this record showed that he would be a well-behaved and productive inmate if he was sentenced to life in prison rather than death.

California's death penalty statute lists a number of mitigating factors that a defendant may invoke, concluding with a "catch all" factor that includes "any other circumstance which extenuates the gravity of the crime even though it is not a legal excuse for the crime."

While subsequent California Supreme Court and United States Supreme Court decisions made clear that this factor was more open ended than it appeared to be, permitting evidence that relates to the defendant's character rather than to the crime itself, the question in the case was how Mr. Belmontes's jury understood the factor in its unadorned form.

In overturning his death sentence through a writ of habeas corpus, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found there was a "reasonable probability" that the jury did not realize that it could take into account Mr. Belmontes's evidence of his likely behavior as a prisoner.

Justice Kennedy's majority opinion said the Ninth Circuit was mistaken. He said that various comments by the trial judge "made it clear that the jury was to take a broad view of mitigating evidence."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined the opinion along with Justices Scalia and Thomas.

In dissent, Justice Stevens said the record showed "that confusion pervaded every aspect" of the sentencing hearing, including the catch-all factor. All participants in the hearing were "addled," he added.

Justices Stephen G. Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David H. Souter joined the dissent.

High Court Moves To Reinstate Calif. Man's Death Sentence (LAW/AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

AP, November 14, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday moved to reinstate the death penalty for a California man convicted of murdering a 19-year-old woman during a burglary.

Justices reversed an appeals court ruling that threw out Fernando Belmontes' death sentence because the trial judge misled jurors who were considering whether to give Belmontes the death penalty or life in prison.

The 5-4 decision was the Court's first since starting its new term in October. It reflected an increasingly common division in death penalty cases between the Court's conservative and liberal blocs.

Justice Anthony Kennedy said it was implausible to conclude that jurors failed to take all the evidence into account before settling on a sentence of death.

Belmontes beat Steacy McConnell to death with a dumbbell bar in the burglary of her home in 1981. He was convicted of the crime and sentenced to death, a decision upheld by state courts and a federal judge.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, however, twice commuted the sentence. The second time was after the Supreme Court told it to reconsider Belmontes' sentence under a decision that restored the death penalty in another California murder case.

The appeals court said the trial judge misled jurors about whether they could consider the prospect that Belmontes could live a productive life behind bars based on his good behavior during an earlier commitment to a California correctional facility for youth.

"It was mistaken ... to find a 'reasonable probability' that the jury did not consider respondent's future potential," Kennedy wrote in his majority opinion. Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Samuel Alito, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas joined Kennedy's opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0093863

In his dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens said the majority opinion reaches a "strange conclusion" based upon speculation. "I simply cannot believe that the jurors took it upon themselves to consider testimony they were all but told they were forbidden from considering," Stevens said, also writing for Justices Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David Souter.

Overseer Finds Kickback Plan At University (NYT)

By David W. Chen And Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

TRENTON, Nov. 13 — Nearly a year after avoiding prosecution for Medicaid fraud by consenting to have a federal monitor investigate its finances, the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey is engaging in "illegal activity" that "persists to this day," according to a report from the monitor released on Monday.

The report also accused the university's interim president, Bruce C. Vladeck, who was appointed by Gov. Jon S. Corzine in the spring to restore credibility, of "trying to refute, rebut and bury" information about violations of anti-kickback laws. It was the first time that the federal monitor, Herbert J. Stern, had directly criticized Mr. Vladeck.

The report charged that university officials at "all levels" were "complicit" in concocting an illegal plan to pay 18 cardiologists nearly $6 million, starting in 2002, to refer their patients to the university's hospital, in violation of federal law. Though school officials were warned on Sept. 25 by their own consultant that such practices could be illegal, they did not report it to Mr. Stern, as required under the deferred-prosecution agreement that they signed in December 2005 to avoid criminal charges, according to the report.

The cardiology kickback scheme led to $36 million in illegal Medicare and Medicaid payments that the school may have to repay, along with $43 million in potential fines and penalties, the report said. The doctors who participated in the plan could face lawsuits, the loss of their medical licenses and even federal criminal charges, though one interviewed on Monday denied all the allegations in the report and said he had fulfilled his responsibilities at the university.

For more than a year, the university, which is the state's medical school, has been battered by an onslaught of bad news, both in print and in official investigations, suggesting that it was home to tens of millions of dollars of Medicaid fraud, wasteful spending and no-bid contracts awarded to vendors with ties to elected officials or former university trustees. The United States attorney, Christopher J. Christie, also threatened to prosecute the school.

In his report on Monday, Mr. Stern, a former judge and United States attorney, focused on how the university had been anxious in 2002 and 2003 about the prospect of losing its license to perform heart operations at University Hospital unless its cardiac surgeons conducted such procedures with more regularity.

In the report, Mr. Stern said he was particularly disturbing that Dr. Vladeck, an experienced health administrator, appeared to have misled investigators and downplayed allegations of wrongdoing found in the university consultant's report in September. Rather than being told of the consultant's report, Mr. Stern said, he learned of the cardiology scheme by reading about it in a legal publication about a settlement in a related whistleblower's lawsuit.

When asked about the monitor's report, Anna Farneski, a spokeswoman for the school, issued an unusually long statement by e-mail that was both apologetic and defensive.

"We have made it the clear and unvarying policy of the new administration at U.M.D.N.J. to cooperate with the monitor's office in full compliance with both the letter and the spirit of the deferred-prosecution agreement, and in that regard, we were particularly dismayed by the monitor's assertion that we had not been in compliance relative to this issue," she said in the statement.

In discussing the whistleblower's settlement, Ms. Farneski said that "there was no affirmative effort to conceal the substance." As for the report by the consultant, the accounting and consulting firm J. H. Cohn, Ms. Farneski said it "has serious methodological flaws."

Still, she said that "we are truly apologetic for any misunderstanding or miscommunication between anyone at U.M.D.N.J. and the monitor's office that may have occurred. We are happy to recommend to the board of trustees that it adopt all of the recommendations in the monitor's report to strengthen adherence to the deferred-prosecution agreement."

Mr. Corzine, meanwhile, offered a qualified defense of Dr. Vladeck. "Do I believe that this is a problem, paying people for no-show jobs who refer patients to a hospital?" the governor said when asked about the monitor's report after an event at the State House. "Yes, I think it's absurd and completely without any merit. Do I believe that Bruce Vladeck was authorizing that to continue? No I don't."

Still, Mr. Corzine also summed up the sentiments of many lawmakers on Monday when he put the latest trouble to befall the school in context: "There are enough major breakdowns in control and governance that existed at U.M.D.N.J. pre-2006 that not much would surprise me at this stage."

In the report on Monday, Mr. Stern wrote that school officials, “feverishly bent” on increasing the number of procedures, came up with a plan to hire cardiologists for no-show jobs as clinical associate professors, paying them $150,000 a year or more to do nothing but refer their own patients to the hospital. Many of the cardiologists either had never used the hospital before, the report said, or had complained about its facilities and staff.

Some of these allegations first came to light in an article in The New Jersey Law Journal about a settlement in June between the university and Dr. Rohit Arora, the former chief of the school’s cardiology division. In all, the cardiologists were reported to have received $5.7 million.

But on Monday, one of those cardiologists, Dr. Jasjit S. Walia, said in an interview that the report’s allegations were untrue, and that he remains actively involved in a wide variety of teaching work at the university and was on-call at its hospital 90 days a year.

“I kept my end of the bargain,” said Dr. Walia, himself a graduate of the university. “What’s hurting is our name is being dragged through the mud, and my patients are doubting my abilities. I’m hoping for a good investigation so everything comes out.”

U.S. Attorney Launches UMDNJ Probe (CHCP)

By Jim Walsh, Courier-Post Staff

Cherry Hill Courier Post, November 14, 2006

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said today his office has begun a probe into new allegations of wrongdoing at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey.

A monitor's report released Monday said UMDNJ has illegally paid $5.7 million in referrals to doctors in order to attract patients to its struggling cardiac surgery unit in Newark. The payments began in 2002 and continue to this day, said the monitor, retired federal judge Herbert Stern.

Christie said he was "particularly disturbed" by a finding that a purported cover-up of the payment program by UMDNJ's current management violated terms of a December 2005 deferred-prosecution agreement.

That agreement allowed UMDNJ to avoid federal prosecution for a $4.9 million Medicaid fraud. It also brought oversight by Stern, whose office has founded repeated cases of apparent improprieties at UMDNJ.

In a statement, UMDNJ said it was "moving as quickly as we can" to confirm Stern's new assertions "and to put an immediate stop to any violations we find."

UMDNJ denied any deliberate effort to hide the payments. Instead, it said, attorneys for UMDNJ "clearly erred" in failing to tell the monitor about a $2.2 million settlement of a whistleblower's lawsuit over the payments.

"We are truly apologetic for any misunderstanding or miscommunication," noted the statement. It said UMDNJ's management and trustees also were not told of the settlement.

Christie said his office "will be addressing remediation of that situation (the possible violation of the 2005 agreement) with the monitor and other interested parties in the very near future." He offered no details.

Under terms of the agreement, Stern could choose to prosecute UMDNJ for any federal crimes known to his office if he determines UMDNJ officials "knowingly and materially breached" the 2005 agreement.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine said he continues to support UMDNJ Interim President Bruce C. Vladeck.

"We will let the investigation review of those facts fall where they may," Corzine said. "If it were a policy to continue something that was inappropriate, well then, I change my view on this. But I know Dr. Vladeck as someone who has worked very hard to get control of an institution that, pretty clearly as this whole new revelation would indicate, is pretty well out of control."

Corruption Reported At N.J. Med School (AP)

By Wayne Parry, The Associated Press

AP, November 14, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) — A state-run medical school illegally billed nearly $36 million in Medicare and Medicaid services and has paid $5.7 million to doctors since 2002 for illegal referrals, according to a federal monitor's report released Monday.

Fraud monitor Herbert J. Stern reported that cardiologists were essentially given no-show teaching jobs at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey at salaries of $150,000 or more for referring heart patients to the school.

"Unfortunately, this scheme reached well into all levels of hospital and university central administration who were complicit first in forming and expediting this illegal plan, and later in covering it up," Stern wrote.

University officials paid $2.2 million to settle a whistleblower's lawsuit, but the payout wasn't reported to the monitor or properly authorized by the school, according to the report, first reported Sunday by The Star-Ledger of Newark.

Stern, a former federal prosecutor and judge, also alleged that Bruce Vladeck, the university's interim president, misled investigators during interviews and sought to downplay the kickback allegations.

Anna Farneski, a spokeswoman for UMDNJ, said in a statement that complaints in the whistleblower lawsuit were relayed to the monitor in January. She said that the university's counsel failed to tell the monitor and UMDNJ management about the settlement but that no effort was made to conceal it.

The school is trying to investigate assertions in the monitor's report and end any violations it may find, Farneski said. The school has been working since June to hire an outside consultant to review physician compensation and other matters, she said.

Gov. Jon Corzine expressed confidence in Vladeck.

"I know Dr. Vladeck is someone who has worked very hard to get control of an institution that pretty clearly, as this whole new revelation would indicate, was out of control," Corzine said.

The school signed an agreement with federal prosecutors last December when it was charged with Medicaid fraud involving double-billing of nearly $5 million worth of procedures. The deal included appointing Stern to look into possible Medicare and Medicaid fraud.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie said he was disturbed by Stern's conclusions and planned to meet with him soon. Christie declined further comment.

The school has five regional campuses and more than 4,500 students, about 11,000 full-time faculty and staff, and an annual budget of $1.6 billion.

UMDNJ Accused Of Paying Kickbacks (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 14, 2006

Another scandal has gripped the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey, this one, according to accusations in a federal report, involving a kickback scheme with a group of cardiologists.

Perhaps more important, the university has been accused of covering up the scheme, which would violate an earlier agreement with the U.S. Attorney that allowed UMDNJ to avoid prosecution for Medicaid fraud.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said he was "particularly disturbed" that the agreement had been broken, though he did not say what action he would take against the university.

"We will be addressing remediation of that situation... in the very near future," he said.

UMDNJ entered into a deferred prosecution agreement last December, in part, because a conviction for Medicaid fraud could have forced the closure of its teaching hospital, University Hospital in Newark. UMDNJ has five campuses, including the School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford, Camden County, and a $1.6 billion budget.

A federal monitor, appointed by Christie, has been investigating a raft of problems at the university. Several other criminal probes have been launched, including one exploring whether the osteopathic school gave a no-show job to State Sen. Wayne Bryant (D., Camden) in exchange for his political influence in obtaining money.

The allegations of the kickback scheme, released yesterday in a report from the monitor, represented the first time that current UMDNJ leadership had been accused of wrongdoing.

The monitor, retired U.S. District Judge Herbert J. Stern, said the kickback scheme has continued to this day, and he accused UMDNJ's interim president, Bruce Vladeck, of misleading investigators and trying to "bury" a consultant's report that warned that the school was breaking the law.

Vladeck, a national health-care policy expert, was hired in March to help clean up the university. He did not comment yesterday, but Anna Farneski, a spokeswoman for UMDNJ, said it was Vladeck's "clear and unvarying policy" to comply with the monitor's office.

She said UMDNJ was concerned about "the persistence of any illegal or inappropriate activities at UMDNJ," but she described any problems between the university and the monitor as a "misunderstanding or miscommunication."

The university was "moving as quickly as we can to attempt to validate the assertions in this report and to put an immediate stop to any violations we find," Farneski said.

Asked about the scandal yesterday, Gov. Corzine also backed Vladeck.

"I know Dr. Vladeck is someone who has worked very hard to get control of an institution that pretty clearly, as this whole new revelation would indicate, was out of control," Corzine said.

Christie, however, declared that UMDNJ's leadership had failed "to get a handle on the problems that beset that organization."

DOJ_NMG_0093866

The kickbacks began when the state threatened in 2002 to take away UMDNJ's license to perform cardiac surgery because the school was performing too few operations to remain proficient, according to the monitor's report.

The school then came up with a plan that eventually hired 18 cardiologists and paid them as much as $180,000 each, purportedly for part-time professorships. Instead, the monitor alleged, the money was paid as a kickback for patient referrals.

The plan "was nothing more than a poorly disguised cover-up of knowing and willful violations of federal law," Stern said.

The monitor has not looked into the quality of care given to the patients who were referred to UMDNJ for cardiac procedures.

The state Division of Consumer Affairs, the agency that licenses physicians, did not respond late yesterday afternoon to a question about the status of the 18 doctors accused in the monitor's report.

Under the agreement with the U.S. Attorney, UMDNJ was obligated to tell the monitor about any whistleblowers. The university had been sued in 2003 by Rohit Arora, UMDNJ's former chief of the Division of Cardiology, who said he was forced out after he objected to the university's plan to boost cardiac surgeries by paying physicians based on referrals.

UMDNJ did not tell the monitor's office about the lawsuit, which predated the investigation, Stern said, then settled with Arora for $2.2 million in June, also without notifying his office. The monitor's staff learned of the settlement after reading about it in the New Jersey Law Journal.

Vladeck told the monitor that he was unaware of the settlement with Arora, and he told Corzine earlier this month that he was unaware of any legal problems that the school faced from anti-kickback laws.

Farneski said that Stern's office was told in January about Arora's lawsuit, and she blamed UMDNJ's lawyer for not reporting the settlement to Stern, Vladeck and UMDNJ's board.

"There was no affirmative effort to conceal the substance of the settlement," she said.

Troubles at UMDNJ

Dec. 21, 2005: The University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey enters into a deferred prosecution agreement with the U.S. Attorney to avoid facing Medicaid-fraud charges. Retired U.S. District Judge Herbert J. Stern is subsequently appointed to monitor the university's finances.

January 2006:State Sen. Wayne Bryant (D., Camden) resigns from a $38,000-a-year job that the university created for him in 2003. In 2005, Bryant, then chair of the Senate Budget and Appropriations Committee, had steered a last-minute $2.7 million grant to the School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford, Camden County.

February 2006:Gov. Corzine recommends Bruce Vladeck, a national health policy expert, to become UMDNJ's interim president, replacing John Petillo, who resigned after UMDNJ entered the deferred prosecution agreement.

April 3, 2006: Stern releases his first quarterly report, announcing that 14 separate investigations had been launched into allegations of undue political influence, financial irregularities and other problems. Two top administrators, including the dean of the osteopathic school, resigned days before the report was released.

May 17, 2006: FBI agents raid the osteopathic school after a tipster said that Warren Wallace, an associate dean and Gloucester County freeholder, was shredding documents related to a federal investigation.

June 5, 2006: A monitor's report says Wallace had manipulated the school's petty cash system and steered a no-bid contract to a friend. Wallace had been fired the week before the report was released.

Sept. 18, 2006:The monitor finds that Bryant was given a no-show job at the osteopathic school and was paid his salary "to lobby himself." Bryant defended his work at the school, but stepped down from the budget committee the following week under pressure from fellow Democrats. A federal criminal probe into his dealings has been expanded since then.

Goya Painting Stolen While On Way To Guggenheim Exhibition (NYT)

By Felicia R. Lee

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

A painting by Goya was stolen on its way from the collection of the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio to a major exhibition that opens on Friday at the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum, the two institutions announced yesterday.

The museums said in a statement that the 1778 painting, “Children With a Cart,” was stolen in the vicinity of Scranton, Pa., while in the care of a professional art transporter. They said the theft was discovered last week but refused to provide additional details on the crime. Officials at both museums said the F.B.I. was investigating the case and had warned them that releasing additional information might jeopardize the inquiry.

The painting was to be included in “Spanish Painting From El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth and History,” a sprawling exhibition of some 135 paintings by Spanish masters.

The two museums said the painting would be “virtually impossible to sell and therefore has no value on the open market.” While art that belongs to major museums is easily identified as stolen, the statement seemed intended in part to discourage any attempt at a clandestine sale.

The painting was insured for only $1 million, the museums said. The insurer is offering a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of the painting, they added. Their statement urged people with information about the theft to contact the Philadelphia division of the F.B.I. at (215) 418-4000.

“We’re hoping that we’re going to get a number of tips,” Jerri Williams, a spokeswoman for the Philadelphia F.B.I. division, said. “To vet the tips, we’ve decided to release as few details as possible. If that doesn’t provide fruitful information, of course, we’ll provide more details.”

The work, an oil on canvas measuring nearly five feet high and three feet wide, is a tapestry cartoon — an image that Goya painted for a factory that manufactured tapestries for the Spanish royal court.

The catalog entry for “Children With a Cart” says that Goya conceived the work for the bedroom of the Prince of Asturias. It depicts children at play, two of them inside a cart and another dressed in Dutch style, playing drums, while a fourth plays the trumpet.

A Goya Is Stolen En Route To N.Y. Museum Show (NYS)

By Bradley Hope, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 14, 2006

A Francisco de Goya y Lucientes oil painting worth more than $1 million was stolen last week on its way to New York from Ohio for a Spanish painting exhibition scheduled to open Friday, museum and FBI officials said last night.

The painting, "Children With a Cart" (1778), disappeared as it was being transported through Scranton, Pa., from the Toledo Museum of Art by a professional art transport company, museum officials said.

It was scheduled to hang in the "Spanish Painting From El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth, and History" exhibition at the Solomon R. Guggenheim museum starting November 17.

The painting was insured for $1 million, and the insurance company has put up a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the painting.

A joint statement from the Guggenheim and Toledo Museum of Art said the painting "would be virtually impossible to sell and therefore has no value on the open market."

A spokeswoman for the Philadelphia FBI office, Gerri Williams, said the details of how the painting was stolen, and when, wouldn't be released until later this week. FBI agents want to determine how reliable tips are by the level of detail they include about the theft, she said. If the tips aren't successful, the FBI will release more details, she said.

Investigators try to match hundreds of stolen artifacts with rightful owners

It started in Palmyra with a whale's tooth and a tourism map of antique shops in upstate New York.

It grew into a criminal case so large that the FBI has been called in to help local police comb through hundreds of artifacts stolen from dozens of antique shops, historical societies and other loosely supervised public places in two states.

Three brothers from Orleans County are the main suspects in the string of thefts that police say yielded a wide, sometimes priceless, bounty.

The take included a Civil War-era sword, two Presidential Medals and a Purple Heart. There were antique dolls and statues. Some were big-ticket items, others small and sentimental.

There was even a Bible from the 1700s taken from a church, sold on eBay and now believed to be in Australia.

The Ortiz brothers - Kenneth, Michael and Roy - are accused in this roadshow crime spree. All three were charged with fourth-degree criminal possession of stolen property; Kenneth and Michael remain in Orleans County Jail.

More serious charges are expected, according to investigators from several police agencies.

The Ortiz brothers admitted to hitting 200 to 500 sites during the last 18 months, using a "Sunday Driver" map for tourists that lists 112 antique dealers in New York and northern Pennsylvania, investigators said.

"It's overwhelming'

During the last year and a half, the brothers hit so many sites that even they don't remember where some of the artifacts came from, Orleans County Sheriff's Deputy Meredith Yarid said.

DOJ_NMG_0093868

"It's overwhelming," said Kenneth Strickland, an Orleans County sheriff's investigator.

The magnitude of the case - as well as the fact that the U.S. Postal Service was used to send stolen goods across and out of the country - prompted the Sheriff's Office to ask that it be turned over to the FBI, Strickland said.

The three were charged after investigators recovered 450 items in August from the homes of the brothers and the home of their father in the Town of Ridgeway.

"In most cases, they would go into local mom-and-pop-type antique shops," Strickland said, "and while one or two brothers distracted a clerk, the other would just fill [his] pockets."

Among the items recovered is a Purple Heart with the name "Herbert W. Stanford" that investigators would like to return to its owner.

Police started their investigation in Palmyra near Rochester in July 2005, when they learned that someone had stolen a whale's tooth from the Palmyra Historical Society.

A series of smaller thefts followed, and thefts that preceded it might have been going on for several years, investigators said.

The brothers found easy pickings, Strickland said, because few of the targeted shops had inventory lists or labeling systems. In some cases, the stolen items were not immediately missed, he said.

The case grew as more valuable items were reported missing, including the theft June 29 of two Presidential Medals from the Niagara County Historical Society Museum in Lockport.

Each medal was appraised at $25,000, and donated by the family of Ely S. Parker, a Seneca Indian.

Parker had received the medals from Presidents Rutherford B. Hayes and James A. Garfield for his service in the Civil War, including his preparation of a draft of the war's surrender agreement at Appomattox, Va.

"They were priceless because you can't replace them," said Melissa L. Dunlap, executive director of the Historical Society.

The Ortiz brothers are suspected of taking a display case off the wall and into a men's restroom to remove and pocket the medals, Lockport Police Detective Lt. Richard Podgers said.

Strickland said the medals were sold for about $500. Neither he nor other investigators had estimates of how much the brothers were paid for other stolen goods, but said it was likely pennies on the dollar.

Lockport police were able to recover the medals and other stolen antiques from a dealer who recently moved from Medina to South Carolina.

Trusting a hunch

The antique dealer and others who dealt with the Ortiz brothers also may face charges for knowingly selling stolen goods. "This is more than just three guys," Strickland said. "Antique dealers are supposed to get identification and receipts. They can be charged locally or face federal charges. Three or four are being looked at."

The thefts from historical societies opened up the case. Orleans County sheriff's deputies started working with police in Lockport and Palmyra - as well as in the Town of Evans in Erie County, where war helmets, a Civil War sword and an original Civil War roster were stolen in July.

Medina Police Chief Jose Avila put it all together, Podgers said.

"These guys . . . probably would have kept getting away with it if they hadn't started stealing locally," Avila said.

Kenneth Ortiz, 30, of Medina, was suspected of stealing a vehicle in the Medina Memorial Hospital parking lot June 23, Avila said. Avila said he spent a couple of weeks following him on a hunch that Ortiz might have stolen World War II medals earlier in June from the Lee Wheaton Library in Medina.

Kenneth Ortiz was charged Aug. 12 with grand larceny and accused of stealing a car. Investigators said they then searched his house and found some of the stolen antiques. Avila said he confronted Ortiz about the Medina library medals and found them buried in a swamp.

Arrests of the other brothers - Michael, 35, and Roy, 32, both of Albion - soon followed.

Podgers said he and other Lockport detectives went to the dealer in South Carolina and the dealer turned over everything he had obtained from the brothers, including the medals.

"He says he didn't know they were stolen," Podgers said.

Items still missing

Not all historical societies have been as fortunate as Niagara County's.

The Palmyra Historical Society remains without the whale's tooth. The Evans Historical Society is still trying to recover a World War II helmet, a civil defense helmet, a Civil War-type sword, and Vietnam War-era medals, stolen July 9, said Caryl A. Youngers, president of that organization.

DOJ_NMG_0093869

Evans Police Lt. Samuel DeJohn said that his department was able to recover an original Civil War roster from the dealer in South Carolina but that the dealer told investigators that other items already had been sold at the Madison-Bouckville Antique Show near Syracuse in August. "We're lucky we did get something back out of this mess, but we were lied to [by the South Carolina dealer]," DeJohn said. "Things change hands so quickly that we still don't know where our things are."

New York Daily News, November 14, 2006

Two cops responding to a 911 call in Brooklyn stormed a burning building yesterday and helped evacuate several people before firefighters arrived to douse the blaze, police said.

Officers Mike Lunetta and Yusef Sezen came upon 8747 Bay Parkway in Bensonhurst about 8 a.m. when they saw smoke, went inside and helped evacuate residents, including a 93-year-old woman, police said.

The two officers were treated for smoke inhalation at Coney Island Hospital, officials said.

Mob-trial acquittal

A reputed high-ranking Genovese crime family capo was acquitted yesterday of obstruction-of-justice charges stemming from an FBI probe into a corrupt bus drivers union.

After nine days of deliberations, jurors in Manhattan Federal Court deadlocked on racketeering conspiracy charges involving Ciro Perrone, the 85-year-old owner of the Ozone Park, Queens, Italian eatery Don Peppe.

Prosecutors say they will try Perrone again.

Burned body found

A charred body was found inside a burned-out car in the parking lot of the World's Fair Marina in Queens yesterday, police said.

The body, burned so badly it could not be immediately identified, was discovered about 6 a.m. in the marina's lot at 125-00 Northern Blvd. in Flushing, cops said.Rich Schapiro

Club-shooting suit

A survivor of a Chelsea nightclub bloodbath is suing the bouncer who allegedly shot him and three others in May.

The lawsuit by Yeison Correa, who survived a bullet to the back, also accuses the owners of Opus 22 of doing nothing to stop muscleman Stephen Sakai - despite allegedly knowing he was a menace.

Sakai, who is being held at Rikers Island, is charged with murdering Gustavo Cuadros, 25, and shooting Correa and two pals during the May 23 rampage.

He since has been charged with three other Brooklyn homicides that occurred last year.

Mob Goon Is Sent Away For 20 Yrs. (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, November 14, 2006

Curtis Sliwa brushed away tears yesterday as a judge sentenced a Gambino thug he long wanted to see behind bars to 20 years in prison.

Jurors may have cleared Michael Yannotti in the 1992 point-blank shooting of the radio host - but Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin refused to show the Mafia muscle any mercy as she sent him up the river on an unrelated racketeering count.

Sliwa was shot twice as he tried to dive out the window of a stolen yellow cab whose doors had been rigged shut.

Scheindlin made clear she still believes Yannotti was the triggerman.

"How Mr. Sliwa survived the attack at all is simply a miracle," Scheindlin said.

She said Sliwa, the founder of the city's famed Guardian Angels, "demonstrated superhuman strength and ingenuity to get out of that death car."

After watching crime boss John Gotti Jr. score three mistrials for his alleged role in the shooting, Sliwa said it was the first time he'd felt a measure of justice for the attack he says wrecked his second marriage and left him with intestinal injuries that cause him suffering every day.

"This is not Sicily, this is not Baghdad, this is not Gaza," Sliwa said. "When he shot those bullets into me he attempted to stifle my free speech. ... It's a nightmare ... mentally and physically."

DOJ_NMG_0093870

Yannotti, 43, shook his head in disbelief each time Scheindlin linked him to the shooting. Prosecutors say Gotti sent Yannotti and another wiseguy to abduct Sliwa on June 19, 1992, following Sliwa's relentless on-air attacks on the Gotti clan.

Yannotti, the feds insist, jumped up from the passenger seat of the cab and, shouting, "Take this, you son of a b----," fired two shots from a .38-caliber gun that hit Sliwa in his leg and abdomen.

The 20-year sentence stunned Yannotti's supporters.

"Jesus," one whispered as Yannotti's sobbing sister ran from court.

Jurors at Yannotti's 2005 trial acquitted him of the Sliwa shooting on a vote of seven to five favoring conviction. But prosecutor Victor Hou argued that the judge could factor the shooting into Yannotti's sentence on racketeering charges that included extortion and loansharking counts because of the "ample evidence" of his involvement.

Scheindlin agreed and ignore Yannotti's handwritten plea for mercy.

"My parents are older and I don't have much time," Yannotti, 43, wrote. "I would like them to know their only son turned out all right." He asked that she allow him to restart his life with a wife he married in 1999 and two young daughters he called "the little treasures."

Sliwa vows to press ahead with a lawsuit accusing Junior Gotti of his role in his shooting.

"The guy I still hold responsible for this is John Gotti Jr.," Sliwa said.

Man Found Dead After Standoff (MH)

By Rebecca Dellagloria And David Ovalle

The Miami Herald, November 14, 2006

The word tattooed on his arm described the standoff: Drama.

After holing up inside a South Miami-Dade home for eight hours and spraying officers with fire from an assault rifle, Eusebio Estrada was found dead, apparently of a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

A member of the gang known as TOYS, he was 19.

Barricaded inside the small blue house in Homestead, Estrada kept at bay scores of heavily armed officers, rooftop snipers and military Black Hawk helicopters on loan from the nearby Homestead Air Reserve Base.

"This is about as dangerous as it gets," said Miami-Dade Special Response Team leader Lt. Jim Tietz. ``We were actively being shot at. It doesn't get any worse than that."

The Special Response Team -- aided by the FBI's SWAT team -- tried negotiating, to no avail. Ten negotiators were on hand, but Estrada refused to communicate or surrender from the home at 700 NW Eighth St.

Monday night, the department's homicide unit began piecing together exactly how he died. Miami-Dade police would not confirm that Estrada shot himself, but said their officers had not shot.

The drama started Saturday, when Estrada and Samuel Mendoza, 21, were accused of firing at Florida City police while escaping in a black Chevy Tahoe. One of them hung out the window of the car firing an AK-47 assault rifle, police said.

No officers were hurt. Investigators later discovered the Tahoe abandoned, bullet casings still inside.

A tip brought police to Mendoza's house Monday morning.

Mendoza -- the brother of a man convicted of shooting and partially blinding a Homestead police officer -- was arrested there without incident.

Authorities identified him as the brother of Salvador Mendoza, who was convicted in 2004 and sentenced to life for shooting Homestead Officer Edgard Rivera.

"I guess it runs in the family," said Florida City police Sgt. Barbara Barrett.

About 11 a.m. Monday, Estrada holed up inside the house and began firing at Homestead and Florida City officers and detectives.

Four schools were quickly put on alert. By afternoon, parents choked the streets at Homestead Middle School in a frantic rush to scoop up their children.

Images filmed by television news helicopters captured the drama as it unfolded:

• A woman lumbering toward a van -- pointing back toward the house -- was pulled into the armored van by a police officer.

• After tear gas was shot into the home, a man identified by family as Virgilio Vega, 23, was cuffed through security bars in the back of the home. It was unclear what his role in the standoff was or if he faces charges.

Vega's mother was at the scene, and said Estrada was her son's roommate -- they had gone to South Dade Senior High School together -- and Vega had been caught in the house when the standoff started.

DOJ_NMG_0093871

After the standoff, police admonished the TV news corps for showing live images, including positioning of officers. In the past, the department has frequently asked stations to work "cooperatively" by not airing live footage during standoff situations.

"I can't stress enough how dangerous it is for us to be put on live TV. It's unacceptable," Tietz said.

As for Estrada, he was already known to Miami-Dade's Multi-Agency Gang Task Force.

According to an arrest report in March, an officer from the task force was interviewing Estrada about gang ties when Estrada screamed: ``F--- that s---, n----. I ain't with that gang s--- no more. Why you guys f------ with me?"

He refused to calm down. Officers arrested him for disorderly conduct.

Samuel Mendoza has a lengthier criminal past -- he has logged 12 arrests since 1999. Some resulted in convictions; others were not prosecuted. He was also charged with attempted murder in 2004, but the charge was dropped. On Monday, it was unclear why.

Mendoza's mother told The Miami Herald that she hadn't seen her son for several days until he returned to their Homestead house about 3 a.m. Monday.

"He didn't say nothing," said his mother, who declined to give her first name. 'He just jumped in the shower . . . Then I looked out and my house was surrounded by cops and I said, `Did you do something?' and he said no, and I said 'If you did something you better turn yourself in.' "

Mendoza turned himself in. Estrada did not.

Miami Herald staff writers Erika Beras, Jack Dolan, Scott Hiaasen, Jack Dolan and Susannah A. Nesmith contributed to this report.

Convicted Of Killing A Witness (PHI)

By Julie Shaw

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 14, 2006

The third time was not lucky for Felix Summers.

After two mistrials, the 25-year-old former South Philadelphia drug dealer was found guilty yesterday of first-degree murder in the 1999 shooting death of a woman who was a potential witness against him in another homicide.

A Common Pleas Court jury convicted Summers of killing Charlotte Presley, 39, in her South Philadelphia apartment on March 29, 1999. Because he was 17 when the crime occurred, he will receive an automatic life sentence when formally sentenced on Dec. 13 by Judge Carolyn Engel Temin.

The jury, which received the case yesterday afternoon, deliberated three hours before finding Summers guilty of first-degree murder, retaliation against a witness, and weapons offenses.

Summers showed no emotion in court when his guilty verdicts were read.

As he was led out of the tightly secured courtroom by sheriff's deputies, Summers glanced toward his parents and sister in the gallery, but did not say anything. Outside the courtroom, his family declined to comment.

In two previous presentations before Common Pleas Court Judge John J. Poserina Jr., in March 2005 and February of this year, the case ended in mistrial after juries deadlocked.

Assistant District Attorney Carlos Vega, the prosecutor in all three trials, said yesterday's guilty verdict shows that people who intimidate witnesses by killing them will be punished.

The trial began Wednesday, with the prosecution alleging that Summers and his associates used death threats and other tactics to intimidate witnesses - including Presley - from testifying against him.

Presley had told police two months before she was murdered that she saw Summers pull the trigger in the Jan. 12, 1999, drive-by shooting death of John Niles, 19. Niles was gunned down on South Fifth Street, near Mifflin, close to Presley's residence.

Summers, previously on the FBI's most-wanted list, had been acquitted of Niles' slaying when that case came to trial in 2000 and was also acquitted of another slaying - the August 2001 drive-by shooting death of Veronica Rios, 15.

The prosecution contended in Presley's murder that Summers returned to her neighborhood in the early morning of March 29, 1999, with the aim of killing her so she could not testify against him in Niles' slaying.

One of the prosecution's main witnesses, Sherrie Hewett, Summers' girlfriend in March 1999, testified in this trial that she and another woman, Diana Meirino, were with Summers that morning when they parked outside Presley's apartment building on the 1900 block of South Fifth.

Hewett, now 29, testified that Summers asked her to pick Presley's front-door lock, but that she did not want to. Summers and Meirino then went to Presley's door, while Hewett stayed in a minivan. Vega said that Meirino knocked on Presley's door. When Presley opened it, Summers shot her twice in the head. She died at the scene.

Meirino, 22, was shot and killed in front of her South Fifth Street home in 2001. Summers is not charged in that case.

Janet Meirino, Diana's mother, also testified in this trial, saying that her daughter admitted aiding Summers in Presley's murder, Vega said yesterday.

Summers' defense attorney, Jack McMahon, said yesterday that this was a case of mistaken identity and a scorned girlfriend.

"We're very surprised by the verdict and speed of the verdict," McMahon said.

McMahon argued that Summers was not at Presley's apartment the night of her murder. A defense witness, Hector Fraticelli, who lived on the second-floor of the building where Presley lived, had testified that after he heard gunshots that night, he looked out his window and saw a 6-foot, dark-skinned, skinny person running from the scene, McMahon said.

Summers is heavyset.

KeyBank Vice President Charged With Embezzlement (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) - CLEVELAND-A vice president at KeyBank has been arrested on a charge that he embezzled $29 million (â,¬22.6 million) from the Cleveland-based banking company, the FBI said Monday.

David Francis Verhotz, 56, was arrested Saturday at Cleveland Hopkins International Airport after getting off a flight from Dallas. Verhotz is a senior vice president and director of the international division of KeyBank.

FBI special agent Scott Wilson said the scheme occurred from January 2004 to the present. Verhotz was to make an initial appearance in U.S. District Court on Monday afternoon.

KeyBank is owned by KeyCorp, which has more than 900 branches in 13 states.

Gutierrez Urges China Piracy Crackdown (MBSN)

By Charles Hutzler

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, November 14, 2006

BEIJING - U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez urged Beijing on Tuesday to toughen a crackdown on pirated goods and other copyright infringements, saying failure to do so could fuel an American backlash against trade with China.

Despite Chinese progress in protecting intellectual property rights, Gutierrez said U.S. Customs agents seized more counterfeit goods from China than all other countries combined.

To turn the tide, Gutierrez said China needs to attack the criminal gangs that are behind the manufacture and trade of most pirated goods. He also called on Beijing to amend laws to make it easier to allow criminal prosecution of infringements against intellectual property, or IP, and to step up cooperation with international law enforcement.

"Another victim of widespread IP theft in China is American support for expanding our trade relationship," Gutierrez said in a speech to Chinese and American business executives. "Those who espouse protectionism, those who would like to see protectionist policies put in place as a legitimate economic policy have a loud voice," he said. "They point to the lack of robust IP protection in China as a top reason why we should put protectionist policies in place."

The United States' long-running trade deficit with China is worsening, projected to grow by 12 percent to $228 billion this year. A persisting sore point in relations, the imbalance could become even more tricky for President Bush following the Democrats' recapture of Congress in last week's elections.

Gutierrez, on his fourth trip to China in 18 months, said he would return to Beijing next month with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to talk about a wide array of economic issues.

Widespread theft of intellectual property, as well as protectionist policies and unclear regulations, have long been seen as hampering foreign companies' access to the Chinese market.

To correct the imbalances and curb piracy, Gutierrez said China must open its markets more widely, especially to American entertainment companies. Limits on the number of foreign movies allowed into China has contributed to a market for pirated copies, with digital video discs of Hollywood blockbusters selling for $1 in many Chinese cities.

"The current barriers to entry for legitimate goods in the Chinese market create a haven for pirates," Gutierrez said.

Underscoring the potential benefits to both economies, Gutierrez later toured sets for two American-backed movies at the Beijing Film Studio, one for a Dreamworks Pictures' production of "The Kite-Runner" and the other for a romantic comedy being made by a Warner Bros. Pictures' joint venture.

"You have such great talent in this country, very high skilled people, very creative people, that it's important to protect their work," Gutierrez told Chinese and foreign reporters afterward the tour, as a vice minister in charge of regulating the film industry looked on.

The vice minister, Zhao Shi, defended China's limits on foreign film imports, saying that access was improving.

"The Chinese market is opening up gradually," she said.

China has significantly tightened its lax enforcement of intellectual property rights in recent years in response to U.S. and foreign pressure and to burgeoning domestic computer software and entertainment industries.

Gutierrez credited Chinese advances, noting that Chinese and U.S. law enforcement cooperated in seizing fake Tamiflu, a drug used to fight bird flu, and that Chinese courts have ruled in favor of protecting the trademarks and patents of Pfizer, General Motors, Starbucks and Kodak among other multinationals.

Still, U.S. Customs agents so far this year had seized pirated goods worth $156 million - up from $93 million confiscated last year, he said, adding China was the largest source of these goods.

Gutierrez also called on China to share information on domestic disc makers to make it easier to trace the source of pirated DVDs and compact discs discovered overseas.

Suit Says State Failing Poor With Lack Of Counsel At Bail Hearings (BSUN)

By Greg Garland

The Baltimore Sun, November 14, 2006

Maryland is violating the rights of the poor by failing to provide them with taxpayer-funded lawyers at bail hearings, according to a suit filed on their behalf Monday by a Baltimore law firm.

The class-action suit filed by Venable, LLP targets procedures at the crowded Baltimore Central Booking and Intake Facility but has broader ramifications for jails throughout Maryland, lawyers say.

In Maryland, suspects make initial appearances before appointed district court commissioners who decide whether to set bail, and, if so, how much it should be. No formal legal training is required to become a commissioner.

"This lawsuit breaks new ground because it's the first time a lawyer has argued that the right to counsel extends to the initial appearance," said Douglas L. Colbert, a professor at the University of Maryland School of Law. A clinic he runs at the law school is assisting with the case.

The suit argues that, under the Maryland Public Defender Act, those charged with crimes are entitled to counsel at "all stages" of a criminal proceeding -- including the initial bail hearing. Those who can't afford a lawyer should be represented by a public defender, the lawsuit says. The state should also ensure that private lawyers -- who are sometimes kept out of the hearings because of security or space concerns -- also have access, Colbert said.

Added expense

Criminal suspects who are not represented at such hearings are "less likely to be released on their own recognizance, more likely to have higher and unaffordable bail, and more likely to pay the expense of a bail bondsman's non-refundable fee to regain their freedom," the suit states.

"Prolonged detention of many of the arrestees detained in Central Booking is costly, wasteful and often unnecessary," lawyers argue in the case.

The suit notes that prosecutors dismiss without trial or decline to prosecute 60 to 70 percent of the charges brought against Baltimore City defendants.

While a cost estimate for providing public defenders was not available Monday, Colbert said past studies have shown that the expense would be more than offset by savings from reducing the number of people held in jail unnecessarily.

"With representation from the outset, many people would not be spending unnecessary time in jail and taxpayers would not be spending huge sums for people who should be released pending trial," Colbert said.

Earlier attempts

Colbert has long argued for reforms to the way Maryland handles bail for criminal suspects, but said past attempts to make changes through legislation have been thwarted in the General Assembly by bail bond interests.

William E. Nolan, general counsel to the Maryland Public Defender's Office, said the agency was reviewing the suit Monday and was not prepared to comment.

David W. Weissert, who oversees district court commissioners in Maryland, also said he wanted to review the suit more closely before commenting.

Colbert said he anticipates opposition from the bail bond industry because it profits from the current system.

As an example, he said, the bail for the lead plaintiff in the lawsuit, who was arrested for a misdemeanor drug offense, was set at $25,000. His family had had to pay a bail bondsman a 10-percent non-refundable fee, or $2,500, to secure his release.

"It's excessive and far outside the ballpark of a reasonable bail," Colbert said. "His family paid $2,500 so he could get out of jail and go to work."

Even if individuals accused of a crime eventually are released after a bail review hearing, the suit notes, their detention "may result in missed work, loss of jobs, disruption of family life, or eviction from homes."

The suit says conditions at Central Booking are "overcrowded, harsh, and sometimes dangerous. Without an attorney, plaintiff's requests for needed medical treatment or for transfer to a safer location are much more likely to be ignored."

About 250 to 275 suspects are processed at Central Booking each day, the suit says, and the facility is often at or beyond capacity.

"At times, arrestees may share a small cell meant for a few people with as many as 10 to 15 individuals in extremely cramped quar ters," the suit states.

The suit, which names Chief District Court Judge Ben C. Clyburn and several other court officials as defendants, claims failing to provide lawyers at bail hearings violates provisions of the Maryland and federal constitutions, as well as the Maryland Public Defender Act.

CIVIL LAW:

Yuma Dairy Farmer Fighting Washington (AZREP)

By Scott Wong And Kelly Carr, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, November 14, 2006

Long before he discovered a way to sell milk for far less than his competitors, before he enraged the multibillon-dollar dairy industry so much that Congress passed a law to stop him, Hein Hettinga clipped cow hooves for a living.

It was menial work. But it put him on a career path that, in time, would lead him to found Yuma-based Sarah Farms, one of the largest and most innovative private dairy operations in the country.

Now, 12 years after building his dairy business into a proverbial cash cow, Hettinga finds himself waging war against big-dairy lobbyists, high-profile lawmakers and the federal government.

advertisement

At 64, the Dutch immigrant said he's simply defending his family business, preserving competition in the dairy industry and trying to keep milk prices low for consumers. His critics counter that Hettinga had long exploited a federal loophole that gave him an unfair leg up on his competitors.

Most in the dairy industry fall into two categories: those who produce the raw milk and those who process it into the milk we pour onto our cereal each morning.

Hettinga is different. The self-proclaimed black sheep guides his milk through all stages of production, from his dairy cows to his bottling plants to supermarket shelves. That enables him to cut out the middleman, reduce costs and pass those savings to his customers. And, of course, make a tidy profit.

Because of his producer-distributor status, Hettinga was able to take advantage of a technicality in Depression-era federal regulations. Those rules require milk processors who do business in certain geographic markets to pay into a revenue pool shared among farmers who own the region's dairy cooperative.

Cooperatives help stabilize the dairy market, guaranteeing farmers a place to sell their perishable products at a fixed price. That helps avert price wars and milk dumping.

Some big processors, such as Shamrock Farms, use milk from their own dairies. But they also buy milk from cooperative farmers, meaning they're still subject to federal regulations.

Hettinga bottles only his own milk, which makes him exempt.

When Hettinga began seizing a larger share of the market, the $27billion-a-year dairy industry struck back. This past spring, its most powerful members successfully lobbied Congress to support legislation targeting Sarah Farms.

The Milk Regulatory Equity Act, introduced by Republicans Rep. Devin Nunes of California and Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona, essentially forces the Yuma farm to pay its competitors through the local dairy pool.

Because Hettinga had been trucking milk across the state border to southern California retailers, he also had been exempt from abiding by that state's pricing minimums. That allowed Hettinga to drop his prices below the prices of his competitors and secure lucrative contracts with Costco stores and local distributors.

The legislation sealed off that loophole, subjecting Hettinga to Arizona price floors.

Hettinga, whose farms have captured about 15percent of Arizona's milk market, said it was his success that made him the target of the dairy industry.

DOJ_NMG_0093875

His Yuma plant was referred to multiple times on the House floor during debate of the bill. And Sarah Farms is the only U.S. business that falls within a narrow category of dairy operations targeted by the law: Arizona producer-distributors who turn out more than 3million pounds of milk per month.

"They passed a law to kill one private dairy. Does that make any sense? It's not the way the government should conduct business, to limit competition," Hettinga said recently as he navigated his car on Interstate 8, traveling toward his Yuma plants. "Big business shouldn't be able to influence in this way. They went to the House and the Senate and said, 'This guy has to be stopped.'"

Despite passage of the law, Hettinga isn't backing down.

This summer, he and six other family members gave a total of nearly $30,000 to Jim Pederson's unsuccessful campaign for Kyl's senate seat.

And on Sept. 21, Hettinga and his wife, Ellen, sued the federal government in U.S. District Court, claiming the legislation singles out Sarah Farms and has caused the company considerable financial loss.

Hettinga said his farms and the retailers they supply have absorbed extra costs resulting from the law, estimated at about 15 cents per gallon.

Now it's just a matter of time before he is forced to hike his prices or competitors put him out of business, he said. Either way, Hettinga believes consumers will be paying more for their milk in the future.

A Justice Department spokesman said the agency had no comment about the lawsuit but that it planned to issue a legal response at the end of this month.Andrew House, senior policy adviser for Nunes, said that regulatory issues addressed by the law were thoroughly debated within the industry and Congress.

"We're pretty confident that (Hettinga) won't find much sympathy or relief in the courts," House said.

He and other proponents of the law said it was Hettinga who was disrupting the marketplace, supplying milk at bargain-basement prices to Food City, Sam's Club and Costco stores in Arizona, and undercutting competitors.

Both Costco and Sam's Club sell a 2-gallon carton of 2percent milk for $3.99, up from $3.69 a month ago.

Meanwhile, Fry's Food and Safeway, which buy milk from Arizona's dairy cooperative, sell a single gallon of 2percent milk for as much as $2.99 and $3.79, respectively. Such grocers, however, often offer significant discounts or 2-for-1 specials with a club card.

Several factors determine milk prices. Prices drop during the summer, when milk-guzzling children are absent from school cafeterias. And they rise during the holiday season, when large amounts of butter, egg nog and other dairy products are consumed.

But Hettinga's major competitors in Arizona said the legislation serves to "create a fair and equitable system."

"It levels the playing field for all Arizona dairy farmers," said Sandy Kelly, a spokeswoman for Phoenix-based Shamrock Farms Dairy, the largest family-owned dairy in the Southwest.

While Hettinga benefited from the federal loophole, critics in the dairy industry and Congress said he was received hundreds of thousands of dollars in federal subsidies.

And they scoffed at the notion that Hettinga - who drives a Lincoln Town Car, flies a private plane and owns homes in three states - is simply a small-town farmer battling the big, bad dairy industry.

"(Hettinga) is the epitome of big dairy," said House, whose boss represents the biggest dairy-producing congressional district in the country. "His is a large, conglomerate dairy corporation that has been sucking down federal subsidies."

From 1995 to 2004, Hettinga's farms collected $895,000 in such subsidies - just under $100,000 a year, according to Environmental Working Group, a Washington-based public watchdog. That ranked his farms third among dairy-subsidy recipients across the country.

House, who helped draft the legislation, said it was hypocritical of Hettinga to draw federal subsidies, "but when it comes to abiding by regulations, he doesn't want to do it because it will mean his profit margin will go down."

'I have no choice' Something as simple as the price of milk does matter to families.

Picking up a 2-gallon carton of 2percent milk at a West Valley Costco store one recent afternoon, Daisy Castillo of Surprise said she would be forced to shop for a better deal or shell out more for milk if prices are boosted.

"It's essential to our family," Castillo, 22, said while pushing her 1-year-old daughter in a cart. With the baby, Castillo's family gulps down the $3.99 2-gallon milk carton each week. "I don't think we'd stop buying it (if prices went up). But I'd be upset because I have no choice."

Hettinga supplies milk to almost all Costco, Sam's Club and Food City stores in Arizona.

Costco did not return several phone calls for this story. And Wal-Mart Stores Inc., which owns Sam's Club, said it is company policy not to comment on its relationship with suppliers.

DOJ_NMG_0093876

But Basha's Family of Stores - the parent company of Food City, Basha's Supermarkets and AJ's Fine Foods - said its shoppers have not seen a rise in milk prices because of the new legislation.

Hettinga's road to riches was a long one.

After graduating from a California high school in 1960, Hettinga was faced with a choice. He could take a job driving a truck for a local grocery store or try his fortune trimming cow hooves and castrating bulls.

Hettinga chose the latter.

It paid $2 an hour, a dollar less than the trucking job. But he learned the ins and outs of the dairy industry.

More than a decade later, he bought his own dairy farm in Chino, Calif., where like most other dairymen he shared milk profits in a cooperative.

Twelve years ago, Hettinga decided to buck the system. He built a milk processing plant in Yuma, a place where he could pasteurize and homogenize his raw milk, package it in his own bottles and ship it to stores.

"I wanted to be integrated - to have the right to sell my milk," said Hettinga, who put all of his cows up as collateral to convince banks to loan him money for the $160,000 project. "When I first made this bet, I bet everything."

Hettinga's first customer was a Food City in Phoenix. Today, he supplies about 25million gallons of milk a year to more than 60 Food Cities and almost all the Costcos and Sam's Clubs in Arizona, as well as to distributors in Mexico.

The brazen dairyman raised the stakes when he built a second Yuma processing plant. This one cost $12.5million and today supplies about 700,000gallons of milk each month to Costco stores in southern California, according to a recent media report.

Today, the Sarah Farms empire also includes 16 dairy farms across California, Texas and Arizona, six located on the road between Gila Bend and Yuma.

The road ahead Cruising along I-8 in his town car, Hettinga pulls over a set railroad tracks onto a dirt road that leads to one of his farms, Aztec Dairy in Dateland, 50 miles southwest of Gila Bend.

Here, he will check progress on the farm's feeding machines, vacuum pumps and other equipment, scan the desert for trouble spots, and make sure the cows look healthy. Then he'll make the two-hour journey to his processing plants in Yuma.

Looking after his Sarah Farms - a business he built from the ground up and named after his daughter - is a seven-day a week job. Hettinga, dressed in boots and jeans, his outfit pulled together with a gold belt buckle, jokes that he works half days: 12 hours instead of 24.

What the government is doing, the way it is targeting him, he's sure is wrong. Now, as the legal process unfolds, he continues to defend what he built.

"I got big enough that they can't kill me, but it has financially crippled me," Hettinga said. "It has stopped every independent dairyman of doing their own thing."

Philly, AIDS Patient Settle Suit Over EMT Responders (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - The city settled a lawsuit Monday that accused Philadelphia officials of failing to comply with an earlier settlement over the treatment of AIDS patients.

In September 2004, the Justice Department intervened in a lawsuit filed by an AIDS patient alleging that emergency medical technicians employed by the city refused to give him proper care.

The suit charged that two paramedics failed to help John Gill Smith, then 38, when they responded to a call in February 2001 that Smith was having severe chest pains. Smith's partner told the emergency workers that Smith had AIDS so they would know his health history.

One paramedic left the house with her shirt collar pulled over her face and did not return, while the other shouted at him, "Cover your face, or I'm not going to help you! If you cough on me, I can get AIDS," according to a statement from the AIDS Law Project of Pennsylvania, a nonprofit group that first filed suit over the issue in 1993.

Under the terms of Monday's settlement, pending approval by a federal court, Philadelphia will pay Smith $50,000 in damages and provide city-employed paramedics with ongoing training on infection control and HIV and AIDS transmission.

In the 1993 case, city officials agreed to pay $10,000, issue an apology and retrain workers on proper responses to people with AIDS.

"Anyone who calls 911 needs to feel confident that the emergency personnel understand infection control," said Ronda Goldfein, executive director of the advocacy group. "We hope that today's settlement ensures that all of the city's EMT personnel are properly trained and are not afraid of sick people who need their help."

Wan J. Kim, who heads the Justice Department's civil rights programs, said that vital emergency medical services must be provided in a nondiscriminatory manner to everyone who needs help.

"The Justice Department is committed to ensuring that cities carry out this important function responsibly and in accordance with federal law."

City Settles With AIDS Patient (PHI)

By Joseph A. Slobodzian

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 14, 2006

The City of Philadelphia has agreed to pay $50,000 and conduct mandatory training for emergency medical personnel to settle a 2003 civil-rights suit filed by a former Germantown man with AIDS who said paramedics failed to provide appropriate care after learning he had the immune disorder.

The settlement between the city and John Gill Smith, the AIDS Law Project of Pennsylvania, and the U.S. Justice Department, which joined the case on Smith's behalf, was filed yesterday in federal court in Philadelphia.

Under the agreement, the city denied violating any laws and said it settled to avoid the "expense and inconvenience of further litigation."

In addition to the $50,000 for Smith, the city will provide mandatory semiannual training on HIV/AIDS and infectious diseases for all city paramedics and emergency medical technicians.

For three years, the city will submit for court review documentation showing that the training was provided.

At issue in the suit was a February 2001 incident in which Smith, then 38, called 911 after having severe chest pains. When Smith's partner told paramedics Smith had AIDS, the lawsuit said, one left the house.

The remaining paramedic, the suit said, shouted at Smith: "Cover your face or I'm not going to help you."

The paramedics agreed to take Smith to an emergency room, the lawsuit continues, but would not help him into the ambulance, forcing Smith's partner and another friend to move him.

The case was similar to an AIDS Law Project lawsuit against the city in 1993 on behalf of a Philadelphia student refused care by a city rescue crew when they learned he had AIDS.

That lawsuit resulted in the nation's first settlement involving AIDS and the Americans with Disabilities Act. The settlement, also negotiated with the U.S. Justice Department, resulted in mandatory AIDS education for more than 2,000 Philadelphia firefighters and emergency personnel.

Ronda B. Goldfein, executive director of the AIDS Law Project, said Smith's suit showed the need for continuing training on medical issues involving diseases such as AIDS.

Goldfein said Smith, who no longer lives in the Philadelphia area, "feels a tremendous relief at finally getting this settlement. This was never about money. That was about a very scary thing that happened to [Smith] that [Smith] didn't want to happen to anybody else."

LAPD Officials 'Livid' Over New Arrest Videotape (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

The LAPD on Monday was grappling with another controversial videotaped arrest, this one showing an officer shoving a handcuffed suspect into a patrol car, then leaning in with a can of pepper spray to douse the man's face before shutting the door.

The arrest occurred last year on the Venice boardwalk and was the subject of a lengthy LAPD investigation. But the tape was not revealed publicly until Monday by an attorney in an interview with The Times.

A source familiar with the investigation said top LAPD brass were "livid" after reviewing the incident, which also prompted a prominent police watchdog to call on the department to develop strict rules on when officers can use pepper spray on handcuffed suspects.

The officer who used the pepper spray resigned from the department before the investigation was completed. After reviewing the tape, the city attorney's office dropped charges that the suspect resisted arrest and committed battery on a police officer.

The suspect is identified in police reports as Benjamin Barker, a transient who frequents the Venice beach area.

Barker was arrested after getting into a scuffle with a merchant on the boardwalk. He pleaded guilty to misdemeanor battery on the shopkeeper.

The videotape shows Barker in handcuffs as he is bent over a patrol car. As the officer pushes Barker into the car, Barker can be heard saying, "Why am I going to jail?"

Once Barker is in the back seat, he starts shouting: "I can't breathe! I can't breathe! Don't spray me!"

One officer is heard saying: "He knows what's happening."

Another officer takes a pepper spray canister from his belt, shakes it and leans in to apply it to Barker's face.

The officer closes the doors of the patrol car and steps back. Barker is seen holding his face up to the car window, his features contorted in pain.

The tape has been viewed by several top LAPD officials as well as police watchdogs.

Connie Rice, chairwoman of the Police Commission's Blue Ribbon Rampart Review Panel, said she was troubled by the officer's actions and referred the tape to LAPD officials for investigation.

"I could see no justification for pepper spray," said Rice, who reviewed the tape several times. "It's a very serious use of force and you have to have a serious threat such as someone reaching for your gun. I didn't see any kind of threat from a man who was whining and annoying but not posing a threat."

The tape was also viewed by an independent monitor appointed by the federal court to oversee the LAPD after the Rampart scandal, and the monitor was concerned enough to refer it to LAPD administrators for investigation, according to several department sources who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

The Venice incident comes as the LAPD and FBI have launched investigations into another videotape showing a police officer hitting a suspect in the face several times at the end of a foot chase in Hollywood.

As in the Hollywood case, LAPD investigators focused in part on whether there were differences between what is shown on the Venice videotape and what officers later said in their arrest report.

In the arrest report, the officer described Barker as combative and said pepper spray was used after Barker spit on him once and attempted to spit on him when he was in the patrol car. The video is shot at an angle that makes it difficult to determine whether Barker spit at the officer, but there is no physical assault seen from Barker. The tape shows the officer take the pepper spray out of its holster then raise it toward Barker's face, but the actual spraying is obscured by shadows.

The officer, identified in the police report as Officer Guiterman, resigned well before the investigation was completed, and officials would not say Monday whether his departure was related to the incident.

"The officer is no longer with the department," said Mary Grady, the LAPD's communications director, adding that she would not discuss the results of a personnel investigation into those involved in the incident.

An LAPD source said the officer left the department a few months after the incident for a job out of state. The investigation into the video didn't get underway for a few more months, the source said. The video was shot by a Venice resident who turned it over to Barker's attorney.

Grady said pepper spray can be used when a suspect is deemed to be combative, and in general "spitting at an officer is deemed to be combative."

"Basically, when a suspect is uncooperative and noncompliant and combative, officers are allowed to use the spray to de-escalate a situation," she said.

But Barker's attorney and Rice said using the pepper spray was unwarranted in the case of a handcuffed suspect who did not appear to be resisting an officer's orders.

"It appears that if you … are disrespectful, they will punish you," said his attorney, John Raphling. "He is running his mouth. He is whining and crying. But he is not being aggressive or threatening to them."

In the arrest report, Guiterman said Barker sat in the back of the patrol car but with his feet on the ground outside the car.

"Barker remained rigid and took a deep breath and began to spit at me. I moved my head to the left and avoided the spit," he wrote. "If I had not moved, it would have struck me in the face. The spit landed on my right chest/armpit area."

He said Barker then cursed at him.

Fearing that Barker might spit at him or kick him, he said, he sprayed Barker twice with two one-second bursts of pepper spray.

A sergeant supervising the scene said in the initial police report that the incident had occurred as they stood at the rear door of the car. But the report was later corrected to say it took place inside the car.

For Rice, the incident is more evidence that the LAPD brass needs to tell officers to change what they do in the field.

"The LAPD needs to say 'Don't pepper-spray handcuffed suspects that are subdued just because they are mouthing off,' " Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0093879

Grady, the police spokeswoman, said the LAPD did a thorough investigation of the incident but declined to say whether any officers faced discipline.

The Venice videotape comes five days after another video showing an LAPD officer trying to restrain a suspect in Hollywood made its way to the Internet site YouTube.

The 18-second tape shows an officer punching William Cardenas at least five times as he and his partner try to restrain and handcuff the man, a suspected gang member.

In a jailhouse interview with KABC-TV Channel 7 on Monday, Cardenas insisted that he never resisted arrest and said police used excessive force.

But several witnesses interviewed by the LAPD said Cardenas ran from officers and swung at them before they got him on the ground.

Consumer Oversight Of The LAPD (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

Cellphone cameras and YouTube give the community a voice in the debate over police conduct.

BLUE-RIBBON COMMISSIONS may get more publicity, but it is consumer technology that is setting the pace of police reform. In the Aug. 11 arrest of William Cardenas by two Los Angeles police officers, currently being investigated by the FBI and the Los Angeles Police Department, a bystander used her cellphone camera to capture one officer repeatedly slugging Cardenas in the face as he lay on the ground with both police officers on top of him. Now another arrest video has come to light, this one of an LAPD officer pepper-spraying a handcuffed suspect.

The Cardenas video was first posted on the website of Cop Watch Los Angeles, which collects complaints filed against officers. From there it migrated to YouTube.com, where it has been viewed almost 700,000 times. Finally it found its way to broadcast television.

It is a relatively recent development for police behavior to be subject to such close and instantaneous public scrutiny. The public was once dependent on TV photographers, with their then-bulky equipment, for images of controversial police activity. Then, in 1991, George Holliday was trying out his new video camera when he saw police officers clubbing Rodney King. His tape, replayed countless times on TV, changed history.

Today, any bystander is likely to be reasonably proficient with a cellphone camera and to have the know-how — or at least, a preteen at home with the know-how — to post the images on YouTube. That makes certain subjects, like arrests, more likely to be captured and displayed repeatedly. On YouTube are thousands of other arrest-related videos from around the world, in addition to the Cardenas clip.

That's mostly a good thing. Public confidence in the police requires monitoring outside the regular channels of self-review, and technology has democratized the process. (Of course, it could also be used to subvert it.) The video-viewing blogosphere has become a sophisticated community, famous for ferreting out fakes and identifying nuances. The blog debate on the Cardenas beating is typical in that it includes the usual pro- and anti-police diatribes, but it goes further, spotlighting details of the video. Was the suspect, for example, pinching one of the officers in the thigh, and could that have justified the brutal punches?

The last word on the Cardenas arrest will remain with the LAPD, the FBI and the courts. But the last word on how Los Angeles is policed, which tactics are acceptable and which are beyond the pale, and whether the LAPD's "warrior culture" has been sufficiently channeled belongs to the broader community. Consumer technology has made it possible for more members of that community to take part in the debate.

Councilmen Want Justice Department To Investigate Police Shooting (LCAP)

By Eric Cormier

Lake Charles (LA) American Press, November 14, 2006

Three Lake Charles city councilmen have asked the Justice Department to investigate the Oct. 12 fatal police shooting of Trent Buckins to determine if his civil rights were violated.

In a letter sent to the department's Civil Rights Division, councilmen Marshal Simien (District A), A.B. Franklin (District B) and Rodney Geyen (District C) addressed the conduct of Lake Charles police and community concerns related to the shooting.

On Monday, the American Press obtained a copy of the letter.

DOJ_NMG_0093880

"A number of complaints and recent incidents have resulted in a disconcerting erosion of confidence by African-American residents in the Lake Charles Police Department," the letter reads.

"Many in the community believe the police department's mindset may be the direct result of the current chief's philosophy."

Before the Buckins shooting, "complaints primarily involved allegations of aggressive and disrespectful behavior, bias and racial profiling, particularly of African-American males," the councilmen wrote.

"These various complaints consistently fueled tensions between the police department and the City's economically disadvantaged sector of the African-American community."

The councilmen emphasized that the shooting took place in front of Reynaud Middle School as students were arriving for school.

According to the letter, three Lake Charles police officers "wrestled Mr. Buckins to the ground and turned him on his stomach to be handcuffed. The Caucasian female officer drew her handgun while standing over Mr. Buckins.

"Two shots were fired, and Mr. Buckins lay wounded on his side in a fetal position. One of the teachers from the school across the street yelled 'you didn't have to shoot him!' "

The councilmen say the shooting "could be a smoldering powder keg and, unless an unbiased investigation takes place that would have credibility in the minority community, the situation could deteriorate rapidly regardless of current ongoing findings."

State police are investigating the shooting, but Troop D officials said the final report isn't expected to completed for at least another month.

A number of city officials and residents have met with a representative from the Justice Department's Community Relations Division to talk about the incident.

In their letter, the councilmen said the meetings are necessary, but the recent shooting is a "culmination of a pattern and practice of police misconduct targeted at African-American males.

"It is imperative that your Department investigate this incident. Not only does it have the expertise in these matters, but this would give the investigative process a transparency that is currently lacking given the close relationship between the police department and investigating agency."

Along with questioning the legitimacy of the state police investigation, the councilmen also expressed reservation about the FBI conducting an investigation since Police Chief Don Dixon is a retired FBI agent "with significant ties to the Bureau."

The councilmen asked that the Justice Department devise training, supervision, discipline and complaint recording guidelines for the Police Department.

Justices To Weigh School Diversity (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 14, 2006

LOUISVILLE — Amy Ruth remembers her first drive to the inner city, mostly black neighborhood where her sons were assigned for elementary school under a program designed to make campuses racially diverse.

“When we pulled into the neighborhood” that day last August, says Ruth, who is white, “I have to be honest, I said to my husband, ‘Let's turn around.' ” Wheatley Elementary, 10 miles from Ruth's home, is in a low-income area dotted with empty lots and run-down buildings behind barbed-wire fences.

“Let's give it a try,” Ruth, 29, recalls her husband saying.

Today, Ruth defends Jefferson County's school-assignment program, which ensures that each school's enrollment is at least 15% African-American, but no more than 50%. It's part of a plan to diversify what would be heavily minority and heavily white schools in the district, where 58% of the students are white and 36% are African-American.

“America is made up of all different cultures,” Ruth says. “Why shouldn't the schools be that way?”

In Seattle, Kathleen Brose was in a similar, but less pleasing, situation. Under that school district's diversity plan, her daughter Elisabeth was denied her first choice of a nearby high school in 2000 partly because she is white. “She was separated from friends,” Brose, 49, says. “It's tough being a teenager. There is enough angst already.”

The school districts in Louisville and Seattle are at the heart of a pair of legal disputes, now before the U.S. Supreme Court, that test whether public schools can use race as a factor in determining where students go to school. The cases, to be heard by the court Dec. 4, have drawn national attention because they could affect policies in districts across the country.

The key legal question in the Louisville and Seattle lawsuits — which were filed by parents of white students who weren't allowed to attend the schools of their choice — is whether school-assignment plans that use students' race as a factor violate the Constitution's guarantee of equality.

It's an emotionally charged issue that gives the court its first chance to weigh in on racial policies since Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito joined the nine-member court last term. The new justices are former government lawyers who, early in their careers, showed reluctance toward government race-based policies.

Alito's actions in the cases could be especially significant because he replaced the retired Sandra Day O'Connor, who often joined the court's four-member liberal wing to form a majority in favor of affirmative action policies. In 2003, her vote in a case involving the University of Michigan law school ensured that colleges could consider applicants' race to achieve diversity.

In that case — brought by a white woman rejected by the law school — O'Connor joined liberal Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer in emphasizing the value of colleges producing diverse, well-trained graduates.

The new cases differ from other affirmative action disputes the justices have faced because no individuals are being turned away entirely from an education or a job.

When the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit upheld Seattle's plan last year, Judge Alex Kozinski wrote that the enrollment policy might disappoint some students, "but it carries no racial stigma and says nothing at all about that individual's aptitude. The program does use race as a criterion, but only to ensure that the population of each public school roughly reflects the city's racial composition."

Groups such as Pacific Legal Foundation, representing Seattle parents challenging the city's plan, say any enrollment policy that considers a student's race — even for potential benefits such as diversity — is unconstitutional. The challengers are backed by the Bush administration, which says in a court brief that "the solution to addressing racial imbalance in communities ... is not to adopt race-conscious measures." It says the approach is at odds with the 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education that struck down racial segregation in schools.

The Louisville and Seattle plans differ in their scope and history.

Louisville's Jefferson County system had a history of segregation, and three decades ago was ordered by a federal judge to impose a desegregation plan. In 2000, the order was dissolved after a judge found that the remnants of earlier discrimination had ended. But in 2001 the district established its enrollment plan to make sure schools would continue to be diverse.

Administrators say that unless they ensure integration, the district's schools will mirror the separation of whites and blacks in housing patterns across Jefferson County. "Racial isolation begets racial isolation," says Pat Todd, director of student assignments.

Lower federal courts upheld the program, citing the education benefits of racially integrated schools.

Jefferson County's policy is being challenged by Crystal Meredith, whose son, Joshua McDonald, was assigned to the Whitney Young Elementary, a downtown campus that Meredith says is an hour's drive from her home in morning traffic. Meredith says she wanted Joshua at a school closer to her home and with a more varied curriculum.

"The way they taught [at Whitney Young] was not fit for him," she says. "He was bored." Her lawyer, Teddy Gordon, says race was not a factor in her complaint.

Gordon said in a court brief that Joshua was rejected for his neighborhood school only because he is white. Gordon said the district "denigrates a 5-year-old's self worth and self-esteem by comporting him to be color-coded throughout his educational career."

Seattle's plan seeks a racial balance only in high schools. When a school has too many applicants, "tiebreakers" decide who gets in. One tiebreaker considers students' race to try to achieve diversity.

Brose, president of the parents' group that challenged the policy, says, "How are we ever going to get beyond race if we keep using it?"

Persistent Race Disparities Found (WP/AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

Minorities Still Lag in Income, Education, Census Data Show

Decades after the civil rights movement, racial disparities in income, education and home ownership persist and, by some measurements, are growing.

White households had incomes that were two-thirds higher than those of African Americans and 40 percent higher than those of Hispanics last year, according to data released yesterday by the Census Bureau. White adults were also more likely than black and Hispanic adults to have college degrees and to own their own homes. They were less likely to live in poverty.

"Race is so associated with class in the United States that it may not be direct discrimination, but it still matters indirectly," said Dalton Conley, a sociology professor at New York University and the author of "Being Black, Living in the Red."

"It doesn't mean it's any less powerful just because it's indirect," he said.

Home ownership grew among white middle-class families after World War II when access to credit and government programs made buying houses affordable. Black families were largely left out because of discrimination, and the effects are still being felt, said Lance Freeman, assistant professor of urban planning at Columbia University and the author of "There Goes the 'Hood."

Home ownership creates wealth, which enables families to live in good neighborhoods with good schools. It also helps families finance college, which leads to better-paying jobs, perpetuating the cycle, Freeman said.

"If your parents own their own home they can leave it to you when they pass on or they can use the equity to help you with a down payment on yours," he said.

Three-fourths of white households owned their homes in 2005, compared with 46 percent of black households and 48 percent of Hispanic households. Home ownership is near an all-time high in the United States, but racial gaps have increased in the past 25 years.

Among Hispanics, education, income and home ownership gaps are exacerbated by recent Latin American immigrants. Hispanic immigrants have, on average, lower incomes and education levels than people born in the United States. About 40 percent of Hispanics in the United States are immigrants.

Asian Americans, on average, have higher incomes and education levels than whites. However, they have higher poverty rates and lower home-ownership rates.

The Census Bureau data are from the American Community Survey, the bureau's new annual survey of 3 million households nationwide. The Associated Press compared the figures with census data from 1980, 1990 and 2000.

Among the findings:

Thirty percent of white adults had at least a bachelor's degree in 2005, while 17 percent of black adults and 12 percent of Hispanic adults had degrees. Forty-nine percent of Asian Americans had at least a bachelor's degree in 2005.

The median income for white households was $50,622 last year. It was $30,939 for black households, $36,278 for Hispanic households and $60,367 for Asian households. Hispanic households made about 76 percent as much as white households in 1980. In 2005, it was 72 percent.

Same-Sex Chicanery (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

One reason so many Americans despise politicians is because of the contempt that many politicians have for their fellow Americans. A case in point is the way the Massachusetts legislature used a procedural ruse to deny the voters even a chance to vote on the issue of same-sex marriage.

Recall that in 2003 four of seven Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Justices declared gay marriage a constitutional right. In response, opponents collected 170,000 signatures to support a ballot measure to amend the state constitution to make clear that marriage is between a man and a woman. But to get on the ballot, the amendment must also be voted on by a joint session of the legislature in two consecutive legislative sessions. Under the state constitution, 25% of the legislators must agree to put an amendment on the ballot, provided the proposal has garnered at least 25,000 signatures, which this one easily did.

Last week, the pols denied the voters even that much with a procedural trick that recessed the legislature until just hours before its term expires next January. By the time the lawmakers return, they won't have enough time to vote up or down on the measure, thus dodging a vote on a measure that 170,000 of their constituents decided merited space on the ballot. This leaves intact the judicial same-sex fiat.

"The way I looked at it was that we would kill it with a handgun or a hand grenade," explained Democratic Representative Michael Costello. "It's never been proper to put civil rights on the ballot. So we killed it through procedure, rather than on substance." In the face of such arrogant dismissals of voter preferences, no wonder our cultural debates have become so embittered.

Concrete Price-fixing Trial Begins (INDYSTAR)

The Indianapolis Star, November 14, 2006

A jury was selected today in the trial of two Noblesville ready-mix concrete executives in connection with a broad price-fixing scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0093883

A jury of eight women and four men will begin work this afternoon in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis in the case of Chris A. and Ricky J. Beaver, managers at Beaver Materials Corp. They are the only two executives in the scheme awaiting trial after a guilty plea earlier this month by a third executive in federal court.

The men were indicted April 11 on charges of plotting to fix prices and lying to federal investigators. Their company also was charged.

Investigators say the conspiracy to "suppress or eliminate competition" in the Indianapolis-area concrete market existed from July 2000 through May 2004. The price-fixing scandal became public in June 2005, when federal prosecutors announced a $29.2 million fine against Greenfield-based Irving Materials Inc., the largest fine ever paid by a domestic cartel.

Ready-mix concrete is made on demand and hauled to work sites in cement mixers for public and private projects, such as sidewalks, driveways, bridges and roads.

In pleading guilty earlier this month, John J. Blatzheim, 52, executive vice president of Builder's Concrete & Supply Co., acknowledged he joined the local conspiracy in April 2003.

In exchange, federal prosecutors dismissed a charge of lying to the FBI and antitrust investigators that carried a five-year prison term. Blatzheim faces up to three years in prison, a year of supervised release and a fine of up to $350,000 when Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney sentences him Feb. 9.

House Panel To Query Lucent-Alcatel Deal (AP-YBIZ)

By Christopher S. Rugaber, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

House Panel to Examine Terms of Lucent-Alcatel Deal

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Top executives from Lucent Technologies Inc. and Alcatel are set to testify before a House panel chaired by a lawmaker who questions the national security impact of the French company's acquisition of the former technology arm of Ma Bell.

Lucent chief executive Patricia Russo and Mike Quigley, chief operating officer of Paris-based Alcatel SA, are scheduled to appear Tuesday before the House Armed Services Committee, headed by Duncan Hunter, the outgoing Republican chairman from California.

Hunter, whose San Diego district includes many workers of Qualcomm Inc., a key competitor of Lucent and Alcatel, says he is worried about whether classified work Lucent's Bell Labs performs for the Defense Department will be kept secret when Alcatel completes its takeover of Murray Hill, N.J.-based Lucent.

"I am concerned about potential transfers of technology or sensitive information to other countries with which Alcatel has business dealings, which have included Burma, China, Iran, North Korea, Sudan and Syria," Hunter wrote in an Oct. 26 letter to President Bush.

The hearing is not expected to derail the deal, which has cleared antitrust review in the United States and European Union and been approved by shareholders of both companies. It has also been reviewed by the secretive Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), an interagency panel chaired by the Treasury Department.

That recommendation was forwarded to Bush, who has until Nov. 21 to sign off on it, according to Josh Holly, Hunter's spokesman. If Bush rejects it, the panel could go back and ask the companies to make adjustments to the terms of the deal to satisfy the White House's concerns.

Two officials from CFIUS are expected to testify at the hearing: Gordon England, deputy secretary of defense, and Clay Lowery, assistant Treasury secretary for international affairs.

Holly said Hunter will ask for additional information during the hearing on what steps the companies have agreed to take to ensure the security of Lucent's classified work. The possibility that Hunter would introduce legislation to block the deal has not been ruled out, but Hunter's next steps would depend on the outcome of the hearing, Holly said.

Nancy McLernon, senior vice president at the Organization for International Investment, a business group representing U.S. subsidiaries of foreign companies, said the Lucent-Alcatel combination was likely to be approved by Bush. But she said the committee hearing is "another example of the politicization of the whole review process, which we are greatly concerned about."

The two companies announced the deal April 2. In an effort to address security concerns Lucent said it would place its sensitive businesses in a new subsidiary, to be headed by former U.S. defense secretary William Perry, former CIA chief James Woolsey and Kenneth Minihan, one-time head of the National Security Agency.

Holly said this assurance was not enough to satisfy Hunter's concerns.

Russo said in a quarterly conference call Oct. 24 that the two companies are still aiming to complete the deal by year-end.

Shares of the companies have reacted mildly to news of the hearing, though both companies have seen their stock decline since the announcement of the deal. Lucent shares rose 2 cents Monday to close at $2.52 on the New York Stock Exchange, where they have traded in a range of $3.22 and $1.99 over the past year.

Shares of Alcatel rose 4 cents in after-hours trading Monday to $13.25 on the NYSE, also in the middle of their 52-week range of $16.51 to $10.63.

Possible Jurors Called In Microsoft Case (AP)

By David Pitt

AP, November 14, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa — Hundreds of Iowa residents were called to jury duty Monday to be considered for a panel that will determine whether Microsoft owes customers in the state millions of dollars.

Court officials called 469 potential jurors in an effort to find eight objective people to hear the complex lawsuit, which seeks up to $450 million for Iowans who have purchased the software maker's products since 1994. The case claims anticompetitive practices by Microsoft caused consumers to pay more for its products that they would have otherwise.

Microsoft, which denies any overpricing, says its products have been widely accepted by consumers because of their low cost and high quality.

Polk County District Judge Scott Rosenberg is presiding over the case, which could last as long as six months.

Jury selection is expected to take more than a week with opening arguments expected to begin after Thanksgiving, attorneys said.

Prospective jurors were asked to view a videotape outlining the responsibilities of jury duty and fill out a lengthy questionnaire designed to determine whether they had prejudices that might eliminate them from serving.

Roxanne Conlin, a Des Moines attorney and former U.S. Attorney, represents the defendants.

Microsoft is represented by a team of attorneys led by the company's corporate counsel including Richard Wallis and Steven Aeschbacher.

As the jury selection process was under way in one courtroom, attorneys for the company and the plaintiffs continued to argue last-minute motions before the judge in another.

Microsoft objected to Conlin's plans to refer to plaintiffs as Iowa consumers rather than a specific class of consumers because it's too broad a characterization and could prejudice the jury.

The company also sought to work out a witness schedule that would allow Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer to complete their testimony during one trip to Iowa. Attorneys expect each to be on the stand for about two days in January or February.

Conlin said her experts have estimated that individuals and businesses have been overcharged as much as $450 million for Microsoft products in the last 12 years because a lack of competition has inflated the cost of the company's products.

The average consumer overcharge ranges from $10.50 for buyers of Word to $56.99 to those who purchased Excel, Conlin said.

Many customers may have purchased more than one version in 12 years, Conlin said, so they could be eligible for multiples of those amounts.

Conlin said class members include all those who bought Microsoft Windows, MS-DOS, Word, Excel, or Office software, or a personal computer on which the software was already installed between May 18, 1994, through June 30, 2006.

Wallis has said the company is looking forward to "defending its business model of selling quality software at reasonable prices."

The lawsuit was originally filed in 2000, after federal antitrust actions against Microsoft were settled. It has already been before the Iowa Supreme Court three times on various legal issues and been sent back to Polk County District Court for trial.

The Iowa case is one a few remaining state antitrust cases against the Redmond, Wash.-based software manufacturer to make it to court.

Microsoft initially faced 206 class-action lawsuits across the United States. The company said 108 were consolidated in a federal antitrust case and 96 remained in state courts.

City Sues To Block Linkup Between 2 Health Insurers (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peÃ±a

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093885

Waiting until nearly the last possible day, New York City sued yesterday to block the planned union of the HIP Health Plan of New York and GHI, charging that the combination would violate antitrust laws.

The fusion of the companies, creating the largest health insurer in the metropolitan region, with more than four million customers, is set to take effect tomorrow. The city will go to Federal District Court in Manhattan today, seeking an order to prevent that from happening.

Between them, the two companies control more than 90 percent of the health insurance market for municipal workers, city lawyers said. The fusion of GHI and HIP would create a near-monopoly, they said, with the power to raise the city's annual premiums by tens of millions of dollars.

"If HIP and GHI merge, there will be no competition between them," Michael A. Cardozo, the city's corporation counsel, or chief lawyer, said in a prepared statement. "The merged entity could raise prices substantially because the next competitor is still far more expensive."

But Eileen Margolin, senior vice president of GHI, said the fear is unfounded. She said the company's rate structure would not allow it to raise the premiums for city workers enrolled in its health maintenance organization without also raising them for other customers, a move that would drive away business.

In recent talks with the insurers, the city sought to put limits on future rate increases. Ms. Margolin said the companies believed they had allayed the city's fears.

The union of the two companies technically would not be a merger. They would jointly create a governing foundation to oversee both companies while each would operate separately and under its own name, at least at first.

The companies announced on Sept. 29, 2005, that their boards had approved a union. The plan was reviewed and approved by the United States Justice Department — which looked specifically at antitrust implications — and by the State Insurance Department, which approved the plan early last month.

The city had voiced some concerns to the Insurance Department, but did not begin serious talks with the companies until after the department gave its approval, said John R. Low-Beer, a senior lawyer in the affirmative-litigation division of the city's Law Department. Asked why the city did not object to the union earlier, he said, "It was far from clear that the merger would be approved by the Department of Insurance."

He said city officials thought there was time for more negotiation, but the companies insisted on carrying out their plan to combine tomorrow. "We don't see the magic in that date, or why they couldn't postpone it," Mr. Low-Beer said.

The deal has been under review by the office of Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, which has not announced any conclusion. The combination does not require the attorney general's approval, but he has the resources to go to court to try to stop it.

There has been a lot of consolidation in the health insurance industry in recent years, which consumer advocates have warned could reduce competition and raise premiums. Oxford Health Plans and Empire Blue Cross Blue Shield, two of the largest for-profit insurers in the region, were taken over by the two largest in the country, UnitedHealth Group and Wellpoint.

GHI and HIP occupy niches similar to each other, in the marketplace, and so are each other's primary competitors. They are the two largest remaining not-for-profit insurers in the region, and both are considered relatively low-cost insurers.

It is not clear whether the combined company would seek to convert to for-profit status, an idea that HIP had promoted but that GHI had shunned. If it became a for-profit company, it would issue stock, most of which would belong at first to the state, which would be expected to sell it. Unions representing municipal and health care workers have been jockeying for a piece of that hoped-for windfall from any stock sale, while state officials have speculated about how they would spend that any such money.

Mittal Hits Obstacle In Selling Assets Of Merger Partner Arcelor (WSJ)

By ANNE JOLIS And STEVE MCGRATH

Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

LONDON -- Mittal Steel Co. said it won't be able to sell its Canada-based Dofasco steel assets and is now discussing with U.S. regulators how to meet its merger commitments to offload some North American operations.

The world's biggest steelmaker by output is completing its acquisition of Arcelor SA, which is Dofasco's owner. Mittal said the Dutch foundation, or stichting, that holds the Dofasco shares had decided not to dissolve, meaning that Dofasco couldn't be sold.

Arcelor acquired Dofasco after a takeover battle with Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG in January. However, when Mittal Steel later that month launched a takeover bid for Arcelor, Mittal said it would sell Dofasco to Thyssen in an effort to get the deal approved by U.S. regulators. As part of an unsuccessful defense against Mittal's bid, Arcelor then tied up Dofasco in the stichting, giving three independent board members the sole power to decide whether Dofasco could be sold.

ThyssenKrupp said it still had a binding agreement with Mittal and it would do everything in its power to acquire Dofasco. It said the board of Arcelor Mittal had asked the stichting's board to dissolve, but that was rejected Nov. 10. The German conglomerate also reiterated that it is planning to build a new steel mill in the U.S. if the Dofasco acquisition proves to be impossible.

In the past, Mittal executives have said they agreed with U.S. regulators to sell either the company's Sparrows Point, Md., plant or its Weirton, W.Va., plant if Dofasco wasn't sold. The U.S. Department of Justice will have the final say over whether Weirton or Sparrows Point is sold.

The Justice Department has said that the company must shed one of its North American assets by Nov. 28, although that deadline can be extended by 60 days.

Mittal said it would prefer to sell the Weirton plant, a decision welcomed by the unions at that plant because they felt it wasn't benefiting from synergies associated with being part of such a large company.

Analysts said that while the Dofasco sale would generate a healthy chunk of cash, they were neither surprised nor disappointed by the stichting's decision.

"Arcelor Mittal doesn't really need the cash from that sale, and Dofasco is a very good company -- it's very innovative, and it doesn't hurt to keep it," said Commerzbank analyst Jutta Rosenbaum.

Société Générale analyst Luc Pez said keeping Dofasco is positive, however much Mittal wanted to sell it. "They'll gain in profitability by keeping Dofasco -- it fits well with the portfolio, gives more exposure to Japanese original equipment manufacturers."

Gord Forstner, director of communications and public affairs at Dofasco, said the company had no insight into the process and was continuing to operate essentially as a stand-alone company.

EU Clears Nokia And Siemens To Combine Mobile Network Units (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) - BRUSSELS, Belgium-EU regulators on Monday waved through Nokia Corp. and Siemens AG's plans to combine their mobile network operations in a bid to compete with market leader Ericsson AB.

The European Commission said the market would remain competitive despite the "considerable market share" the new company would have in the mobile network equipment sector.

"A sufficient number of credible competitors would remain in the market, inter alia market leader Ericsson and Alcatel-Lucent. Customers - mostly network operators - would still have alternative suppliers," it said.

Regulators saw no problems in other areas Siemens or Nokia were involved in, such as fixed-line telecommunications network equipment and related mobile and fixed-line services.

The new unit, to be known as Nokia Siemens Networks, is a 50-50 joint venture between the two. Combining Nokia's network business group and Siemens' carrier-related operations should create a business with annual revenues of â,¬15.8 billion (US$20.2 billion).

EU Regulators To Approve Suez-Gaz De France Deal (WSJ)

By Adam Cohen And Anne-sylvaine Chassany

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

BRUSSELS -- European Union antitrust regulators are expected today to clear Gaz de France SA's planned merger with Suez SA.

Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes has already told the companies that she would clear the deal, the two companies' chairmen said Oct. 30.

The two companies have reached agreement "on principle" with the European Commission on the merger, said Suez Chairman and Chief Executive Gerard Mestrallet, who would retain his title after the merger. "Antitrust Commissioner Kroes gave a favorable opinion on the merger," added GDF Chairman Jean-François Cirelli, who would be second in command of the merged entity.

The companies have offered several concessions in order to address the commission's antitrust concerns. Among these, GDF will sell its 26% stake in Belgium's No. 2 electricity producer, closely held Société de Production d'Electricité, and Suez will sell a 62% stake in Belgian gas distributor Distrigas SA.

When the merger was revealed in February, Belgian authorities complained that the two companies would dominate the country's natural-gas and electricity markets. Suez also owns Belgian electricity giant Electrabel SA and has a majority stake in gas transporter Fluxys SA.

The commission earlier investigated the deal to see if the French government had interfered with a potential bid for Suez by Italian energy giant Enel SpA. The commission, fighting both a rise in national protectionism and a lack of cross-border competition in the energy market, didn't find evidence of wrongdoing in the French merger.

ENVIRONMENT:

Democrats Warned To Push Green Bills (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

Environmental groups yesterday put the soon-to-be Democrat-led Congress on notice, saying they will no longer accept logging of national forests or drilling for oil on federal land.

And don't think about stalling global-warming legislation, they warn.

Rep. John D. Dingell of Michigan, who is in line to take over the House Energy and Commerce Committee, already has called for a hearing on global warming, but environmentalists say the U.S. needs limits for greenhouse emissions, not more "fact-finding."

"The entire world's efforts will likely collapse" if the U.S. does not voluntarily limit emissions, said Phil Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust.

"The Republican Congress has now had 239 fact-finding hearings on global warming. If another round of fact-finding becomes the Democrats' policy, they will have walked away from everything they have talked about for the past six years," Mr. Clapp said.

Mike Daulton, director of conservation policy for the Audubon Society, says the new Democrat-led Congress must be about "building consensus across the partisan divide and end the old energy policy of drill, drill, drill."

"Pombo is gone, and vanishing with him is his extreme agenda," said Mr. Daulton, referring to Rep. Richard W. Pombo, California Republican and chairman of the House Resources Committee, who lost his re-election bid last week.

"Crumbling wilderness areas are at risk" and must be protected from drilling, logging and gas exploration on public lands, Mr. Daulton said.

Anna Aurilio, with U.S. Public Interest Research Group (PIRG), said, "The message is clear" from last week's election.

"We bird-dogged campaigns around the country in 50 of the most contested races," and 19 candidates who supported the group's energy platform were elected, she said.

"Energy was definitely a factor in many of the races," she said.

Pollsters say about 3 percent of voters have listed the environment as their top concern in recent exit polling.

The environmental groups also urged Democrats not to rewrite the Endangered Species Act as proposed by Mr. Pombo and other House Republicans.

"[President] Bush and Pombo have an extreme agenda to rewrite it. We expect oversight, not a rewrite," Mr. Daulton said.

Rewriting the contentious act was a priority for Republicans, as well as approving new oil drilling in Alaska and logging in forests that have been devastated by fires. The Republican-controlled House was successful in reauthorizing the North American Wetlands Conservation Act, first enacted in 1989.

Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, said the farm bill expires next year and will also be on their wish list to include more dollars to conserve farmland rather than plant commodity crops.

"There is a long overdue change in the way Congress has conducted its business over the past dozen years," said Betsy Loyless, senior vice president of the Audubon Society.

Environmentalists, Though Winners In The Election, Warn Against Expecting Vast Changes (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — Last week's election whipsawed the Congressional committees that are crucial battlegrounds for environmental and energy legislation. But even many environmentalists believe that an ambitious new agenda is unlikely.

DOJ_NMG_0093888

The leadership changes are striking. Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, who favors mandatory cuts in emissions linked to global warming, will become chairwoman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, replacing Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma, who has called the scientific consensus on human-induced global warming "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on mankind."

In the House, Jerry McNerney, a California Democrat and wind-energy executive, will replace the current chairman of the House Resources Committee, Representative Richard W. Pombo, a Republican who fought to open public lands to private interests.

"I think you'd have to go back to the Enlightenment to find such a big change in worldviews," Ken Cook, the president of the Environmental Working Group, a research organization, told reporters on Monday.

But despite the committee changes, some lobbyists are trying to dampen expectations that a major environmental agenda can speed through Congress.

While environmental groups are likely to worry less about oil and natural gas wells in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, they say that trying to get the new Congress to embrace initiatives like tougher automobile fuel-economy standards and requirements that industry pay more for Superfund cleanups could mean that little, if anything, will be accomplished.

Melinda Pierce, a senior lobbyist with the Sierra Club, said in an interview, "The environmental community has to recognize how difficult it's going to be to advance an environmental agenda with such narrowly held majorities."

Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico and the presumptive new chairman of the Energy Committee, said in an interview: "I think there's a danger of trying to overreach. The close divide between Democrats and Republicans ensures we can't pass anything unless we get some Republican support."

Even before the 110th Congress is sworn in, there is unfinished business for the 109th, including the question of how much to expand energy drilling along the outer continental shelf. Many on Capitol Hill believe that two rival measures — an expansive House bill and a more limited Senate bill that would open 8.3 million acres of federal waters in the Gulf of Mexico to energy exploration — have little chance of passing.

Bob Greco, an expert on oil and gas exploration and production, said he thought that Congress would eventually open more areas to the energy industry.

"Our sense is that Congress might be willing to work on a bill to improve domestic access," Mr. Greco said, adding, "You need both increased resources as well as conservation and energy efficiency."

The agenda for the next Congress is a work in progress, legislators and lobbyists said. Philip E. Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust and a former senior Democratic Senate staff member, said in an interview on Thursday, "It's very clear that the House Democrats want to move a piece of energy legislation sometime this spring."

Mr. Clapp said the measure would probably provide incentives for the production of biologically based fuels, like ethanol.

Mr. Bingaman said he would continue to push for requirements that at least 10 percent of any utility's electricity be generated by renewable sources like geothermal, solar and wind energy by the year 2020. He also said he wanted to guide legislation mandating energy-efficiency measures through the next Congress.

In an interview on Monday, Senator Boxer said her first priority would be to hold hearings on global warming. These would first review the half-dozen proposals that senators have put forward to slow the buildup of heat-trapping greenhouse gases, then focus on choosing the best approach. "Many states are way ahead of us," she said.

Her other chief concern, she said, is "protecting children and families" from toxic chemicals, by, among other things, ensuring that the risks from Superfund sites is made public.

The views held by Representative John D. Dingell, Democrat of Michigan, show the difficulty in finding support for a broad agenda. Mr. Dingell supports the control and cleanup of toxic substances but has never embraced automobile fuel-efficiency standards.

Mandates on fuel efficiency for cars have had wavering support from Congress since the original passage of a fuel-economy law in 1975.

In March, the federal Transportation Department ruled that by 2011 the largest light trucks and sport-utility vehicles must average 24 miles per gallon and the others in this class 28.4 miles per gallon. Anna Aurelio, an environmental lobbyist for the United States Public Interest Research Group, said Monday that a 40-miles-per-gallon standard was feasible for all passenger vehicles.

In an e-mail message, Mr. Dingell was noncommittal about tightening fuel-efficiency standards but said he would be assertive in oversight of the Energy Department and of Superfund cleanups. His strong stance on oversight has been a career trademark. Given that, and the questions many Democrats have after six years with little chance to probe administration decisions, a season of oversight hearings is at hand.

"I think we're still looking at a big turnaround in the tenor of the debate," Mr. Cook said, "and the nature of information coming out of Washington."

Troubled Seas (NYT)

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

One report after another over the last decade has documented the degradation of the world's oceans and predicted a catastrophic decline in important fish species. But in terms of sheer gloom none compares to a recent study in the journal Science. It asserts that the progressive unraveling of entire marine ecosystems up and down the food chain could lead to the "collapse" of all commercial species, possibly by the middle of this century.

The researchers — well-known marine scientists from Canada and four other countries — reached their conclusion after analyzing dozens of ecosystems around the world, 48 marine protected areas, and 53 years worth of fishing data provided by the United Nations. They found that by 2003 — the last year for which data on commercial fish catches was available — 29 percent of all species now being fished had collapsed from overfishing, habitat loss or pollution. The study defined collapse as a 90 percent decline from estimated historical highs.

The study builds upon previous studies in three important respects. Earlier work had documented a 90 percent decline in a few commercially important species like cod, tuna and swordfish; the new study includes many more species. Second, the study provides elaboration of how entire ecosystems fall apart, with the decline of one species triggering the decline of another. Third, it puts the day of reckoning right around the corner — 2048, to be precise. "Our children will see a world without seafood if we don't change things," said the lead author, Boris Worm of Dalhousie University in Nova Scotia.

The study says that the situation is not hopeless, but only if the world moves quickly to reduce overfishing and other threats. Two opportunities for change lie immediately at hand. One is a proposal now before the United Nations that would end unregulated bottom trawling on the high seas. Bottom trawling — essentially the strip-mining of the ocean floor by heavily subsidized foreign fleets — is incredibly destructive. The United Nations banned fishing with huge drift nets years ago; it should do the same with bottom trawling now.

The second is the pending reauthorization of the Magnuson-Stevens Act regulating fishing practices in U.S. waters. The Senate has approved a bill that strengthens the act in important ways. It should be an early order of business for the new Congress.

Save The Fish (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

We like fish. They're tasty, good for you and catching them is good sport. We'd hate to see them disappear from the Earth's waters in our lifetime, as a recent meta-analysis in Science magazine suggested could occur. The four-page paper looked at trends across various regions from different sources and concluded that if present trends continued, the total collapse of fisheries around the world could occur by 2048.

Now, extrapolation of any trend far enough into the future can bring surprising results (remember Dow 36,000?). And at least one professor of marine sciences has called this particular extrapolation "mind-bogglingly stupid." But it's certainly true that some fisheries are overtaxed. And while the problem is worse in the developing world than in First World countries, we in the West have not exactly perfected the art of fisheries management. No one believes that cows are going extinct any time soon, and chickens seem safe. So what's the problem with fish?

Well, unlike domesticated animals, no one owns them. Government programs to set catch limits and so reduce fishing effort are a constant source of friction with fishermen, who are always pushing for higher limits than regulators feel are advisable. It's not that fishermen want to decimate their cash crop. But the system is set up to encourage them to push for whatever they can get, now. There's a better way.

Iceland has saved its fishing industry by adopting a system of individual, tradeable quotas. It's not quite the same as owning the fish, but it's probably as close as you can get short of starting a fish farm. The quotas are an asset that can be bought and sold, and their value is dependent on the viability of the fishery, so they give fishermen a direct financial stake in sustaining the fishery. It also takes the hair-pulling out of the current frequent negotiations between regulators and fishermen over where to set the limits for a given year or several years.

The current U.S. law on fisheries management expires this year and must be renewed. This has occasioned a resumption of the same old fight, with fishermen demanding that certain rules be relaxed and environmentalists pushing for a tightening of the restrictions. Why not instead sell the fisheries to the fishermen? Set the quotas at a reasonable level, and let the fishermen themselves decide in whose hands they're worth the most.

For some, this will serve as a buyout program; they will sell their quotas and retire. We suppose the environmentally minded might even be willing to purchase some quotas and keep them. This could be expensive, but if they're right about the need to reduce fishing in a particular fishery, sitting on a quota they've purchased could prove a sound investment over time. Nor are tradeable quotas merely a libertarian fantasy; groups like Environmental Defense have also come out in favor of them.

The alternative, as three decades of command-and-control fisheries management has shown, is a tragedy of the commons on the high seas. We don't expect to see the last fish hauled from the ocean, whatever the models may say. But there's no question the world could be doing a better job managing that resource. The need to reauthorize the current law offers an opportunity for rights-based reform.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Expose A Scandal, Face A Prison Term (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

The harshest penalty in the BALCO steroid case may go to the reporters who broke the story.

SAN FRANCISCO — At a private reception at the White House Correspondents' Dinner on April 30, 2005, President Bush praised two newspaper reporters for their award-winning stories on steroid use in professional sports.

"You've done a service," Bush twice told Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada of the San Francisco Chronicle.

But today the two journalists, in a standoff with the Bush administration, face longer terms in prison than the combined sentences of all the defendants convicted in the steroid scandal they helped expose.

In September, a judge sentenced Williams, 56, and Fainaru-Wada, 41, to up to 18 months in prison for refusing to tell the U.S. Justice Department who leaked grand jury transcripts implicating baseball stars — including Barry Bonds and Jason Giambi — in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO, steroid ring. They are free pending an appeal hearing, set for Feb. 12.

Impasses between journalists and prosecutors seeking to unmask their sources are increasingly common, familiar to anyone who followed the jailing of former New York Times reporter Judith Miller for refusing to reveal who disclosed the identity of undercover CIA operative Valerie Plame.

But the BALCO case — although not fraught with the political overtones of the Miller case — has broader implications for the media.

Not only journalists, but two former Justice Department officials, have suggested that prosecutors are overreaching. One of those officials said the subpoenas, if upheld in court, would greatly broaden the government's ability to stifle investigative reporting.

"This is very disturbing," said Mark Corallo, who was director of public affairs for the Justice Department under former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft and involved in reviewing requests for media subpoenas.

"There is no national security issue here. There is no public safety issue. If they can make this the standard, then confidential-source reporting as you know it is done, over."

The BALCO prosecutors, Brian Hershman and Michael Raphael, argue that letting people get away with violating a federal judge's order — in this case, an order not to release grand jury material — could undermine justice.

The leak, on balance, "served only to titillate and hold up to public ridicule those athletes who admitted using steroids before the grand jury; witnesses who testified under the belief that their grand jury testimony would be 'secret,' " the prosecutors argued in court filings.

The BALCO case began in 2003, when agents in Northern California raided a Burlingame laboratory that produced performance-enhancing drugs marketed as the Clear and the Cream. Over the ensuing months, as professional athletes were testifying before the grand jury, reporters from around the nation tried to learn which of them got drugs from the firm.

But when indictments were announced Feb. 12, 2004, against four defendants — including BALCO founder Victor Conte and Bonds' weight trainer, Greg Anderson — prosecutors had redacted the drug recipients' names. With no major athletes directly implicated, the case inspired curiosity but few ripples outside the Bay Area.

"All anyone cared about were the names, and there was this big chase to get them," Williams, said in a recent interview.

He and Fainaru-Wada wrote stories about the athletes' involvement based on anonymous sources. But many readers — particularly Giants fans following Bonds' pursuit of the home run records of Babe Ruth and Hank Aaron — did not buy it, writing angry letters to the newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0093891

The athletes' grand jury testimony, meanwhile, was distributed to all the parties and attorneys involved so they could prepare for trial. U.S. District Judge Susan Ilston ordered them to keep it to themselves.

When the Chronicle reporters published a story in June quoting from the testimony of sprinter Tim Montgomery, the judge demanded that the attorneys and parties sign sworn declarations that they were not the source of the leak.

In December, the reporters published stories directly quoting transcripts of Bonds and Giambi, with Giambi admitting under oath that he had used the drugs. Bonds told jurors that he had used a clear liquid and rubbing cream from BALCO, but denied he knew they contained steroids, the stories said.

The testimony sparked a furor; in a sport whose popularity has long been fueled by fans' passion for record-breakers, many wondered if steroids were behind a recent slew of impressive feats.

Bush urged Major League Baseball to clean up its act. MLB imposed more stringent testing and tougher punishments on dopers, and Congress interrogated five high-profile players in a televised hearing.

In San Francisco, Judge Ilston asked the Justice Department to investigate the leak. Prosecutors eventually subpoenaed the reporters.

Although some states, including California, have shield laws that protect reporters from testifying, they hold no weight in federal cases. Legislation to create a federal shield law is before Congress. The last time the Supreme Court addressed the issue was in Branzburg vs. Hayes in 1972, when it upheld contempt convictions against reporters who had refused to appear before grand juries. Since then, many courts have hewed to Justice Lewis Powell's concurring opinion that the government should strike a "proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct."

In the BALCO case, attorneys for the Hearst Corp., which owns the Chronicle, argued that no such balance had been struck. They asked the court to consider that uncovering the source of the leak was marginal when balanced against the public value of "revealing that a number of the nation's best-known and most highly paid professional athletes had lied to the public about illegally using performance-enhancing drugs."

Forcing the reporters to testify, they wrote, would set a debilitating precedent for investigative journalism. "These revelations could never have been made but for the promise two Chronicle reporters made to confidential sources that this story of sports gone awry would be told fully and accurately and that the journalists would never reveal their sources' identities."

Two former Justice Department officials backed them.

Jamie S. Gorelick, deputy attorney general under Janet Reno from 1994 to 1997, filed an affidavit saying that long-standing internal guidelines dictate that media subpoenas be issued only when "immediate action is required to avoid loss of life or the compromise of a security interest."

Corallo, the former public affairs director, wrote: "Based on my experience, I believe that the subpoenas would not have been issued under former attorney Ashcroft's administration for the further reason that compelling the reporters to testify in this instance would have an incalculable chilling effect on the press."

Tasia Scolinos, the current director of public affairs, said Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzalez has not changed policy on subpoenaing reporters. The number of approved subpoenas has remained steady over the last 15 years: 14 from 1991 through 2000, and five since then, she said. (Those do not include subpoenas issued by special prosecutors, such as the one investigating the Plame leak.)

Scolinos said the department errs on the side of restraint, typically granting requests from field offices only if the deputy attorney general, the public affairs director and the criminal division chief agree they are merited.

Breaches of grand jury secrecy "seriously imperil the entire system's ability to investigate and uncover crime," she said, "and when a federal judge asks us to open an investigation because the grand jury process has been violated, that is something we would obviously take very seriously."

Media advocates say cases like BALCO are eroding the press' check-and-balance role in society. Lucie Morillon, of the Paris-based advocacy group Reporters Without Borders, said the United States' ranking in its annual survey of press freedom fell from 17 in 2002 to 53 in 2005. "The main thing in the U.S. is attacks on confidential sources," she said.

After hearing from both sides in July, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White in San Francisco said the reporters had to testify. When they said they could not, he sentenced them to up to 18 months behind bars.

Hearst attorneys hope a panel of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals reads the case law differently.

"I want people to know that if the government wins this case, all they're going to accomplish is putting two reporters in jail," said Hearst general counsel Eve Burton. "They are not going to get this information from us."

Williams, a reporter for 33 years, said he'd lose his credibility if he gave up the source.

DOJ_NMG_0093892

Fainaru-Wada, a reporter for 17 years, said he and his wife have braced his 9-year-old son and 7-year-old daughter for the possibility that he might go to prison. "We tried to make it as fundamental as possible: "We made promises, you need to keep promises. "

Grand juries

Their role. A federal grand jury is a panel of 23 citizens who evaluate evidence presented by prosecutors and decide if there is enough proof to return an indictment.

Why they're secret. Grand jury sessions are held in secret for several reasons: to protect jurors and witnesses from intimidation, to avoid tipping off suspects who could flee, to encourage witnesses to be forthcoming and truthful, and to avoid stigmatizing those who've been investigated but not charged.

Leaks do occur. Although prosecutors generally hold the secrecy of grand jury proceedings sacrosanct, leaks to the media are not unheard of. And if a grand jury investigation does lead to a trial, the grand jury material can be introduced as evidence and become public.

Shared testimony. In the BALCO case, the leak came after the grand jury session had ended, and the testimony was given to prosecutors, defendants and defense attorneys to prepare for trial. A judge ordered the recipients not to release the material.

71 Years Given In Agent's Slaying (AR)

By Jahna Berry, The Arizona Republic

The Arizona Republic, November 14, 2006

The man who dreamed up a 1994 double-cross that ended the life of a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration special agent could spend the rest of his days behind bars.

On Monday, Augustin Vasquez Mendoza, 37, was sentenced to 71 years in prison. In August, a jury convicted him of one count of first-degree murder, two counts of aggravated assault, three counts of kidnapping, three counts of attempted armed robbery and one count of conspiracy to commit armed robbery.

Vasquez Mendoza is the last of four men who have been tried in connection with a shooting at a Glendale garage that took the life of DEA Agent Richard Fass.

After the shooting, Vasquez Mendoza fled to Mexico, where he was arrested in 2000. He was not returned to Arizona until 2005. Mexico does not extradite its citizens if they face the death penalty or life in prison with no chance of parole.

Judge Warren Granville of Maricopa County Superior Court sentenced Vasquez Mendoza to life in prison with a possibility of parole in 25 years and added 46 years for kidnapping, assault and armed robbery counts, which must be served after the murder conviction sentence.

Fass' younger brother Guillermo said he was satisfied with the sentence but it doesn't bring his family any closure.

It's been hard for his brother's widow and four children to piece their lives back together, Guillermo said. One of the agent's daughters lived with years of guilt because she didn't kiss her father goodbye the last time she saw him, the Tucson resident said.

"More than anything, it sends a statement throughout the world that criminal intent can't come into our country and kill a law enforcement official in the line of duty, flee, and think that they can get away with it," he said. "From that aspect, me and the family were happy."

Federal law enforcement officials also say that the sentence sends a message.

"This prosecution will never bring back Agent Fass," U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton said in a statement. "But DEA's relentless search for Fass' killers serves as proof that DEA never forgot, and will never forget, a fallen agent."

During the sentencing, the DEA agent's widow, Theresa, said that her husband's death left a hole in her life.

"Twelve years ago, Richard's death changed and devastated our lives," she said. "Without a choice, we were forced to move on without a husband and a father . . . The void in our hearts will never go away." Vasquez Mendoza, his relatives and his attorney asked Granville for leniency.

"I am sorry for everything that has happened," said Vasquez Mendoza, who also apologized to Fass' family and former co-workers in the courtroom. "Even though it was not my fault, I ask them for forgiveness."

DOJ_NMG_0093893

Vasquez Mendoza's attorney, JoAnn Garcia, argued that since her client wasn't at the crime scene, it would be unfair to impose a longer sentence than what the other three defendants linked to the crime received.

Granville said that the facts of the case weighed against Vasquez Mendoza.

"Four people went into that room, three people ran out and one person was left dying in that room," Granville said. "You were convicted because you . . . conspired to commit armed robbery and in committing that robbery Agent Fass was killed."

Monday's hearing was the final chapter in a saga that began when a 1994 undercover operation unraveled.

Fass, 37, was posing as a drug-dealing "uncle" at a Glendale garage. Vasquez Mendoza, his half-brother and two other men were supposed to meet Fass at the garage for a methamphetamine deal. Instead of selling drugs to the undercover agent, Vasquez Mendoza and the trio plotted to rob him of $160,000, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Kevin Rapp and Keith Vercauteren argued at trial.

Vasquez Mendoza did not go to the meeting himself and instead sent his half-brother, Juan Vasquez Rubio, and two other men. The encounter ended in bloodshed.

Vasquez Rubio, who fatally shot Fass, was sentenced to life in prison without possibility of parole plus 55 years for robbery, kidnapping and other charges, said Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Rafael Rubio Mendez, who shot Fass in the trigger finger, was sentenced to life in prison with the possibility of parole in 25 years, plus 43 years for robbery kidnapping and other crimes, Hornbuckle said.

Eduardo Aceves Vasquez, who cooperated with authorities, was sentenced to 2 1/2 years after he was convicted of lesser charges.

While the other three were in court, Vasquez Mendoza eluded authorities. After six years, four of them on the FBI's 10 most wanted list, and with a $2.2 million bounty on him, Vasquez Mendoza was arrested in Mexico in 2000.

DEA Agent's Killer Gets Life Term (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, November 14, 2006

A man convicted in the June 1994 slaying of Drug Enforcement Administration agent Richard E. Fass was sentenced to life in prison.

Agustin Vasquez-Mendoza was sentenced in Maricopa County Superior Court. He was convicted on 10 counts that included armed robbery, kidnapping and first-degree murder.

Vasquez-Mendoza, a Mexican national, will be eligible for parole after serving 25 years for the murder but was sentenced to serve an additional 46 years in consecutive sentences for the nine additional counts before he could be released.

Evidence showed that Vasquez-Mendoza and three accomplices planned to rob Fass of $160,000 in cash during an undercover operation. Fass, a Tucson native, was shot to death in Glendale. The three accomplices have already been convicted.

Indicted Va. Sheriff Steps Down (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

ROANOKE, Va. (AP) -- A rural county sheriff charged with taking part in a scheme to sell drugs seized from criminals has stepped down, his attorney said Monday.

Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell has informed county officials of his retirement, which is effective immediately, attorney John Lichtenstein said in a news release.

Cassell, who maintains innocence, has not been in the office since the beginning of the month, when he was indicted along with 12 of his current and former officers and seven others in the federal drug case. Cassell is charged with impeding the investigation by federal agents and with money laundering.

"The sheriff has examined the nearly constant distraction his status has become" and didn't want it to interfere with the office's work, Lichtenstein said.

Cassell, 68, had not intended to seek re-election next year, the attorney said. He has been sheriff since 1992, and before that had a career with the Virginia State Police.

Cassell said last week he would stay off the job on an unpaid leave until the case was resolved, but the county supervisors asked him to resign and said the department's operations were hindered otherwise.

"Mr. Cassell made the right and honorable decision," board chairman H.G. Vaughn said in a news release.

Deputy County Administrator Tim Hall said late Monday that he would have to review the law to determine when an election to replace Cassell must be held.

Prosecutors have said cocaine, steroids, marijuana and other drugs seized by the sheriff's department were resold to the public during the past eight years. Guns and other evidence also were stolen, they said.

Henry County, which has a population of 57,930, is on the North Carolina border.

Cassell Retires As Henry County Sheriff By Lindsey Nair (RT)

Roanoke (VA) Times, November 14, 2006

Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell, who was indicted Oct. 31 as part of a federal corruption investigation into his department, has stepped down.

According to a press release from Cassell's attorneys, he decided to retire effective immediately after examining "the nearly constant distraction his status has become since his announcement last week."

Cassell said Thursday that he planned to place himself on unpaid administrative leave pending the outcome of the federal case, but that decision was met with frustration by some Henry County officials, including the Board of Supervisors, which had called for his resignation.

On Monday, board Chairman H.G. Vaughn said, "Mr. Cassell has made the right and honorable decision. I admire him for doing that. I wish him the best in his retirement."

Sheriff H. Frank Cassell Announces Retirement (MB)

Martinsville (VA) Bulletin, November 13, 2006

Press release from Cassell's attorneys

Monday, November 13, 2006

Henry County Sheriff H. Frank Cassell's attorneys released the following statement this afternoon:

Last week Sheriff Cassell announced that he would

"...completely and without exception remove himself from all aspects of the operation of the Henry County Sheriff's Office by placing himself on unpaid administrative leave for the pendency of this case."

His action last week was taken with the intent to ensure effective law enforcement for the people of Henry County and to remove all obstacles and distractions from the operation of the Sheriff's Office.

Since the federal government initiated this matter, the Sheriff has listened to the voices of those with whom he has worked for many years. He has also heard the requests that he make more formal and permanent the separation he announced last week.

At sixty-eight years old, Sheriff Cassell did not intend to seek re-election next year. Accordingly, with less than one year on his term, today the Sheriff has informed Henry County officials of his retirement, effective immediately. The Sheriff already had separated himself from the Office. He fully intended to remain on unpaid administrative leave. However, the Sheriff has examined the nearly constant distraction his status has become since his announcement last week. And notwithstanding that he will vigorously defend himself against these charges, the Sheriff simply will not allow the technical aspects of the status of his position to distract from the important work of the Office it has been his honor to serve for over fifteen years. Last week, his separation was complete. Now he formalizes that separation into retirement.

The Sheriff expresses his sincere appreciation to those who continue to express support for him and his family and he looks forward to his own vigorous defense.

Sheriff Frank Cassell's Lawyer Makes Statement On Cassell's Future (TD)

Times Dispatch, November 13, 2006

Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell, who faces federal charges related to a drug and gun racketeering investigation, is retiring, his attorneys said.

Cassell, who has been the county's sheriff since 1992, submitted his application for retirement to Henry County Administrator Benny Summerlin today and asked that the forms be completed and forwarded to the Virginia Retirement System.

Cassell, 68, had placed himself on unpaid leave last week despite county supervisors' request that he resign. A statement released by his lawyers today said he had intended to remain on leave but changed his mind because " . . . the Sheriff simply will not allow the technical aspects of the status of his position to distract from the important work of the Office it has been his honor to serve for over fifteen years."

In late October, federal prosecutors unsealed a 50-page, 48-count indictment and announced that 20 people had been charged in an alleged racketeering operation that included distribution of illegal drugs, theft of drugs and firearms in the custody of the Henry sheriff's office, money laundering and obstruction of justice.

Besides Cassell, among those indicted are 12 former and current employees of the sheriff's office, including a major, a sergeant and a vice unit sergeant. Also charged are a former probation officer and a U.S. Postal Service employee.

Within hours of the indictment being unsealed, the Henry County Board of Supervisors passed a resolution asking Cassell to resign immediately, noting that his ability to manage the department "is irreparably damaged in light of these events."

H.G. Vaughn, chairman of the Henry Board of Supervisors, praised Cassell's retirement today as "the right and honorable" decision.

"I admire him for doing that, and I wish him the best in his retirement," Vaughn said in a statement. "My prayers go with him and his family, as well as with the others involved and their families, during the upcoming judicial proceedings. I remind the public that all are innocent until proven guilty and I ask everyone to refrain from any pre-judgment."

A supervisors meeting to discuss Cassell's status had been scheduled for Wednesday, but was cancelled after today's retirement announcement.

A circuit court judge will appoint an acting sheriff. Capt. Lane Perry has been running the sheriff's office.

Federal prosecutors said Cassell, who is free on $25,000 unsecured bond, failed to investigate misconduct, made false statements to federal investigators, and attempted to aid a money laundering scheme.

His lawyers' statement said, "The sheriff expresses his sincere appreciation to those who continue to express support for him and his family and he looks forward to his own vigorous defense."

Border Patrol Says Agents Crossed Border (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

EL PASO, Texas (AP) -- U.S. Border Patrol agents crossed the Rio Grande into Mexico last week while chasing a drug smuggling suspect, Border Patrol officials said Monday.

The agents followed a fleeing pickup truck into the river "no more than 25 feet across the border" Thursday afternoon, Robert W. Gilbert, the chief patrol agent for the patrol's El Paso sector, said in a statement Monday.

The driver of the pickup truck, which was fitted with a camper shell and loaded with marijuana, ran into Mexico after the vehicle got stuck in the shallow river as he tried to elude the agents, authorities said.

A Mexican police officer in Guadalupe, about 25 miles southeast of El Paso, reported last week that the pursuit ended with a brief standoff between local officers and Border Patrol agents. Jose Luis Delgado, the Mexican officer, said that officials from both countries drew their weapons, but that no shots were fired.

The Border Patrol agents seized about 300 pounds of marijuana, while the truck and remaining marijuana were seized by Mexican authorities.

It was unclear how many U.S. agents crossed the river or what repercussions they may face. In his statement, Gilbert said, "This type of incident occurs periodically by agencies from both countries."

Border Patrol officials familiar with Thursday's incident and the investigation were not immediately available Monday.

According to a U.S. Homeland Security report made public this year in a newspaper report, Mexican authorities have crossed the U.S. border 216 times since 1996. Homeland Security officials have said many of those crossings were inadvertent. It is unclear how many times U.S. officials have crossed into Mexico.

S.F. Supervisors To Vote On Softening Pot Enforcement (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, November 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093896

SAN FRANCISCO -- San Francisco's Board of Supervisors will vote Tuesday on legislation that would set nearly all crimes involving marijuana as the lowest law enforcement priority for city police.

The legislation, sponsored by Supervisor Tom Ammiano, was approved today by a board committee with the blessing of police officials and over the complaints of some residents.

"This measure, which would legalize the unlimited growth and sales (of marijuana) on private property, will make public spitting and (leaving chewing) gum ... on the sidewalk higher priorities," said Kim Stryker, voicing opposition before the supervisors' City Operations and Neighborhood Services Committee.

Ammiano introduced the legislation in August at the behest of groups pushing for the national decriminalization of marijuana. He defended the policy move, saying it is consistent with Proposition W, a measure passed in 1976 by city voters calling for an end to marijuana arrests and prosecutions, and state Proposition 215, which provides for medical use of cannabis.

"There are many better ways that we can be using our tax dollars and empowering our law enforcement than wasting money and police resources on marijuana offenses," Ammiano said. "This ordinance would allow San Francisco to join other forward-thinking cities. It will not result in San Francisco becoming Amsterdam West."

Under the proposed legislation, city police would be directed to essentially ignore most marijuana crimes unless they involve minors or acts of violence, driving under the influence or the sale or distribution of pot on public property or within view from public property.

San Francisco Police Capt. Tim Hedrick, head of the department's narcotics squad, said Ammiano's legislation is consistent with police policy on marijuana crimes. "It does not tie our hands enforcing the law," he told the committee.

But a number of residents protested the legislation, saying it will encourage crime and the use of harder drugs such as cocaine or heroin.

"It will undermine the efforts of people who live in marginal neighborhoods to make their neighborhoods safe, clean and peaceful," said Arthur Evans, a Haight-Ashbury resident. "This measure is an attack on the well-being of our neighborhoods. You should not throw obstacles in our way. You should help us to make San Francisco more safe and livable."

Supervisor Fiona Ma, a member of the committee hearing Ammiano's legislation, also spoke out against it, saying she believed it "establishes a new policy that has not been presented to the voters." Ma broke with Supervisor Jake McGoldrick, the committee's chairman, and Ammiano in voting against the legislation today.

Although the city doesn't track marijuana arrests and prosecutions, the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML) has said more than 1,000 people were arrested in cases involving the drug in 2004.

Dale Gieringer of the California chapter of NORML said cities that have adopted a lax policy toward marijuana have not seen it contribute to crime -- which is an argument activists make for legalization of marijuana under federal law.

"We have to start somewhere and we have to act locally," he added.

Dispensaries Face Strict Codes (WDN)

Whittier Daily News, November 13, 2006

PASADENA - Here, near the 10th anniversary of voter-approved medicinal marijuana in California, the going is rough for purveyors in the San Gabriel Valley. The two latest dispensaries opened and quickly shut down due to county permit violations.

"Medical functions belong in a medical facility to protect the public as well as patients," said Tony Bell, spokesman for county Supervisor Michael Antonovich. "We believe these current operators' intention is to circumvent the law. We have to be vigilant, and our office will pursue every legal avenue \."

County code mandates that medicinal marijuana dispensaries possess a business license and conditional-use permit, both required since a moratorium approved unanimously in June 2005 by the Board of Supervisors was lifted in June of this year, officials said.

On Wednesday, Alternative Caregivers of Pasadena closed shop after receiving a violation notice from county officials.

"They were conducting a medical marijuana dispensary without a conditional use permit first being obtained," said Alex Garcia with the county's regional planning department.

A hand-made sign posted on the door Thursday told patrons the dispensary, located in an office building at 3868 E. Colorado Blvd., was closed.

Two blocks away and a day earlier, another outlet called California Compassionate Caregivers, at 3682 E. Colorado Blvd., also closed shop.

The owners alerted customers with a similar sign, as well as placing a farewell notice on Weedtracker.com, a Web site dedicated to medical marijuana.

"We put our heart and soul and truly wanted to make a difference, but we failed you," reads the Web posting.

Los Angeles County Counsel Rick Weiss said letters were sent to the owners of both properties informing them permits were required.

In Pasadena, a city zoning code amendment permanently banning dispensaries was approved in September 2005, said city spokeswoman Ann Erdman.

"People who advocated for medical marijuana packed the hearing room," she recalled, "but \ decided it should prohibit use in Pasadena because a lot of people try to circumvent laws."

But William Dolphin, a spokesman for Safe Access for America, a medicinal marijuana advocacy group, insisted that despite such claims, the 200,000 people considered to be in need of the drug should be able to readily obtain the information and medicine they need.

An exemption from criminal penalties for medical marijuana use created by Proposition 215, or the Compassionate Use Act, approved in November 1996 by 56 percent of voters, lies at the root of the controversy.

Since the proposition passed, two dozen cities and seven counties - including Los Angeles, Riverside and Santa Barbara - have approved regulations allowing the dispensaries. However, three times as many municipalities have passed moratoriums or bans, according to published reports.

The FDA has not approved marijuana for medical use in the United States.

Medical Marijuana Advocate Gets 3 Years Probation In Las Vegas (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

LAS VEGAS A medical marijuana advocate has been sentenced to three years probation in a case that had been seen as a test of Nevada's medical marijuana program.A judge told 35-year-old Pierre Werner he was getting a break instead of prison time after pleading guilty to possession of marijuana with intent to distribute.But she said Werner no longer could supply marijuana to other people.Werner could have gotten up to four years in prison.He's got a license to use marijuana to treat his own symptoms of bipolar disorder.But after police found 45 marijuana plants at his home in 2004 he said he was growing pot for 50 other medical marijuana users because conflicting state laws made it difficult for them to get it.

Tougher Steroid Testing Could Soon Be In Place (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

Representatives of the NFL and its players' union met last week and seem to be progressing toward completing an agreement to toughen the league's steroid-testing program.

Officials on both sides of the discussions said yesterday that no agreement had been completed. But the two sides, officials said, are discussing the possibilities of increasing the number of random tests and using a more sophisticated test to detect the presence of synthetic testosterone in a sample obtained via a drug test.

Commissioner Roger Goodell and Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, participated in the meeting with the league's medical advisers. League spokesman Greg Aiello confirmed that the meeting occurred but said no agreement for modifications to the testing program was finished.

Upshaw said the two sides "did not agree on any changes" but discussed methods of strengthening the program involving the frequency of tests, the type of test and the number of players tested.

Under the NFL's current steroid program, seven players per team are randomly selected each week during the season to be tested. The two sides have discussed increasing that number, perhaps even doubling it. They also have discussed making more frequent use of the costly carbon isotope ratio test to determine whether testosterone detected in a sample is natural or synthetic.

Officials said that last week's session was typical of the sort of meeting the parties often have during their annual review of the drug policy. Goodell indicated when he took office in September that he would seek to strengthen the program, and Upshaw said he would agree to any changes recommended by the sport's medical advisers.

These discussions come in the aftermath of one of the league's top defensive players, San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman, being suspended for four games for testing positive for a banned substance that he said was in a supplement he was taking.

Upshaw said the league's leaders were told at last week's meeting that there still is no reliable urine test for human growth hormone. He previously has said that he would not agree to allow players to be blood-tested for growth hormone.

NFL, NFLPA To Get Aggressive On Steroids (FS)

DOJ_NMG_0093898

FOX Sports, November 13, 2006

FOX NFL Sunday and FOXSports.com have learned that NFL commissioner Roger Goodell, NFLPA chief Gene Upshaw and other league officials quietly met this week with a panel of scientists, doctors and experts in somewhat of a drug summit to get a more aggressive plan of attack to catch the cheaters.

The meeting took place on Thursday in New York City with half the experts in the office and others via conference call. In addition, Upshaw told FOX NFL Sunday and FOXSports.com, that he and Goodell are working on a much more aggressive testing system they hope to have in place either this year or the start of next in their battle against Human Growth Hormone, testosterone and steroids.

Perhaps the most significant step to arise out of this meeting was Upshaw admitting he and Goodell will soon agree to a new, more aggressive random testing system that will include more random tests per week, perhaps as high as 15 per club per week — up from seven per week.

But even more important is the fact that the two sides will use a more aggressive testing system either this year or next in such random tests. The system, called CIR or carbon isotope radiation testing, can unequivocally detect the use of artificial testosterone. Due to costs and a lack of lab machines the league currently only uses CIR to confirm positive tests. Under their new plan, the league will increase their spending to actually use this CIR system in random testing.

"We are looking to prevent the cheaters from doing what they try to do," said Upshaw. "The only thing I want when we increase this is notice for my players. We've got to notify these guys of what we're going to do. But once they have that notification, we plan to get much more aggressive."

The most intense discussions were centered upon human growth hormone. Despite the NFL's desire to crack down completely on users of growth hormone, the scientists and experts admitted while they are working on a urine-based test rather than the unproven blood test that exists, they're still far behind.

"There's still no viable tests for it," said Upshaw.

Other points to come out of this meeting, the first of its kind for Goodell as the new commissioner:

The scientists and doctors informed Goodell and Upshaw that people are now combining more drugs but in lower doses to avoid side effects and detection. The CIR will help catch some of those who use this strategy.

The league will try to put some unpredictability in its testing program within the next year.

Goodell wants to shorten the appeal process. Currently, a player can test positive, receive notification, then wait up to a month before he learns if his suspension will be upheld or not. The commissioner wants to significantly cut down on this time.

COME AGAIN: The 2006 season has widely been assumed to be the last hurrah for Packers future Hall Of Fame quarterback Brett Favre. But new head coach Mike McCarthy now says the franchise is doing whatever it has to do convince him to actually return for one more year.

"I know what's being said out there and written about it but I'm telling you after watching him first hand that he's part of the solution, not part of the problem," McCarthy told FOX NFL Sunday and FOXSports.com. "I'd love to have him for one more year."

McCarthy said he spoke with Favre within the last couple of weeks about such a notion and admits the next two months will be crucial in the process.

"I think these next eight games will decide it for him," said McCarthy. "It all depends how things go down the stretch."

McCarthy said the team is doing whatever it can to make Favre comfy — including giving him his own office at the team's complex so he can spend longer hours at work.

One thing McCarthy said he and GM Ted Thompson have talked about is the fact they want Favre to make a decision soon after the season ends rather than have the long, drawn-out drama that occurred this past off-season.

"That's why these next eight games are so important to him," McCarty added. "But this off-season he'll know who his receivers will be, he'll know who his o-line will be. He'll have a better sense of who we're building with."

LEWIS BOILS OVER: The Bengals are either about to step up and ride a wave to the postseason or follow suit from a week ago and completely implode. In their last game the Bengals embarrassed themselves with one wideout slamming his helmet for all to see down the stretch, a QB ripping into another wideout and then another wideout nearly crying with frustration after the game.

Enough seems to be enough for their head coach.

Team sources told FOX NFL Sunday and FOXSports.com that after last week's game head coach Marvin Lewis, for the first time after a game all season, completely ripped into his team.

According to the sources, Lewis implored his team to "stop worrying about 'me' and stop being so selfish."

Lewis has kept his patience with his team despite having to deal with several interpersonal and off-field problems plaguing his locker room — that is, until last Sunday afternoon.

Lewis also implored his team to control their emotions when they get frustrated and things go bad. Basically, if they are to head to the postseason they can't get unraveled when bad stuff happens.

Toll Mounts In Mexico's Drug War (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar And Cecilia Sánchez

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

MEXICO CITY — The death toll in Mexico's drug war has surpassed 2,000 this year, with a newspaper editor found dead in the resort city of Zihuatanejo and a police commander assassinated in Tijuana apparently among the latest victims, according to news reports.

Another police commander was killed Monday in the northern city of Monterrey, and four people were reported killed in the southern state of Guerrero.

No government agency keeps a tally of the drug-related killings, but according to human rights organizations and newspapers, an average of six people are killed in the country's drug wars every day.

The newspaper El Universal said Saturday that its tally of drug-related killings for the year had reached 2,012. Last year, more than 1,500 people were killed in violence related to a lucrative trade in illicit drugs, including cocaine and methamphetamines.

The death Friday of Misael Tamayo Hernandez, the editor of the daily newspaper El Despertar de la Costa, appeared to be the sixth killing of a Mexican journalist this year, Reporters Without Borders said.

But in a country where drug killings are often public events — a hail of bullets on a busy street, a decapitated head deposited on the steps of a government building — Tamayo's death was different.

He died before dawn in a Zihuatanejo hotel room, officials said. His sister Ruth Tamayo, who identified his body at the hotel, said he was neither shot, nor strangled with a towel, nor tied up and executed, as reported by various local media.

The editor was found with three puncture wounds on his shoulder, she said. The coroner established the cause of death as a heart attack, but could not rule out foul play until a toxicology report was complete, officials said.

"We still haven't managed to understand what happened," Ruth Tamayo said. "We're very sad, our entire family is distraught. We still can't believe it."

Having last seen him Thursday morning, Tamayo's family and co-workers became worried after he failed to show up at a 6:30 p.m. meeting at his newspaper. Within an hour, reporters and family members began searching for him.

"My brother never let the paper go to print like that," Ruth said. "The newspaper was his passion. He was the kind to call in every 10 minutes to see how things were going."

Days before he was found dead, the editor had written a column denouncing local corruption. Guerrero, which includes Zihuatanejo and Acapulco, has been ravaged by a battle between competing drug cartels and the police. Tamayo's newspaper reported extensively on the violence.

Three days before Tamayo's death, Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon visited Zihuatanejo to deliver a speech to a foreign trade conference. He dedicated a part of his speech to addressing fears that the wave of drug-related violence might chase away foreign investment.

Calderon, set to take the oath of office Dec. 1, promised his government would not waver in its battle against drug violence.

"It's going to take work, time and money" to win the battle, Calderon said. "And it will probably cost us human lives as well…. But there is no other alternative."

In April, hit men left two severed heads outside a Guerrero state government building in Acapulco. "So that you learn to respect," read a message scrawled on a red sheet left nearby. In October, two more heads were found on Acapulco's beach.

In Tijuana on Thursday, more than 10 heavily armed men ambushed a police vehicle on a busy thoroughfare near downtown, killing one officer in a wild shootout that left a flower vendor and a taxi driver injured.

A police commander, Hector Gaxiola Gamez, narrowly escaped the attack. But the next morning, gunmen again caught up to the commander, and this time they didn't miss. Gaxiola's body, handcuffed to that of his brother, was found in an empty lot, disfigured by more than 100 gunshot wounds.

Gaxiola was the 19th law enforcement officer to be killed this year in Tijuana. Many were slain after the August capture of alleged drug lord Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, which many experts believe has triggered a battle for control of the lucrative narcotics trade in the city.

Tijuana Mayor Jorge Hank Rhon blamed the media, saying a story erroneously identifying Gaxiola as a witness in the case of the killing of another police officer had led to his death.

DOJ_NMG_0093900

"Are we becoming used to this being a 'normal' day in our country?" El Universal asked in a Saturday editorial, as the paper reported on the deaths of Tamayo and Gaxiola.

IMMIGRATION:

Texas Town Triggers Immigrant Fears (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anabelle Garay, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) - FARMERS BRANCH, Texas-Supporters say a sweeping ordinance intended to keep out illegal immigrants is necessary because the federal government has failed to address the issue. Critics argue the proposal could lead to sanctioned discrimination and racism.

Both sides are carefully watching if this Dallas suburb becomes the first city in Texas to adopt strict limits on anti-illegal immigration, a cause for concern among its large minority population.

A councilman has given city attorneys drafts of an ordinance that would make English the city's official language and proposals to fine companies and landlords who do business with illegal immigrants. The measure was expected to be submitted to the council on Monday, but there was no indication when it might be put to a vote.

More than 50 municipalities nationwide have considered, passed or rejected similar laws, but until now, that trend hasn't been matched in the Lone Star State.

"This is the first town in Texas that had the guts to do what's right," Susie Hart, who grew up in Farmers Branch, said during a recent demonstration outside City Hall. "The education system is tanking, health care has gone through the roof, everybody is bilingual."

Such sentiments and the proposed ordinance trouble many people in Texas, where many Latino families can trace their roots here to the era before statehood.

"This is not just a Farmers Branch problem," Elizabeth Villafranca said of the proposal.

Villafranca, whose family owns a Mexican restaurant here, said she worries that such laws will spread to other cities if the City Council approves the proposal.

Since 1970, Farmers Branch has changed from a small, predominantly white bedroom community with a declining population to a city of almost 28,000 people, about 37 percent of them Hispanic, according to the census.

It also is home to more than 80 corporate headquarters and more than 2,600 small and mid-size firms, many of them minority-owned.

The local debate over illegal immigration began in August and spawned demonstrations by both sides of the issue.

The Farmer's Branch proposal follows a vote this year in Hazleton, Pa., to fine landlords who rent to illegal immigrants, deny business permits to companies that employ them and require tenants to register and pay for a rental permit. However, a federal judge temporarily blocked enforcement of the Hazleton ordinance while he considers a lawsuit against the town by the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, the American Civil Liberties Union and other groups.

More than a dozen other Pennsylvania cities have taken up similar ordinances, as have several others in the South and a handful in California.

Many of the municipalities have based their ordinances on a model provided by the Immigration Reform Law Institute, which favors limits on immigration and is affiliated with the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

"They've all expressed a great deal of frustration with the failure of the federal government to respond" to illegal immigration, said Mike Hethmon, the institute's general counsel.

Critics fear the anti-illegal immigration rules will fuel racism and discrimination.

"Many people are assuming that all immigrants are lawbreakers, and that people who are different, who speak a different language, are to be shunned," said Cesar Perales, president and general counsel of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Republicans Gird For Fight Over Amnesty For Illegals (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

Sen. Jon Kyl said yesterday that a Republican-led filibuster would be on the table to block immigration legislation supported by congressional Democrats and President Bush that grants citizenship rights to illegal aliens.

"It would be in order," the Arizona Republican told radio host Laura Ingraham yesterday. "My only question is whether we've got the votes to do it."

The comments highlight the deep divide between most congressional Republicans and the White House over an explosive political issue. And, coming from the No. 4 Republican in the chamber, the tough talk suggests the final two years of Mr. Bush's presidency could see heightened belligerence from both Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill.

"This is a troubling sign," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "I hope the president will work with Democrats on the Hill to pass bipartisan, comprehensive immigration-reform legislation early next year."

Though Mr. Kyl indicated he would support a filibuster, he's not confident that he and his allies could secure the 40 votes necessary to block the immigration legislation that passed earlier this year. The legislation gives illegal aliens a direct path to citizenship and allows them to collect Social Security benefits for the work they've performed.

"I would certainly hope that the majority of Republicans in the Senate would not be complicit in passing legislation that is not wise, that, for example, would put everybody on a path to citizenship and say that temporary workers get to get U.S. citizenship and so on," he said. "Clearly, a majority of the Republicans in the Senate don't want that kind of legislation, but whether we've got 40 votes, I'm just not sure."

In May, 36 senators opposed the legislation. The overwhelming majority of them were Republicans. In last week's elections, four of those opponents lost their seats. Only one supporter of the bill -- Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who is retiring -- will be replaced by a Republican who might join those opposed to the bill.

With only 32 or 33 members opposed to the legislation, a filibuster attempt seems unlikely to succeed. Even if Mr. Bush were to veto the legislation, there would be enough Senate support to override it.

All hope among tough opponents of illegal immigration rests with the House, where Republicans maintained a hard line against any legislation with even a hint of amnesty in it. Democrats picked up some 30 seats in last week's elections, but many of the new Democrats are from conservative areas and are opposed to amnesty.

The challenge would be for Republican leaders to pick off enough of those conservative Democrats to overcome broad support among most in the caucus.

Mo. Panel: Immigration, Abortion Linked (AP-Y)

By David A. Lieb, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

A Republican-led legislative panel claims in a new report on illegal immigration that abortion is partly to blame because it is causing a shortage of American workers.

The report from the state House Special Committee on Immigration Reform also claims "liberal social welfare policies" have discouraged Americans from working and encouraged immigrants to cross the border illegally.

The statements about abortion, welfare policies and a recommendation to abolish income taxes in favor of sales taxes were inserted into the immigration report by the committee chairman, Rep. Ed Emery.

All six Democrats on the panel refused to sign the report. Some of them called the abortion assertion ridiculous and embarrassing.

"There's a lot of editorial comment there that I couldn't really stomach," Rep. Trent Skaggs said Monday. "To be honest, I think it's a little delusional."

All 10 Republican committee members signed the report, though one of them, Rep. Billy Pat Wright, said Monday he didn't recall it connecting abortion and illegal immigration.

Emery, who equates abortion to murder, defended the assertions.

"We hear a lot of arguments today that the reason that we can't get serious about our borders is that we are desperate for all these workers," Emery said. "You don't have to think too long. If you kill 44 million of your potential workers, it's not too surprising we would be desperate for workers."

DOJ_NMG_0093902

National Right to Life estimates there have been more than 47 million abortions since the Supreme Court established a woman's right to abortion in its 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling. The immigration report estimates there are 80,000 fewer Missourians because of abortion, many of whom now would have been in a "highly productive age group for workers."

The abortion connection to illegal immigration was listed under the report's recommendations on federal social policies and potential state legislative actions on illegal hiring.

"Suggestions for how to stop illegal hiring varied without any simple solution," the report states. "The lack of traditional work ethic, combined with the effects of 30 years of abortion and expanding liberal social welfare policies have produced a shortage of workers and a lack of incentive for those who can work."

Democrats contend the abortion statement wasn't discussed, much less agreed to, by the committee. Emery said there was some testimony about abortion during a question-and-answer session at one of the hearings, although he couldn't recall by whom.

"I felt like that was significant enough and fundamental enough that it warranted addressing it in the report," he said.

Missouri does not keep records of oral testimony during legislative committee hearings.

Skaggs said the abortion statement undermines the credibility of the entire report, which was submitted to the House speaker's office late last week.

"That's ridiculous to draw that conclusion. I don't think that has anything to do with immigration," said committee member Rep. Ed Wildberger, the chairman of the House Democratic caucus.

The report also includes short essays by Emery about the history of immigration, the purpose of immigration laws and the importance of a common language. In those, he notes "the issue of illegal immigration does not lend itself to compromise."

Mo. Panel's Report Links Immigration To Abortion (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, November 14, 2006

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo., Nov. 13 -- A Republican-led legislative panel says in a new report on illegal immigration that abortion is partly to blame because it is causing a shortage of American workers.

All 10 Republican committee members signed the report, while the six Democrats did not. Some of the Democrats called the abortion assertion ridiculous and embarrassing.

"There's a lot of editorial comment there that I couldn't really stomach," Rep. Trent Skaggs said Monday. "To be honest, I think it's a little delusional."

TAX:

Rubin's Tax Gambit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

That was fast. A mere two days after Democrats capture Congress claiming they wouldn't raise taxes, former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin tells them they should do so anyway.

DOJ_NMG_0093903

"You cannot solve the nation's fiscal problems without increased revenues," declared Mr. Rubin, the Democratic Party's leading economic spokesman, in a speech last Thursday. He also took a crack at economic forecasting by noting that "I think if you were to increase taxes right now, you would have probably about zero negative effect on the economy." The economics and politics here are worth parsing.

We suppose it's reassuring that Mr. Rubin now thinks the economy is strong enough to withstand a tax increase. That's a switch from his opposition to the 2003 Bush tax cuts, which he predicted would bust the budget and do little for growth. The U.S. economy proceeded to grow by an average of nearly 4% a year for three years following mid-2003, until the recent slowdown due largely to the housing slump.

Everyone makes mistakes, but raising taxes amid a housing decline doesn't sound like brilliant policy to us. Depending on inflation signals in the coming weeks, the Federal Reserve may not be done raising interest rates. The best hope for avoiding a recession next year and into 2008 is that strong corporate profits and the tight job market will lift business investment and consumer spending enough to offset the impact of tighter monetary policy. The last thing the economy needs now is a tax increase, too.

And what are the urgent "fiscal problems" that justify a tax increase, anyway? As the nearby chart shows, federal revenues in fiscal 2006 were 18.4% of GDP, higher than the 18.2% post-1965 average. In October, the first month of fiscal 2007, revenues rose by 12% from a year earlier. Mr. Rubin thinks this windfall isn't enough; perhaps he wants to return to the late Clinton years, when the feds grabbed a record 20.9% of GDP and taxpayers demanded a refund by endorsing George W. Bush's tax cut proposal in the election of 2000.

By the way, the federal deficit for fiscal 2006 was only 1.9% of GDP, which is lower than all but eight years since 1975. Add in the budget surpluses at the state level, and the overall U.S. fiscal "deficit" is economically trivial. It is all but irrelevant to Mr. Rubin's complaint that the U.S. borrows too much from "foreigners." Those foreigners invest here because of safety and soundness and the expected after-tax return. The quickest way to drive away those investors is to reduce that return by raising taxes.

Mr. Rubin's "fiscal problems" riff is really a rhetorical sleight-of-hand, using future entitlement problems to justify a tax increase today. He knows all too well that not a dime of new revenue raised today would be "saved" or otherwise devoted to paying for future Social Security or Medicare benefits. They would be spent on other things by the current Congress, just as today's surplus payroll tax revenues are spent, and just as they were spent when Mr. Rubin was at Treasury in the 1990s.

If Mr. Rubin wants to help reduce the future entitlement benefits he frets so much about, he could always support reforming those programs. Yet when President Bush invited him to participate in a bipartisan entitlement commission last year, Mr. Rubin refused.

Which is why we suspect that Mr. Rubin's real game here is politics. The Citigroup Inc. executive is part of Hillary Rodham Clinton's braintrust, and he and she would like nothing better than to coax Mr. Bush into raising taxes in the next two years. That would take the tax issue off the table in 2008, while splintering Republicans the way President George H.W. Bush's tax-hike deal with George Mitchell did going into 1992.

And if a tax increase did contribute to a severe slowdown or recession, Republicans as the incumbent party in the White House would get the political blame. Recall how Bill Clinton pinned the recession of 1990-1991 on Mr. Bush and Reaganomics, even though the Gipper had left office long before and the economy was growing at a 4% annual rate by late 1992. Readers may recall who won that election.

By the way, how does Mr. Rubin continue to dodge any historical accountability for the dot-com bust of 2000 and the recession that followed? In the liberal economic narrative, we are supposed to believe that the Clinton Administration somehow ended in 1999, and that Mr. Bush is to blame for everything that followed. Yet the Nasdaq peak came in the spring of 2000 and the third quarter of that year recorded negative growth. The shallow recession began in March 2001, with slower-than-average growth continuing until the tax cuts on dividends and the top marginal income rate passed in 2003 and the expansion moved into high gear.

If Mr. Rubin and Senator Clinton really believe the economy needs a big tax increase, by all means they should make this a plank in their 2008 agenda. But they shouldn't do so by asking fellow Democrats to betray their recent campaign pledges or Republicans to make it easier for them by repeating the GOP's blunder of the early 1990s.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's Power To Shape Judiciary `Over' Because Of Election Loss (BLOOM)

DOJ_NMG_0093904

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, November 14, 2006

Nov. 14 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush's power to shape the federal judiciary is coming to an end.

The Democrats' takeover of the Senate in January means they will be able to deny consideration of nominees whose views they oppose on issues such as abortion. While Republicans will still control the lame-duck Senate session convening this week, there's little chance of action on many judgeships.

``The Bush presidency is over with regard to judges," said Manuel Miranda, a former Senate Republican aide who heads the Washington-based Third Branch Conference, which pushes for conservative judicial nominees. The best Republicans can hope for is that blocked judgeships will be an issue in the 2008 presidential election, Miranda said.

There are 16 appeals-court vacancies now and more will probably develop during Bush's remaining two years in office. In President Bill Clinton's last two years in office, a Republican- controlled Senate shelved 16 appeals-court nominees, preserving the vacancies for Bush to fill.

With a Republican-controlled Senate, Bush put Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court and appointed 46 of the 179 judges on the nation's 13 federal appeals courts.

Democratic control of the Senate limits Bush's options filling any Supreme Court vacancy that might develop before he leaves office. A nominee such as Alito -- who drew the support of just four Democratic senators -- would probably fail to win confirmation.

Reservations About Roberts

While half the Senate's 44 Democrats voted for Roberts last year, many have expressed reservations since observing his performance on the high court, said Jeff Peck, a Washington lobbyist and former Democratic counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

``The benefit of doubt is diminished" for any future Supreme Court nominee, he said.

Bush is being urged by Senate Democrats to seek consensus on judicial nominees. ``Don't send us political extremists," Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat, said after the Nov. 7 election. ``I think that time has passed."

Republican activists, meanwhile, say Bush should push for strongly ideological candidates even if they won't win confirmation.

Such a strategy might force newly elected Democratic senators such as Bob Casey Jr. of Pennsylvania, Claire McCaskill of Missouri, Jim Webb of Virginia and Jon Tester of Montana ``to be put to the test," said Sean Rushton, executive director of the Committee for Justice, a Washington advocacy group that has worked to support Bush judicial nominees.

Red State Democrats

Senate Democrats Ken Salazar of Colorado, Ben Nelson of Nebraska, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Kent Conrad of North Dakota and David Pryor of Arkansas have sometimes shown a willingness to break ranks with their party over judges. These Democrats, like McCaskill, Webb and Tester, represent states that Bush carried in the 2004 presidential election.

One sign of how confrontational Bush wants to be is whether he will ask the lame-duck Senate to reconsider five nominations that were stalled before Congress left town in September.

They include Terrence Boyle, a federal district judge in North Carolina nominated to the appeals court in Richmond, Virginia, who is opposed by Democrats who say he has shown hostility to claims of racial discrimination and environmental abuse; William Haynes II, the Defense Department's general counsel, who Democrats -- along with South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham -- say may have helped craft a policy for interrogating suspected terrorists that justified torture; and William Myers III, a mining industry lobbyist nominated to a San Francisco-based court who Democrats say is hostile to environmental regulation.

New York Senator Charles Schumer, who led the Democrats' campaign to win control of the Senate, said resubmitting the names would lead to more partisanship and political combat.

``We are asking the president, now that we are in the majority, to do what he hasn't done before, which is consult with us," Schumer said.

Bush Leads King Groundbreaking Ceremony (AP-Y)

By Stephen Manning

AP, November 14, 2006

Martin Luther King Jr. belongs among American icons like Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln, national leaders said Monday at the ceremonial groundbreaking for a King memorial.

DOJ_NMG_0093905

"We give Martin Luther King his rightful place among the many Americans honored on the National Mall," President Bush told a crowd of about 5,000.

King's memorial, he said, "will unite the men who declared the promise of America and defended the promise of America with the man who redeemed the promise of America."

The King memorial, slated to open in the spring of 2008, will be the first monument for a civilian and black leader on the large park at Washington's core. It is also probably among the last monuments on the Mall following a 2003 vote in Congress to sharply limit development of the parkland.

The stage in front of the crowd was filled with King's fellow civil rights leaders such as Jesse Jackson, celebrities like Oprah Winfrey, politicians including Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, and three of King's children. A gospel choir sang, and Maya Angelou read poetry. Children read essays they had written about King.

Clinton, who signed legislation in 1996 authorizing the memorial, received a standing ovation from the largely black crowd. He told the crowd of King's commitment to nonviolence and social justice causes such as ending poverty, saying those goals still have not yet been achieved.

"If he were here, he would remind us that the time to do right remains," Clinton said.

The memorial will occupy a four-acre plot on the banks of the Tidal Basin, near the Potomac River. The Jefferson Memorial is across the Tidal Basin, while the Lincoln Memorial lies to the northwest, near the river.

The design is based in part on King's 1963 "I Have a Dream" speech. Before repeating the "Let freedom ring" refrain, King told the crowd, "We will be able to hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope."

Visitors will pass through an entryway cut through a massive stone symbolizing the mountain of despair and once inside, will come upon the missing section marking the stone of hope, bearing a carved profile of King. It will be ringed with walls chiseled with King's words that may eventually be the base for a waterfall.

Obama, who has said he is considering a presidential run in 2008, spoke shortly after Bush. He imagined bringing his two young children to the memorial when it is completed and passing through the mountain of despair.

"He never did live to see the promised land from that mountaintop," Obama said. "But he pointed the way for us."

Winfrey credited King and other civil rights leaders with making it possible for her to build her talk show empire.

"It's because of them that I can be heard," she said. "I do not take that for granted, not for one breath."

The memorial was first conceived in 1983 by members of King's fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha. But it has been beset by delays and fundraising issues — the memorial's foundation still has only $70 million of the estimated $100 million construction cost.

Eugene Williams, a Washington resident and an Alpha Phi Alpha member, said he believed the rest of the money will be found now that people know the memorial will be built.

"Absolutely, it's coming forth," he said of funding. "This is a monument to the fact that no other person in history has done what King has done."

In a seat nearby, Carolyn Jackson of Philadelphia recalled how as an 18-year-old in 1963 she was among the vast crowd who heard King's "I Have a Dream" speech during the March on Washington. With much of the civil rights struggle still ahead, Jackson didn't imagine at the time she would be back on the National Mall again because of King.

But she was back despite the cold and rainy weather, and this time not at a memorial borrowed from another leader.

"It's a full circle for black people in this country," Jackson said.

Ground Broken For King Memorial (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Ordinary folks and mega-stars gathered on a muddy patch of the National Mall on Monday to break ground on a memorial honoring slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.

President Bush shared the stage with former President Bill Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., talk show host Oprah Winfrey, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and the Rev. Al Sharpton to launch the first memorial on the Mall dedicated to an African-American.

"Today we see only these open acres, yet we know that when the work is done, the King Memorial will be a fitting tribute, powerful and hopeful and poetic, like the man it honors," Bush told a mostly African-American crowd of 5,000 people. "As we break ground, we remember the great obstacles that Dr. King overcame and the courage that transformed American history."

Scheduled for completion in spring 2008, the $100 million crescent-shaped memorial will stand on prime real estate: four acres of land along Washington's Tidal Basin between the Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln memorials.

DOJ_NMG_0093906

The location is symbolic and significant. Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, is a founding father of the country. Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation, which declared freedom from slavery.

The steps of the Lincoln Memorial are also where King delivered his "I Have a Dream" speech in the summer of 1963, capping a massive civil rights march on Washington.

"We give Martin Luther King his rightful place among the great Americans honored on our National Mall," Bush said. "And by its presence in this place it will unite the men who declared the promise of America and defended the promise of America with the man who redeemed the promise of America."

Bush received tepid applause from the crowd while Clinton, who signed the legislation to create the memorial, received loud cheers and a standing ovation. The difference in greeting wasn't lost on Bush.

"It sounds like they haven't forgotten you yet," Bush joked to Clinton and the crowd. "He's become, as you know, my fourth brother."

Bush has never been popular among African-Americans since becoming president after the contested 2000 election in which then-Vice President Al Gore captured 90 percent of the African-American vote. The White House's challenge to affirmative action policies and its response to Hurricane Katrina victims in New Orleans haven't helped his standing among African-Americans.

But politics wasn't the focus. Speaker after speaker lauded King for his contributions to the country and reminded people that, in some respects, King's dream remains a dream deferred.

"I suspect if he were here speaking at his own dedication, Dr. King would remind us that the best way to honor him is to pursue his dream and embrace his means to combat terror and create a world with more partners and fewer terrorists," Clinton said. "To grow the economy and provide equal opportunity for all to benefit from it - in incomes, health care and education."

Bush also said that racism continues in America.

"There's still prejudice that holds citizens back," he said. "And there's still a need for all Americans to hear the words of Dr. King so we can hasten the day when his message of hope takes hold in every community across our country."

For many of those in attendance, King's words and legacy live.

"I had to come here today out of love and respect for what he did for the nation," said Dena Briscoe, a U.S. Postal Service employee from Washington. "My heart compelled me to come. Martin Luther King set an example for all of us."

There are more than 650 streets bearing King's name in the United States and many statues honoring his legacy, but the Mall memorial will be the nation's way of remembering King, said Rufus Grooms, 59, from Clinton, Md.

"This will be the one the nation will know," he said.

Steve Collier, 54, showed up wearing a bracelet that his Temple Hills, Md., Shriners chapter sold to raise $5,000 to contribute to the memorial.

"It meant something to give something," Collier said.

The memorial is being paid for through contributions. The Martin Luther King Jr. National Memorial Project Foundation Inc. says it's raised about two-thirds of the $100 million needed.

Civil Rights Leaders Moved By King Memorial Groundbreaking (AJC)

By Patrice Relerford

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 14, 2006

Washington — A scant half-mile from where the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial and urged a divided nation to complete the work of the great emancipator, ground was broken Monday for a monument to King's place in American history.

From across the political spectrum, dignitaries gathered to mark the moment and reflect on King's legacy. They included former President Bill Clinton, who signed legislation to create the monument, and President Bush, who declared, "An assassin's bullet cannot shatter the dream. It continues to inspire millions around the world."

But among the most visibly moved among the thousands at the site on the National Mall was one who shared the podium with King when his "I Have a Dream" speech gave momentum to the movement for new civil rights laws.

U.S. Rep. John Lewis, a leader of the 1963 March on Washington that culminated in King's speech, broke down in tears as he held a groundbreaking shovel.

"It's unreal. It's so fitting and appropriate," the Atlanta Democrat said of the ceremony. "Out of all the people that spoke that day, I'm the only one who is still around."

Also on hand were several of King's children, who this year laid to rest their mother, Coretta Scott King, near their father's tomb at the King Center in Atlanta.

DOJ_NMG_0093907

"My mother reminded us on so many occasions that my father just wanted to be a great pastor," the Rev. Bernice A. King, the civil rights leaders' daughter. "Little did he know he would be a great pastor to the world."

Former Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young and the Rev. Jesse Jackson, like Lewis former King deputies, and other leaders of the civil rights movement listened as Bush spoke of the importance of the monument's location, flanked by the Lincoln Memorial and the Jefferson Memorial.

"It will unite a man who declared the promise of America and the man who defended the promise of America with the man who redeemed the promise of America," Bush said.

Also attending the ceremony were luminaries such as Oprah Winfrey, poet Maya Angelou, U.S. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. of Tennessee, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and fashion mogul Tommy Hilfiger — a major donor to the project.

"I am who I am because of Dr. King and his hope for this country," Winfrey, the billionaire talk-show queen, said as she arrived at the ceremony.

Fifty students from across the country who won an essay contest, including 18-year-old Natasha Lawson of Augusta State University, also took part in the event.

"He's done so much [for America]," Lawson said. "He would really appreciate this."

The 4-acre monument has been in the works for more than a decade. In 1996, Clinton signed legislation proposing creation of the monument, and in 1999, it won a coveted place on the Mall.

In 2003, concerns about plans for a host of new memorials led Congress to declare the Mall a completed work of civic art, and lawmakers imposed a moratorium on new construction. But the effort for the King memorial overcame the objections, and in 2005, the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Project Foundation launched a drive that has so far raised at least $65.5 million.

One more obstacle remains to the construction of the monument: raising the remainder of the estimated $100 million cost, a project Hilfiger and hip-hop entrepreneur Russell Simmons are helping to lead.

Harry Johnson, president of the foundation, said he hopes construction will be completed by spring 2008.

The entrance to the memorial will include a central sculpture called "The Mountain of Despair." Recalling King's call in his 1963 speech to "hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope," it is split to signify the racially and socially divided American that inspired King's nonviolent efforts.

Obama, who has said he is considering a presidential run in 2008, imagined bringing his two young children to the memorial when it is completed and passing through the mountain.

"He never did live to see the promised land from that mountaintop," Obama said. "But he pointed the way for us."

Niches around the monument grounds will honor others who, like King, gave their lives to the cause of equality.

"This is not a one-man movement," said Young as those gathered around him gripped shovels. "As we turn the dirt on this ground, let us go back to our communities and turn the dirt."

Bush Leads Ceremony Launching Construction Of King Memorial (LAT)

By Mima Mohammed

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Icons of the civil rights movement and the beneficiaries of their struggles to attain equality came together today as ground was broken for a memorial on the National Mall honoring the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., the first commemoration there for a person of color.

President Bush, former President Bill Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Jesse Jackson, Oprah Winfrey and a host of other politicians, civil rights activists, corporate sponsors and celebrities spoke or listened despite a light rain, chilly wind and muddy grounds.

"An assassin's bullet could not shatter his dream," Bush said of King, who was killed in April 1968 by a sniper in Memphis. Bush praised Clinton for signing the legislation that authorized the memorial.

The four-acre site along the Potomac River Tidal Basin is not far from the Lincoln Memorial where King, in 1963, delivered his "I Have a Dream" speech.

"We are in the shadow of Mr. Lincoln's memorial," Clinton said. "Lincoln saved the Union for future generations and abolished slavery, but left much undone. Here, there will be a memorial to Martin Luther King, the voice and spirit of the movement to lift the last legal racial barriers to our more perfect union."

The memorial's entry will include a sculpture called "The Mountain of Despair," a rock that signifies the divided America that King tried to unify.

The memorial, which is being privately financed, will cost $100 million to build and maintain and organizers have raised more than $65 million, mostly from major corporations. General Motors provided $10 million and clothing manufacturer Tommy Hilfiger contributed $5 million.

The Martin Luther King Junior National Memorial Project Foundation is projecting that the memorial will be completed by spring 2008, even if all the needed money has yet to be raised.

Although the weather held down attendance, the groundbreaking ceremony drew people from all over the country.

"I was here in 1963 for Dr. King's speech and it was great to be here for another milestone," said Bill Young, a retiree from Wilmington, Del.

"I thought the speakers spoke eloquently for the need of the memorial, that it is a memorial for all people," said Michael Green, 41, a banker from Atlanta. "It was nice to see both President Bush and President Clinton united on this issue. It's about time we have a memorial to represent people of color."

Said Robert Kirkpatrick, an organizer for the International Brotherhood of Teamsters from Apple Valley, Calif.: "The importance of this memorial is that it doesn't only represent African Americans, it represents all people."

Memorial Groundbreaking Honors MLK's Legacy (USAT)

USA Today, November 14, 2006

Presidents and celebrities hailed Martin Luther King Jr. on Monday at a groundbreaking for the first memorial on the National Mall for a non-president or an African-American.

The memorial, to be spread over 4 acres, will be inside an arc formed by monuments to presidents George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt.

“By its presence in this place, it will unite the men who declared the promise of America and defended the promise of America with the man who redeemed the promise of America,” President Bush said. “Dr. King showed us that a life of conscience and purpose can lift up many souls.”

Bush thanked his predecessor, Bill Clinton, for signing a bill in 1996 authorizing the project.

Clinton stressed the importance of the non-violence preached by King, who led civil rights marches and won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964. “When the real battlefield is the human heart,” Clinton said, “civil disobedience works better than suicide bombings.”

Thousands attended the groundbreaking, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, TV host Oprah Winfrey, poet Maya Angelou, civil rights activist Jesse Jackson, members of Congress and students from across the country.

The memorial is scheduled for completion in 2008, forty years after King's assassination. It will include waterfalls, a boulder from which King's image emerges and a circular stone wall that will chronicle his life with inscriptions of his words.

“He is not just someone a holiday is named after,” says Harry Johnson, president of the Martin Luther King Jr. National Memorial Project Foundation. His group has raised $71.5 million of the project's $100 million cost, mostly in private donations, including $2 million from Coca-Cola and $1 million each from McDonald's, Lehman Brothers, AARP and the National Education Association.

Johnson says the memorial aims to share King's dream with future generations.

“If we don't keep the information out there, the young people won't know it,” says King's older sister, Christine King Farris.

The memorial will sit amid other historical symbols, not far from the Capitol building, erected partly with slave labor, and Pennsylvania Avenue, where slave trade was conducted. Some historians caution that the monument does not itself promise progress.

“It's merely a symbol,” says John Hope Franklin, professor emeritus of history at Duke University. “I have to wait to see if Washington or the nation will be any better as a result of this gesture.”

In King's Honor, A Dream Achieved (WP)

Two presidents, a renowned poet and lions of the civil rights movement joined thousands gathered on the Mall yesterday to mark the spot where a memorial will be built to honor Martin Luther King Jr., the visionary pastor who beseeched the nation to live up to its principles and earned a place in the pantheon of American history.

DOJ_NMG_0093909

Ground was broken for a memorial to the slain civil rights leader to be built along the edge of the Tidal Basin, midway between monuments to Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. It will be the first on the Mall honoring an African American and the first that does not memorialize a president or a war hero.

Ignoring the gloomy weather, people wearing dapper hats and winter coats came by Metro, by bus, by limousine. Fathers brought sons to impart a history lesson. Celebrities waved and smiled. And dignitaries spoke of a movement sparked by a man trying to be a good minister.

President Bush said the memorial will give King his "rightful place among the great Americans honored on our Mall." He said King's message of justice and liberty "continues to inspire millions across the world" and was not silenced even when he was felled by an assassin's bullet.

"Dr. King was on this earth just 39 years," the president said, but his ideas are "eternal."

The crowd of several thousand attending the ceremonial groundbreaking gave a standing ovation to former president Bill Clinton, who signed the bill authorizing the monument on the prestigious piece of land tucked in the Tidal Basin's famous ring of cherry trees.

"It belongs here," said Clinton, basking in the crowd's enthusiasm. Jefferson "told us we were all created equal," and Lincoln abolished slavery; but both "left much undone," Clinton said.

He added that contemporary lessons could be learned from King's legacy of nonviolence. "Civil disobedience works better than suicide bombing," he said. And the memorial to King reminds people that "the time is always ripe to do right."

Clinton and Bush were joined by talk show host Oprah Winfrey, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), poet Maya Angelou, three of King's children and designer Tommy Hilfiger, among others.

On her way to the stage, gingerly stepping around the edges of mud puddles, Winfrey said she came to the event because "I've lived the dream."

On stage, she elaborated: "It is because of Dr. King that I stand, that I have a voice to be heard," Winfrey said. "I do not take that for granted. Not for one breath. . . . Because he was the seed of the free, I get to be the blossom."

King's children said they hoped the memorial would be a place where millions of children would come to learn about their father's work and the beginnings of the civil rights movement.

"Our father just wanted to be a great pastor," said Bernice King, his youngest child. "Little did he know, he became a great pastor to a nation."

The memorial is scheduled to open in 2008, though fundraising is still underway and the day's ceremonies did not mark an official beginning of construction. Organizers have raised about two-thirds of the $100 million needed to develop the four-acre site, which will include a sculpted likeness of King and references to many of his most memorable speeches, including the famous "I Have a Dream" oratory on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial.

Some in the audience remembered the sweltering August day in 1963 when King made that speech a half-mile away. The young men who marched with King are now well into their 60s and 70s. Organizers have been pushing for a monument for more than 20 years and want participants in the movement to witness its completion, said Harry E. Johnson Sr., president of the Washington, D.C. Martin Luther King Jr. National Memorial Project Foundation.

That opportunity slipped away for King's widow, Coretta Scott King, who died in January.

Lawrence Guyot is a 67-year-old District resident who worked with King in Mississippi. He said that anyone who lived through the mayhem and strife of the 1960s and said that they had envisioned such a memorial back then was "telling a lie."

Perhaps little Dontae Ryan II, 3, will tell others someday that he, too, witnessed history. Dontae watched cartoons on a portable DVD player as his father, Dontae Ryan I, listened to three of King's children speak yesterday. Ryan attended along with hundreds of other members of Alpha Phi Alpha, the fraternity that King belonged to and that has shepherded the effort for a memorial for two decades.

"He might not remember that he was here," Ryan said of his son. "But I can show him the pictures. I think it was necessary to be here, as an Alpha and as a black man."

Beritu Haile-Selassie, 54, came to the Mall and stood outside the security gates holding a handmade poster to King that read "You dared to dream! Thank you!"

And that message -- to dream -- endures. Civil rights stalwarts Andrew Young and Jesse L. Jackson teared up recalling the man they had walked alongside to help tear down the walls of segregation. As the shovels dug into the ground, Young turned to audience members and urged them: "Keep turning the dirt. Keep turning the dirt."

Automakers To Meet With Bush Today (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

DOJ_NMG_0093910

USA Today, November 14, 2006

DETROIT — After months of talking about it, the heads of the Big Three automakers will get their chance to sit down today with President Bush and lay out their concerns for the future.

While no one expects the automakers to win significant promises, the fact that they get an audience at all is a symbolic victory. Automakers sat by through several postponements as President Bush met with American Idol finalists, hosted a softball game between an Air Force base and a Navy submarine base and met with small business owners and community bankers.

The meeting, originally set for May, was delayed several times before the White House decided to wait until after the Nov. 7 elections. The meeting had become a political football in the hotly contested governor's race in Michigan. The multiple cancellations caused many Detroiters to wonder if the president was giving the industry a grand brush-off. His comment suggesting that Detroit car companies should make "a product that's relevant" still stings here nearly a year later.

Last week's elections put Democrats in control of the House and Senate, some of them backers of the auto industry. That is likely to give automakers more political clout in today's get-together.

"It was certainly a better thing to have it right after the election than before the election," said David Cole, chairman of the Center for Automotive Research.

The Big Three automakers, who are losing money and market share, have said they don't plan to ask for a federal bailout like the one given to Chrysler in 1980. They just want to ensure the president is aware of the competitive pressures they face.

Back when the government guaranteed $1.5 billion in loans so Chrysler could continue borrowing money to operate, the U.S. auto industry controlled nearly 80% of the U.S. marketplace, and the only major foreign automaker with a plant in the USA was Honda. Today the Big Three hold 54% of new-vehicle sales, and nine foreign car companies operate U.S. plants.

"The auto companies are not asking for a bailout; the auto companies are asking that (the president) use his power to see that they are fairly treated in the world marketplace," Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., said. White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president will "reaffirm his support for the American auto industry, and his support for its growth and its success."

The Big Three leaders — General Motors CEO Rick Wagoner, Ford's new CEO Alan Mulally and Chrysler CEO Tom LaSorda — are expected to discuss:

•Health care. Auto companies are looking for ways to ease rising costs. Cole says they might ask that Medicare be expanded to cover more prescription costs, or for a catastrophic health care coverage plan.

•Foreign exchange rates. The automakers will likely ask President Bush to pressure Japan to stop deflating the yen, which they argue gives Japanese automakers a significant cost advantage.

•Steel tariffs. The industry would like to see tariffs on steel repealed to help cut raw-material costs.

Embattled Car Chiefs In Appeal To Bush (FT)

By Bernard Simon

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

The chief executives of the three US carmakers will tell President George W. Bush on Wednesday that US energy, healthcare and trade policies are blunting their competitive edge against fast-growing Asian rivals.

Mr Bush is to meet Rick Wagoner of General Motors, Alan Mulally of Ford and Tom LaSorda of Chrysler, a division of Germany's DaimlerChrysler. The get-together, initially set for last spring, will be the president's first with all three executives.

The companies reported third-quarter losses in their North American operations. Toyota has overtaken Chrysler in US light vehicle sales and is expected to dislodge Ford from second place within the next year.

A GM official said that, while the Detroit companies had taken tough measures to revive North American operations, "there are some critical issues that affect the competitive landscape". The meeting "is a chance to raise the issues to the forefront, to speak directly to the president and to describe how these issues affect our bottom line".

Mr Bush is likely to adopt a more conciliatory tone than earlier in the year when he said the Detroit companies needed to build "relevant" cars.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said last week the president wanted to reaffirm his support for the US car industry's "growth and success".

The executives' agenda will include a plea for wider distribution of ethanol as a substitute for petrol.

The three Detroit carmakers have already sold more than a million vehicles that can run on E85, a fuel comprising 85 per cent ethanol. They have pledged to double the number by 2010.

However, their efforts to promote E85 are hampered by the fact that it is available at fewer than 1,000 of the US's 165,000 filling stations.

The vehicle manufacturers have launched vigorous campaigns to increase public awareness of ethanol.

DOJ_NMG_0093911

Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council, told the Financial Times last week that Mr Bush wanted to ensure there were the right "incentives to invest" in alternative fuels.

While foreign carmakers provide healthcare benefits for their US workers, they are not burdened, as the Detroit companies are, by heavy obligations to a large group of pensioners. GM, Ford and Chrysler have urged a bigger public sector role in healthcare funding.

Toyota's report last week of record first half profits has fuelled the Detroit carmakers' accusations that Japanese and South Korean exporters are benefiting from currency manipulation by their governments. The three companies' chief economists met senior US Treasury officials recently to underline their concern.

Democrats Set To Press U.S. Automakers' Case (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

Allies of the American auto industry, brought to power in last week's elections, are set to challenge the Bush administration to level the playing field for U.S. manufacturers.

Led by lawmakers from Michigan, newly empowered Democrats said they would press the Bush administration to help pry open the Korean auto market and go after Japan on currency issues. It's an approach that could put Asian automakers on the defensive in Washington at a time when they are clobbering Detroit in the U.S. marketplace.

"This administration has been insensitive to the need to make trade a two-way street," said Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is likely to be the next chairman of the House Ways and Means subcommittee on trade. "Their basic assumption has been the more trade the better, regardless of its content or shape."

Trade issues are expected to be one of the key talking points when President Bush sits down today with the chief executives of Detroit's Big Three automakers: G. Richard Wagoner Jr. of General Motors Corp., Thomas W. LaSorda of DaimlerChrysler AG's U.S.-based Chrysler division, and Alan R. Mulally, recently installed at Ford Motor Co.

In the past year, Detroit automakers have steadily tried to raise alarms in Washington about the industry's deterioration. They have been calling for more federal incentives to increase the number of alternative-fuel stations, the cutting of tariffs on steel imports, and government initiatives to curb the escalating cost of health care.

But with the change of power in Washington, automakers want more attention on trade concerns.

Overall, the Bush administration has been sensitive to such issues as taxes, prescription drugs, tort reform and energy use, automakers said. But Detroit automakers have had trouble being heard when it comes to foreign trade.

Specifically, Detroit auto officials say the artificially weak yen gives Japanese automakers a windfall of $3,000 to $9,000 per vehicle. Automakers say the Japanese government is maintaining a weak yen artificially to give its manufacturers that edge.

They're also concerned about a trade pact with South Korea being negotiated by the Bush administration. Detroit automakers want government negotiators to help them gain a foothold in the Korean market.

"We basically sell more cars out at Jerry's Ford in Northern Virginia than we do in all of Korea, and that's because Korea is a closed market to all imports, not just U.S. autos," said Ziad Ojakli, Ford's vice president of corporate affairs. "The statistic is less than 3 percent market penetration for foreign product. What's wrong with this picture?"

But auto executives will continue to have trouble winning over Republicans.

An administration official said there had not been evidence of Japanese intervention in currency markets since March 2004. There is zero correlation between the yen's strength and Detroit's slide in profitability and U.S. market share, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he isn't authorized to speak publicly on those issues.

"There's just no empirical evidence between the value of the yen and the profits of Big Three automakers," the official said.

Many Republican lawmakers have been philosophically opposed to government interference in the industry. U.S. automakers have also been confronted by influential Republicans from such Southern states as Tennessee and Alabama, where foreign automakers have opened factories over the past two decades.

Still, Detroit automakers see a more promising political environment now that Democrats are about to take control. Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) said his party could put pressure on the White House by invoking laws that require the administration to file complaints with the World Trade Organization when U.S. companies hit trade barriers in Asia. Additionally, Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) said she would continue to push for the creation of a U.S. trade prosecutor's office to focus on trade violations.

"Our manufacturers are not competing against foreign companies, it's foreign countries they are up against," Sen. Levin said. "They can't be the bad cop. They can't slap the other countries in the face when they are trying to persuade the countries to let them in. The administration has to be the enforcer."

DOJ_NMG_0093912

In the House, Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) is set to become chair of the Energy and Commerce Committee, and he has said the committee will hold hearings on trade and currency issues affecting the U.S. auto industry. Rep. Levin said Democrats would defeat a Korean trade agreement if it does not address concerns of the auto industry and other U.S. manufacturers.

"We've made that clear for months, and now we are in a position to follow through," Rep. Levin said.

Japanese automakers have repeatedly pointed to the construction of more U.S. factories as a way to head off trade fears and unexpected currency swings. But their rapid sales growth in the United States will continue to be viewed as a threat to the health of U.S. companies, said Masaki Taketani, director of Asian vehicle forecasting at CSM Worldwide. He said Japanese automakers will have to expand production in North America at a faster pace to ease trade friction in Washington.

Why Bush Feels More Pressure On Manufacturing (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush meets today with executives from the Big Three auto makers, Democrats are stepping up pressure to help manufacturers handle health-care costs as well as problems with energy and trade.

Last week's midterm elections revealed voters' worries about the long-term domestic economic outlook, particularly in manufacturing centers in the Midwest. The struggles of U.S. auto makers -- which are in the process of shedding 78,000 jobs by 2008 -- likely figure in such concerns.

Democrats say they will be pushing for answers. "There will be a lot more pressure" for government solutions to manufacturers' problems, said Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.).

Today's meeting -- postponed several times since earlier this year -- was prompted when Mr. Bush said in a Wall Street Journal interview in January that the American car companies needed to "make a relevant product," a comment that annoyed U.S. auto executives. In response, Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp. executives are expected to arrive at the White House in hybrid vehicles: a Ford Escape and Saturn Vue Green Line.

The executives are expected to raise four main issues in the early-afternoon meeting: energy policy; health-care; trade, including concerns about possible currency manipulation; and rising costs for materials, particularly steel.

In addition to benefits costs, the U.S. auto makers have been pinched by gasoline prices, which have reduced demand for their most profitable pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles, as well as competition from Asia-based rivals like Toyota Motor Corp.

"We're not seeking any relief exclusive to our industry," said GM spokesman Greg Martin, "but we do hope the meeting with the president will encourage a renewed focus on issues...that affect the entire manufacturing sector."

Primary among the four concerns is health care, said John Hoffecker, a managing director with restructuring consultant AlixPartners LLP in Detroit. His firm's research shows that as recently as two years ago, GM and Ford were almost as profitable as Toyota, excluding health-care costs. "That's how big a millstone this is around the domestics' necks," he said.

Should the federal government provide financial assistance to U.S. auto makers?2

But Republicans and Democrats differ over how to fix the related problems of high insurance costs and broader lack of coverage. Republicans generally favor encouraging individuals to purchase their own coverage. Democrats favor strengthening the existing employer-based system, moving to a government-based approach, or some combination of the two. Among other things, they worry the Republican approach would further disadvantage old-line companies such as auto makers.

Democrats next year will have opportunities to showcase their ideas, such as new tax breaks for employers and possibly federal backstopping of some insurance costs. The election "was a referendum on economic policy," said Rep. Frank Pallone of New Jersey, a top Democrat on the House health subcommittee. Health insurance, he added, is "at the top of the list" of workers' problems.

Another idea is to offer government coverage for everyone under a certain age -- say, 18 or even 25 -- as part of reauthorizing the current federal program for covering low-income children. "That would be my wildest dream," said Rep. Fortney "Pete" Stark of California, a prime sponsor of the idea.

Yesterday, America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade group, moved to get ahead of the debate by proposing the federal government spend $300 billion so all children have insurance coverage within three years, and 95% of adults within 10 years.

The auto makers also are likely to again raise concerns about unfair foreign competition, particularly regarding currency manipulation by Japan. That concern doesn't appear to be shared by the Bush administration, however.

An area of potential agreement is energy. Mr. Bush gave the U.S. companies a boost with his proposal in January to accelerate research into production of alternative fuels such as ethanol. U.S. manufacturers lead the world in producing so-called flex-fuel cars that can run on gasoline or ethanol. But many Democrats say the government should do even more, and Mr. Bush suggested in a Wall Street Journal interview in September that he wants to.

DOJ_NMG_0093913

The auto makers are wary of new emissions limits on greenhouse gases believed to cause global warming. For now, the administration seems to side with the car companies. But pressure is growing in the U.S. and internationally for tough new limits on those emissions.

Gates May Rein In Pentagon Activities (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

Nominee Has Opposed Defense Department's Dominance in Intelligence Efforts

The nomination of Robert M. Gates as secretary of defense has begun to ease concerns in the intelligence community about the rapid growth of Pentagon intelligence activities since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, said experts inside and outside the government and on Capitol Hill.

Gates, a former CIA director, has a long history of opposing expansive Pentagon intelligence activities. He has voiced unease about roles being taken over by Pentagon personnel, in part because more than 80 percent of all intelligence spending is now done by Defense Department agencies.

Donald H. Rumsfeld, the outgoing defense secretary, has vastly expanded Pentagon intelligence activities, increasing operations overseas and creating a new position and a new agency to handle military intelligence.

In 1991, after being confirmed for the dual role of director of central intelligence and CIA director, Gates tried to rein in Pentagon activities by getting a White House directive from then-President George H.W. Bush that created the Community Management Staff to help oversee all intelligence activities. A CIA history of that period says Gates, whose background was as an analyst, saw the Defense Intelligence Agency "as 'feeling [its] oats' and 'moving to expand in every direction,' including pushing some 'crazy ideas' " on the collection of human intelligence.

Gates's 1991 initiative "caused some heartburn in DOD, partly because he used the word 'management,' " requiring him to send out an explanatory joint statement signed by himself and then-Defense Secretary Richard B. Cheney.

More recently, Gates watched Rumsfeld create the position of undersecretary of defense for intelligence, whose role is to coordinate and expand worldwide military intelligence activities in the post-Sept. 11 world. In an op-ed piece in The Washington Post in May, Gates wrote that he and other CIA veterans were "unhappy about the dominance of the Defense Department in the intelligence arena" at a time when "close cooperation between the military and the CIA in both clandestine and intelligence collection is essential."

The article supported Gen. Michael V. Hayden becoming CIA director in part because Hayden, while director of the National Security Agency, opposed Rumsfeld keeping control of the NSA instead of having it move to the new director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte. Gates went on to say that the combination of Negroponte and Hayden would establish "a strong civilian institutional counterbalance and alternative strategic intelligence perspective to the historically strong Defense Department intelligence arm."

John E. McLaughlin, a former acting CIA director, said yesterday that Gates "understands more than anyone the appropriate balance between the military and civilian intelligence agencies."

One quick indication of how Gates will deal with interagency tensions will be whether Rumsfeld's undersecretary of defense for intelligence, Stephen A. Cambone, and his top deputy, Army Lt. Gen. William G. Boykin, remain in their current positions. They have backed the growth of the Counterintelligence Field Activity, the controversial new agency that in three years has spent nearly $1 billion to gather data to be used in the protection of defense facilities at home and abroad.

Both have supported the increased roles for the military in sending Pentagon intelligence collectors abroad to gather information that could be needed if military operations against terrorists were initiated in various countries. Some conflicts arose in past years when Defense agents turned up in countries without notice to U.S. ambassadors and CIA chiefs of station.

A Pentagon spokesman said Cambone had no comment on the Gates nomination. Spokesmen for Negroponte and Hayden said neither would discuss the impact that Gates may have on the intelligence community.

McLaughlin noted yesterday that Negroponte's office has taken steps to create a system of transparency, easing some of the tensions. Gates "understands better than anyone that confusion overseas has to be stopped," he said, adding that the Pentagon "is not an alien world to him."

Another former senior intelligence official, who has worked closely with Gates, said that from his experience, Gates knows what the military needs in human intelligence and analysis as well as the best way to obtain it. Having come from the analytic side of the CIA, Gates is a great believer "in established clear lanes in the road, where each agency has its own responsibilities and knows the 'crosswalks' where there is a need to work together," the official said.

Levin Cites 'Troubling' Questions On Gates (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, Upi Homeland And National Security Editor

United Press International, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (UPI) -- The incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee has "troubling" questions about Robert Gates, the nominee for defense secretary.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will assume the chair of the committee when the Democrats take over Congress in January, said he would not necessarily oppose Gates' confirmation, which is likely to get under way in the coming days now that Congress in back from its election break for a lame duck session.

"For me, the important thing with Mr. Gates is whether or not he is independent, whether or not he's going to speak truth to power," Levin told reporters Monday, recalling charges that Gates, as CIA director, had slanted intelligence in order to support the policies of the Reagan White House.

"If (that) did happen, it would be very troubling to me," he said, adding, "We had enough of that with (former CIA Director) George Tenet."

But Levin, who voted against Gates' confirmation as CIA chief in 1991, said he wanted to take "a fresh look at Mr. Gates.

"I'm not going to vote no because I voted no 15 years ago ... A lot has happened in 15 years. I don't want to assume that the problems that I saw 15 years ago continue to exist or that that would outweigh other pluses that might go on the scale," said Levin.

Rumsfeld Drops Plan To Go To NATO Summit (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, November 14, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has dropped plans to join President Bush at a NATO summit this month in Latvia, in light of his announced resignation, a Rumsfeld spokesman said Monday.

The Pentagon will instead be represented at the meeting by Eric Edelman, the undersecretary of defense for policy, according to Pentagon spokeswoman Lt. Col. Karen Finn. Other officials had said earlier Monday that Gordon England, the deputy secretary of defense, might fill in for Rumsfeld at the summit meeting.

The NATO summit is Nov. 28-29 in the Latvian capital of Riga.

Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff reaffirmed that Rumsfeld plans to remain at his post until his successor is confirmed by the Senate. Bush last week announced that he is nominating former CIA director Robert M. Gates to replace Rumsfeld, but no confirmation hearing date has been announced. Ruff said it could happen as early as the week of Dec. 4.

Keeping to his schedule Monday, Rumsfeld hosted a ceremony installing Gen. James Conway as the new commandant of the Marine Corps, replacing Gen. Michael Hagee, who is retiring.

The Pentagon has refused to release the letter of resignation that Rumsfeld submitted to Bush. Ruff said Rumsfeld did not mind if the White House released it. At the White House, spokesman Gordon Johndroe said there was no plan to release it.

Ruff said Gates and Rumsfeld might have a discussion later this week about the coming transition, but he had no specifics.

On the day Bush announced Gates as his choice to replace Rumsfeld, Gates called England and asked him to remain as the No. 2 at the Pentagon, according to an official who discussed the matter on condition of anonymity. England agreed to stay for an indefinite period, the official said.

Other senior Pentagon officials, however, are expected to leave. None has publicly announced a departure plan.

Fantastic Job, Mr. President (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

There is something refreshing about George Stephanopoulos. After George Bush announced that he was firing Don Rumsfeld, Stephanopoulos -- on the air at the time -- actually seemed shocked that just a week earlier the president had said he would do no such thing. Stephanopoulos not only suggested that the president had lied but that he was wrong to have done so. In Georgetown, where the ABC newsman lives, such innocence must be considered quaint.

Washington's easy acceptance of lying, especially presidential lying, is beyond lamentable. It has cost the country plenty, including, of late, a war in a godforsaken place, which we are losing and are fighting for reasons that we no longer remember or that even matter. (Democracy? Weapons of mass destruction? A link to terrorism? Aw, forget it.) In the most recent case, Bush not only lied but compounded the lie by lying about why he lied in the first place.

DOJ_NMG_0093915

Less than a week before the election, Bush told three wire service reporters that Rummy was his man -- now and until the end of his term. He said Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney were doing "fantastic" jobs, which was so clearly not the case that one of the reporters, Terence Hunt of the Associated Press, pressed the president further.

"You see them staying with you until the end?"

"I do," Bush replied.

What Bush did not say was that at that very moment he was casting about for a Rumsfeld replacement and that Robert M. Gates, a former CIA director, was being considered for the job. By the end of that week, Gates had been summoned to Bush's Texas ranch, where, clearly, he passed presidential muster. The appointment was announced by Bush at a news conference the day after the election. The president had his excuses ready. He lied for the sake of the troops.

Bush, you see, had made a decision. The president said he "wasn't going to be talking about hypothetical troop levels or changes in command structure coming down the stretch" of the congressional campaign. As is his wont, he used the word "decision" in a Billy Grahamish sort of way, as if it had not originated in his own brain but came from what Hebrew National, the maker of franks, sausages and lunchmeats, calls "a higher authority."

In fact -- and this is a fact -- the lie about Rumsfeld was consistent with the White House's political line that everything is just hunky-dory in Iraq and that only Democrats and advocates of same-sex marriage could think otherwise. It would have been inconsistent with the political line for Bush to have admitted doubts about Rumsfeld. It had nothing to do with the troops, who really don't give a damn who the SecDef is, since he is junior to their second lieutenant as far as they are concerned.

In this way, Bush lied about the lie and then, as has become customary, draped an American flag over it: the troops, the troops. Actually, if he cared so much for the troops he would have gotten rid of Rumsfeld months ago.

It has now been a week, and the president's lie has been forgotten . . . or excused . . . or minimized. This is the way it is in Washington, a town run by politicians who routinely lie in their political commercials back home (this is the lesson of the last campaign) and then think, somehow, that they can recover their virtue by recrossing the Potomac. Deep down, they know they lack the moral standing even to feign shock. For instance, the maker of the spot used against Rep. Harold Ford Jr. is briefly condemned (but secretly admired) when, at the very least, he should have had his citizenship revoked.

So it was downright exhilarating to see Stephanopoulos express shock at Bush's lie, and it would be equally exhilarating if the new Democratic majorities evinced a similar moral indignation. Instead of reassuring the administration's serial fibbers that they will not be required to answer for their statements about Iraq, they should instead be vowing to take apart the ship of state plank by plank until they find the rot -- not impeachment, mind you, just accountability.

This is not a matter of vengeance or, God forfend, politics, but of restoring the people's faith in their government. How dare these people lie to you and me and send Americans to die in Iraq for reasons that turned out to be wholly nonexistent? One way to return to the truth is to find the liars. I ask this not for myself but -- and I mean it -- for the troops.

Nomination Still Stalled For Pentagon Oversight Job (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

Even as the Senate moves quickly to consider Robert M. Gates's nomination to be defense secretary, the nomination of the man who would be looking over Gates's shoulder on behalf of taxpayers remains bogged down nearly six months after he was tapped to fill one of the government's most important oversight roles.

The nominee for Pentagon inspector general, David H. Laufman, is a veteran prosecutor who has vowed to be an aggressive watchdog -- especially of work in Iraq and Afghanistan. But Laufman, nominated by President Bush in June, has met resistance from Democrats who question his independence. Republicans, meanwhile, have done little to advance his nomination since confirmation hearings in July. The inaction has prompted Laufman to take the unusual step of speaking out.

"Given the nature and magnitude of U.S. involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the hundreds of billions of dollars at issue in defense acquisition and contract performance, the need for aggressive oversight and accountability at the Department of Defense is critical," he said yesterday. "Yet for more than a year, there has been a void of leadership in the Office of the Inspector General and a corresponding absence of essential oversight and accountability."

The Pentagon last had a permanent inspector general in September 2005, when Joseph E. Schmitz left to become general counsel for the parent company of security firm Blackwater USA. Since then, the office of 1,250 military and civilian officers and employees has been led by acting Inspector General Thomas F. Gimble.

Gimble withstood heavy criticism last year when it came to light that his office had no personnel on the ground in Iraq, despite the hundreds of billions of dollars being spent there. Since then, a handful of auditors and inspectors have been rotating into Iraq from an office in Qatar. Gimble has also been faulted for not delving into the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program.

Laufman, an assistant U.S. attorney in Virginia who last year successfully prosecuted a man for conspiring to assassinate Bush, has said the inspector general's office should have a regular presence in Iraq. He told senators in July that the Pentagon's inspector general has the jurisdiction to investigate the NSA program and that "it is unclear why the DOD IG did not exercise its jurisdiction at the outset."

Some of Laufman's other statements to senators, however, ran afoul of the Armed Services Committee's ranking Democrat, Carl M. Levin (Mich.), who is likely to become chairman when the new Congress convenes in January. In particular, Levin was displeased that Laufman said he would consult the defense secretary before issuing reports on certain national security matters.

Laufman said his answer was based on his reading of the law, but Gimble wrote in a letter to Levin that such consultations "would be a significant change to current practice." Gimble also contradicted Laufman's statement that the two men had not talked about the issue.

At a news conference yesterday, Levin said he has "real problems with that appointment" and added that he "will continue to oppose" Laufman's confirmation.

Since July, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the committee's chairman, has declined to allow a vote on Laufman. If Laufman is not approved during the lame-duck session, the nomination will expire.

"The president strongly supports David Laufman's nomination," White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said yesterday. "He believes that it's an important position and that Mr. Laufman should be able to serve in it as soon as possible."

Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, said the lack of permanent leadership at the Pentagon inspector general's office has "diminished the role of the office."

"Something needs to happen," she said. "Gridlock is not an option."

Laufman has won fans among others in the inspector general community, notably Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. "I've met David Laufman, and he's explained his vision for oversight in Iraq. He would be an excellent IG," Bowen said in a statement.

Congress recently passed legislation that would terminate Bowen's office by October of next year and turn over the job of overseeing Iraq's reconstruction to other inspectors general -- notably the Pentagon's.

The move to eliminate Bowen's office was spearheaded by Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. But members of both parties have objected. Yesterday, a bipartisan group of senators and House Democrats introduced competing versions of legislation that would extend the life of the office.

The Senate version would keep the special inspector general in business into 2008; backers of House language say their bill would prevent the office from expiring until well into 2009.

"There is no question that the Special Inspector General's office has proven to be a much-needed watchdog, auditing reconstruction contracts in Iraq and spotlighting numerous cases of waste, fraud and abuse," Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said in a statement. "We must keep the watchdog on the job."

Pentagon Lacks Independent Watchdog (AP-Y)

By John Solomon, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

The Pentagon has been without its chief watchdog for more than a year, even as the military spends billions of dollars a month in Iraq and controversy simmers over warrantless surveillance, missing weapons and friendly fire deaths.

President Bush's nominee for the inspector general job is being held up because answers he gave lawmakers have raised concerns with a key senator about his independence.

The inspector general's job was created by Congress more than a quarter century ago to be an independent watchdog to investigate fraud, mismanagement and abuses like the infamously overpriced hammers and toilet seats that became past symbols of Pentagon waste.

The Defense Department's last inspector general, Joseph Schmitz, stepped down in August 2005, and Bush named David Laufman, a federal prosecutor with GOP credentials, to take over the job months ago.

In the interim, the office has been run by an acting inspector general, and it has been criticized as being slow to get staff on the ground to investigate Pentagon issues in Iraq and as shying away from examining the National Security Agency's electronic surveillance program.

Laufman's nomination came to a halt after he testified to the Senate Armed Services Committee this summer that the inspector general's law requires him to consult with the defense secretary before embarking on cases involving national security and other sensitive matters.

Career employees inside the inspector general's office alerted Democratic Sen. Carl Levin's office that such consultations would be a major departure from current practice. They said they had discussed their concerns with Laufman but could not change his mind.

Levin, D-Mich., who probably will take over as chairman in January when Democrats assume control of the Senate, said Laufman's willingness to talk to the secretary jeopardized his independence.

"I have real problems with that appointment," Levin said Monday, adding that he "will continue to oppose that nomination."

Levin was correct that the current inspector general office hasn't been consulting that way. Laufman was correct in noting the federal law's language suggests he should.

The senator also is challenging Laufman's veracity because career employees said they raised concerns about the issue with Laufman. Laufman testified he shared his answers with the career staff but could not recall getting any feedback on the issue.

There has been no action on the nomination since, leaving the Pentagon's top watchdog job vacant.

Levin declined to be interviewed, but his office says he has serious reservations about the nomination. The current committee chairman, Republican John Warner of Virginia, is checking with senators this week to see if there is enough support for Laufman to proceed.

Laufman, a veteran prosecutor who won accolades for convicting a Virginia man of plotting to kill Bush, is now taking the offensive in trying to convince lawmakers he'd be the independent investigator they want.

"For too long, there has been a void of aggressive oversight and accountability at the Department of Defense — precisely when we've needed it the most," he told The Associated Press. "It's time to put politics aside and bring new leadership."

Laufman has brought to senators' attention a directive — renewed in 2004 by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's office — that requires the inspector general's general counsel office to be staffed by lawyers who work for the secretary, rather than independently hired lawyers.

Laufman is promising to try to reverse that order to increase the watchdog's independence.

Likewise, Laufman has told senators he wants to aggressively investigate the friendly fire death of former pro football player Pat Tillman and is willing to examine the NSA's anti-terror surveillance program.

The inspector general "has the necessary jurisdiction to investigate the NSA electronic surveillance program," Laufman assured senators, adding he'd first want to study the matter before deciding whether and how to investigate.

Finally, Laufman said he would model himself after Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction whose investigations of lost weapons and wasteful spending during the Iraq war have rankled the Bush administration.

"The outstanding work done by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, particularly under extremely difficult circumstances, is a model of what real oversight is about," Laufman said. "If confirmed, I look forward to partnering with Mr. Bowen and serving as a force multiplier for oversight on Iraq."

Before joining the Justice Department, Laufman served on two investigations that cleared Bush's father's administration of wrongdoing, and he later served on the bipartisan panel that toughened House ethics rules in the mid-1990s.

His nomination is getting support from fellow inspectors general, including two credited with aggressively pursuing the Bush administration.

"David is the prototype for an IG," said Interior Department inspector general Earl Devaney, whose own investigation exposed aspects of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. "His investigations and his background are filled with opportunities that demonstrated his integrity."

Devaney said the lengthy vacancy of the Pentagon inspector general job also should worry people. "It is too important a job, and having the cop on the beat is just something remarkably logical," he said.

Added Bowen: "I've met David Laufman, and he's explained his vision for oversight in Iraq. He would be an excellent IG."

Pre-Holiday Menu: Legislative Buffet Or Duck (WP)

By Shalaigh Murray

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

When Congress bolted a month before the election, lots of unfinished business was left behind. As in, almost all the fiscal 2007 spending bills, and measures to extend tax breaks, expand energy production and increase trade with Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0093918

Lawmakers streamed back to the Capitol yesterday for the first week of a post-election session that could extend until nearly Christmas. The calendar this week is packed with activities, such as leadership elections in both chambers and for both parties, new member photo ops, and swan-song speeches by defeated incumbents.

A few votes are expected here and there. The House last night failed to pass an agreement granting permanent normal trade status to Vietnam. The Senate plans to take it up in the next few days, barring several outstanding glitches, including an objection from Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). President Bush wants the Vietnam deal done by the time he arrives in Hanoi this week for an economic summit with Asian leaders.

Another priority is Senate passage of the U.S.-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation bill, permitting the U.S. to export nuclear technology to India. The measure is the centerpiece of an effort to strengthen relations between the two countries and has strong bipartisan support. Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) included the pact as No. 2 on his three-item lame duck wish list, delivered last week to outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

Reid also pressed for action on a package of tax-break extensions, including a state sales tax deduction, research and development credit, and changes to the alternative minimum tax, all due to expire unless Congress acts soon. The package stalled before the election because the House and Senate could not agree to its contents.

If Congress is around long enough, GOP leaders hope to complete legislation to expand offshore oil and natural gas production, although key differences remain between the House and Senate versions of the bill. The gap is likely to take several weeks to bridge, House and Senate aides said.

Sometime before Friday, Congress must pass a continuing resolution to keep the government operating until the fate of nine outstanding spending bills is determined. That is not expected until after House Republicans hold their leadership elections on Friday.

House and Senate appropriators will need at least three weeks, and more likely four, to hash out final versions of the nine bills, said House Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield. And that is regardless of whether the bills are bundled into an omnibus package, or negotiated separately.

The other option is to pass a continuing resolution through January and make fiscal 2007 spending the Democrats' problem. Many members will be tempted to adjourn as quickly as possible in December, but punting means that scores of earmarks and bigger GOP initiatives would be sacrificed. Republicans are typically more generous toward defense and energy-related programs.

Also at loose ends is funding for the Interior Department. The chairmen of the House and Senate appropriations subcommittees that oversee the agency were defeated: Rep. Charles H. Taylor (R-N.C.) by Heath Shuler and Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) by Jon Tester.

Reid and Frist discussed the spending bills yesterday and agreed to try to push them through in December, Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. Others are skeptical that the outgoing GOP leadership will follow through on such a demanding and protracted assignment.A Fleeting Photo Op

There were smiles all around when Reid greeted eight of the nine new members of the Senate Democratic caucus. The group will not be sworn in until January, but the incoming senators showed up yesterday to take in their new surroundings. One item on the afternoon agenda: a photo session in the Nevada Democrat's office. Reporters and camera crews crammed in, and the leader agreed to take one question.

The topic was Iraq. Reid ticked off the challenges. The U.S. military "is in a state of distress," he said, and some units are deployed without being "battle ready." Iraq has "less oil, less water, less electricity than before the war," he continued. As Reid talked, the smiles slowly faded in the semicircle of incoming senators.Surprising Job Offers

And the congressional boss of the year award goes to . . . Rep.-elect Tim Mahoney (D), who won the Florida seat vacated by Mark Foley (R). Despite the inglorious end to his predecessor's House career, Mahoney hired several former Foley staffers to continue working in his district office. "They will ensure continuity and strong support for the district's residents," Mahoney said in a statement.

GOP Dilemma On Spending Bills: Pass Or Punt? (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

While Democrats are celebrating on the other side of the finish line, the soon-to-be-ousted Republican majority seems to be having a hard time summoning the energy to complete the race to the end of the 109th Congress.

With fiscal 2007 funding for 13 Cabinet departments and an array of independent agencies still unsettled, the demoralized House GOP leadership is deciding how to wrap up what Democrats labeled their "do-nothing" Congress with as little rancor as possible. In fact, some are even floating the notion of punting the tough spending issues to the 110th Congress, when a newly installed Democratic majority will be on the hook for negotiating the tight spending limits — and the ones who'll take the political hits.

"I don't think these guys have the stomach to make these decisions right now," said one House GOP aide of the party's post-election mood.

The idea of passing a long-term continuing resolution that keeps the government running until early next year under current spending limits is being discussed, from both a fatigue standpoint and as a strategic move to start pushing the notion of tax-and-spend Democrats early in the 2008 election cycle.

"Strategically, getting the new House Democrats on the record on spending bills as early as possible would be a prudent way to go," said one House Republican leadership staffer. "It's in the Democrats' best interests to try and get [appropriations] off the table, and it's in our best interests to keep it on the table."

Of course, outgoing House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) doesn't exactly see it that way.

"Our preference is to complete our work," said Lewis spokesman John Scofield. "We think we can get them done in a fairly transparent and fiscally responsible fashion."

However, Scofield acknowledged that the House GOP leadership will make the call on how matters will proceed — a decision that likely will be made early this week.

"There's so much up in the air right now," said the House Republican leadership staffer. "More stuff will be known as we get going later in the week."

Meanwhile, Senate Republicans say they are continuing to lay the groundwork for finishing 2007 appropriations before the end of the year, but caution that if Democrats throw up too many roadblocks to completion, "we're not going to fight them," said an aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

By bringing the military construction and Veterans Affairs spending bill to the floor this week, Frist is hoping to set the stage for passing a few more spending bills individually through the Senate before starting to compile a catch-all, or omnibus, spending bill, aides said.

At least two other Senate appropriations bills — Energy and water, and related agencies; and State, foreign operations and related programs — are ready for floor action and could be brought up this week, said several Senate GOP aides.

However, the ability of Frist to bring those bills up depends in large part on how many amendments the military construction bill draws and whether Senators view the bill as their last chance to offer new spending projects on the floor.

"It depends on whether the leaders of both parties can convince their rank and file that this is not the last train moving," said Jenny Manley, spokeswoman for Senate Appropriations Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.).

But even if the Senate is able to pass the nine spending bills it has yet to take up, an omnibus measure remains highly likely, given the limited amount of time left in the year for the House and Senate to individually send those bills to conference. So far, Congress has sent the president only two of its 11 spending bills.

While Cochran opposes having to cobble the bills together into an omnibus, Manley said he was being realistic about his limited ability to pass every bill separately.

"The only irresponsible thing to do would be to not act on the bills at all this year," she said.

The uncertainty surrounding the GOP plans for spending bills even extends to the CR it is slated to pass this week to keep the government running through the Thanksgiving holiday. While some Senate aides talked last week of a CR that lasts until Dec. 8, both House and Senate appropriations aides said that issue is unsettled, with some pushing for the CR to last until Dec. 15 instead. Either way, a lame-duck session that lasts until Dec. 22 appears highly likely. The current CR expires Friday.

GOP leaders also will have to make a decision during the lame duck on what to do with a package of middle-class tax cuts that expire at the end of the year.

Though the gambit already failed earlier this year, Frist had continued to vow to only take up the tax extenders package as part of a bill to partially repeal the estate tax and raise the minimum wage. But the Frist aide said the controversial estate tax portion likely would be jettisoned to smooth passage of the tax cut extenders, which, the aide added, could still move with a minimum-wage increase.

Efforts also will begin to try to persuade House leaders to take up a Senate-passed offshore oil drilling bill that had been blocked in part by House Resources Chairman Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), who lost re-election last Tuesday. Pombo had pushed for a larger, more controversial energy bill that Senate leaders said could not pass that chamber.

If the House takes up the Senate-passed drilling measure and passes it, it could be sent directly to the president without having to first stop in a House-Senate conference committee.

DOJ_NMG_0093920

In the meantime, both the House and Senate plan to act on a Vietnam trade bill this week, and the Senate is gearing up for debate on a U.S.-India nuclear technology deal.

Congress Reconvenes After Democratic Win (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, November 14, 2006

Lawmakers present and future mingled in the Capitol's marble hallways Monday as Republicans exiled from power in last week's elections glumly opened a lame-duck session and wide-eyed Democrats prepared to take over Congress.

Losing majorities in the House and Senate last week, Republicans of the fading 109th Congress still faced weighty work before year's end: keeping the government in operating funds, voting on a trade agreement with Vietnam and confirming a new defense secretary.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who is considering a bid for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008, envisioned Congress meeting three more weeks this year, this one and the first two weeks of December.

He urged Republicans not to be discouraged by this "time of transition" — and to listen to the voters who ousted them from power.

"Change can be tough," said Frist, R-Tenn., whose self-imposed 12-year term limit in the Senate comes to an end in seven weeks. "That is a very powerful message from the American people: Move forward and move forward together."

Bipartisanship was more a matter of pragmatism, noted Frist's successor.

"We can't accomplish anything as Democrats standing alone. As we've shown, the Republicans couldn't accomplish theirs standing alone," said Democratic Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, who will become the new majority leader in January.

Returning lawmakers had company from more than 50 House members-to-be and most of the 10 senators-in-waiting. The incoming freshmen attended orientation meetings Monday and embarked on toast-of-the-town schedules — from private tours of the Capitol and the White House to dinner with Frist and a reception with President Bush.

But it wasn't out with old, in with the new just yet.

A lame-duck session could last until Dec. 22 with a two-week break for Thanksgiving. On their agenda is nine spending bills, reviving popular business and middle-income tax breaks, trade agreements with Vietnam and Peru; bioterrorism legislation and giving doctors a reprieve from billions of dollars in scheduled Medicare payment cuts.

The Senate started work Monday on a spending bill for veterans and military construction, while the House took up the Vietnam trade bill ahead of Bush's scheduled visit to the country Friday.

The atmosphere Monday echoed 1994, when Congress briefly returned after the GOP landslide to ratify a trade bill. Then, there were dozens of the "living dead" — Democratic lawmakers who lost re-election bids — who returned to Washington still smarting over their losses. There are at least 26 defeated Republican incumbents in that situation this year. Ten races, all in the House, are still undecided.

"I regret that I will not be a part of" the next Congress, Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., said during debate on the trade bill. A fixture of the House for a quarter century and a chief author of the welfare reform law, Shaw was on the verge of ascending to the chairmanship of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee before he was toppled by Democrat Ron Klein and other incumbent Republicans faltered.

Away from the television lights, other drama emerged as the House speaker-to-be, Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., prepared to take the reins of the House and Reid did the same in the Senate.

The behind-the-scenes agenda included leadership elections and jockeying for committee and subcommittee chairmanships in the next Congress, exposing divisions on both parties.

On the Democratic side, politicking is under way for party leadership elections scheduled for Thursday. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a Marine Corps veteran and hawk on military issues who became the darling of the anti-war movement after calling for a U.S. pullout from Iraq, is running against Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland to be majority leader.

Pelosi is backing longtime ally Murtha in the majority leader race. Hoyer is an old Pelosi rival dating back to a bitter 2001 leadership race.

House Republicans also face leadership contests, with three lawmakers hoping to succeed Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., as the GOP leader. Hastert said last week that he doesn't want to be minority leader.

Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, now No. 2 to Hastert, is favored to get the job, but he faces challenges from Mike Pence, an ambitious conservative from Indiana, and from Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, a 12-term Texan mounting a long-shot bid.

Hopes For The Lame Ducks (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

THERE IS A REASON why they call the congressional session that began Monday "lame duck." Not only does it include several Republican incumbents who will be limping away from Capitol Hill when the 110th Congress convenes on Jan. 3, 2007; but the days are also numbered for Republican control of the Senate and House.

"Lame" does not, however, mean "paralyzed." There is bipartisan support for a postelection session in which Congress catches up on unfinished appropriations and completes work on sensible initiatives such as tax credits for research and development.

And both parties seem eager to usher in a new era at the Pentagon — and in Iraq policy — by holding confirmation hearings this year for Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to replace Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld. As long as the hearings are thorough enough to clarify Gates' views on the choices in Iraq and on the proper relationship between civilian and military authority, they should take place this year. The Senate can devote more time to scrutinizing Gates if it ignores the president's reprise of his failed attempt to secure confirmation of the diplomatically challenged John R. Bolton as U.S. representative to the United Nations.

But divisive matters that can be left until next year should be left until next year. That includes energy legislation, which in the House has taken the unattractive form of a bill sponsored by Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy) that would indiscriminately open up coastal areas for oil drilling.

The best candidate for "wait till next year" treatment is the effort to legalize the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping on Americans suspected of contacts with foreign terrorists. The House-approved bill essentially rubber-stamps the program while requiring notification of Congress. But the Senate has yet to decide among three bills, all of which (believe it or not) were approved by the Judiciary Committee.

By far the best of the three bills is legislation co-sponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that would bring the NSA program under the purview of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which was created to oversee exactly this kind of activity. (The bill would actually make it easier in an emergency for the NSA to bypass FISA's requirements for a court order.) But even if the lame-duck Senate endorsed the Feinstein-Specter approach, there is no guarantee that a conference committee would have time to meet, much less craft a compromise that would balance privacy rights and the need for greater vigilance of suspected terrorists.

The NSA is continuing its surveillance while the administration appeals a federal judge's finding that the program is unconstitutional. So there is no reason for this Congress to rush to judgment on a controversial issue better left to the Congress elected on Nov. 7.

Budget Deficit Widens To $49.29 Billion (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Paced by record monthly spending and revenues, the federal government ran a deficit of $49.29 billion in October, up 4.3% from a year earlier, the Treasury Department said.

Treasury's monthly budget statement shows outlays were $216.98 billion last month, up 10% from a year earlier. Government receipts in October were $167.69 billion, up 12% from a year earlier.

Both receipts and outlays were records for the month of October, the Treasury said, while noting the government has run a deficit every October since 1954.

The Treasury also revised the government's September surplus to $56.16 billion from a previously reported $56.03 billion.

The October deficit figure was in line with the Congressional Budget Office's estimate of a $49 billion deficit. The White House has projected the budget deficit for fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1, will total $339 billion, about one-third larger than the past fiscal year.

The CBO has projected a $286 billion budget gap for the fiscal year, and private-sector analysts also expect less government red ink.

Individual income-tax receipts totaled $86.22 billion in October, up 15% from the same period last year. Corporate income taxes totaled $9.35 billion last month, up 53% from the same period in 2005.

The government paid net interest in October on the federal debt of $18.95 billion. Net interest on the federal debt excludes interest paid on nonmarketable government securities held by federal trust funds, such as Social Security.

The Treasury said it plans to release budget data for November on Dec. 12.

HHS Chief Opposes Negotiation Of Medicare Drug Prices (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0093922

By Kevin Freking

The Washington Post/AP, November 14, 2006

The nation's top health official said yesterday that the government should not negotiate Medicare drug prices, a position that sets the stage for an early confrontation with the incoming Democratic Congress.

"The idea of the government negotiating drug prices really isn't about the government negotiating drug prices," Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said. "It's a surrogate for a much larger issue, which is really government-run health care."

About 22.5 million seniors and the disabled are enrolled in private insurance plans subsidized by the federal government. The insurers negotiate with pharmaceutical companies over how much they will pay for drugs covered by their plans.

But Democratic lawmakers have promised a new approach when they take control of Congress in January. They would let the federal government use its massive purchasing power to negotiate the price of drugs used by Medicare beneficiaries. They say that such leverage would produce substantial savings that could then be used to improve the overall program.

Leavitt said Democrats should focus their efforts next year on issues where there is broad agreement, such as expanding basic health insurance coverage.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who is likely to be the next speaker of the House, has said she would quickly push for the government to negotiate lower drug prices.

"Requiring the federal government to negotiate on behalf of seniors would generate significant savings, savings which could be used to close the gap in coverage -- or 'doughnut hole' -- that threatens millions of Medicare beneficiaries this year," Pelosi said.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said, "We want to work with Republicans on health care as well as other issues, but misleading rhetoric about 'government-run health care' does not help. . . . Democrats are proposing common-sense improvements to the complex Bush prescription drug program."

Some Democrats also will urge the government, in addition to negotiating drug prices, to run a drug program that would compete with plans provided by the insurers. Democrats have predicted that seniors would flock to the government-run plan.

Leavitt disagreed. He said the government could not develop a plan that would satisfy the needs of a broad range of consumers.

Lowering Medicare Drug Prices (NYT)

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

Michael Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, says he does not want the power to negotiate drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, but Democrats should give it to him anyway.

The Democrats have pledged to move on the issue as soon as they take control of Congress. If they succeed, it would allow an important test of the hypothesis that government negotiators can wring lower prices from the manufacturers than those obtained by the private drug plans and pharmaceutical benefit managers that currently negotiate on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries.

The 2003 Medicare drug law — written by a Republican-dominated Congress in thrall to big drug company contributors — explicitly prohibits the federal government from negotiating drug prices or establishing a list of preferred drugs.

The Democrats are only beginning to explore what they want the government to do. Some advocates want the government to mandate hefty discounts for all Medicare drug purchases — an approach that some experts fear could deprive the industry of revenues needed to develop new drugs. Others would have officials step in only when private plans prove inept or when there is no alternative to a high-priced drug.

The approach that most appeals to us would direct the secretary of health and human services to set up one or more government-operated drug plans to compete with the private plans. That could be started while the new Congress holds hearings to examine broader possibilities.

There is no guarantee that government negotiators would do better. Medicare's chief actuary concluded last year that the government would be unlikely to get bigger discounts, and the head of the Congressional Budget Office judged in 2004 that for most drugs that was true. Some experts believe the government would not press manufacturers hard, because of the lobbying clout of the pharmaceutical industry and of Medicare beneficiaries seeking access to the newest (and most expensive) medicines.

Right now, private plans are not doing all that well at obtaining discounts for their clients. Surveys by House Democrats, consumer groups and academic experts have found that the prices charged to beneficiaries when their coverage runs out — a rough surrogate, perhaps, for what the plans actually paid for the drugs — are significantly higher than the drug prices negotiated by the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Medicaid program for the poor, and foreign governments, among others.

President Bush might be inclined to veto any bill that tried to insert the government into price negotiations. But if presented with a bill to set up government-operated drug plans to go head to head with the private plans, he would have to explain why he is afraid of a real market competition.

In Backing Murtha, Pelosi Draws Fire (WP)

Her Ethics Vow Is Questioned

House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi's endorsement of Rep. John P. Murtha's bid for House majority leader set off a furor yesterday on Capitol Hill, with critics charging that she is undercutting her pledge to clean up corruption by backing a veteran lawmaker who they say has repeatedly skirted ethical boundaries.

Pelosi (D-Calif.) directly intervened in the heated contest between Murtha (D-Pa.) and House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) on Sunday by circulating a letter to Democratic lawmakers. The letter voiced her support for Murtha and put her prestige on the line in a closely fought leadership battle. Some Democratic lawmakers and watchdog groups say they are baffled that Pelosi would go out of her way to back Murtha's candidacy after pledging to make the new 110th Congress the most ethical and corruption-free in history.

Murtha, a longtime senior Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, has battled accusations over the years that he has traded federal spending for campaign contributions, that he has abused his post as ranking party member on the Appropriations defense subcommittee, and that he has stood in the way of ethics investigations. Those charges come on top of Murtha's involvement 26 years ago in the FBI's Abscam bribery sting.

"Pelosi's endorsement suggests to me she was interested in the culture of corruption only as a campaign issue and has no real interest in true reform," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), a Democratic-leaning group. "It is shocking to me that someone with [Murtha's] ethics problems could be number two in the House leadership."

"People have known about these things for months," said one Democratic House member who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not want to anger the presumed incoming speaker. "I am sure they are going to become much more important in the next few days."

Andrew Koneschusky, a spokesman for Murtha, declined to discuss ethics issues, saying: "We are focused on the future. We are focused on electing the best candidate to lead our party and deliver the change the American people want, and that is Jack Murtha. We are looking forward, not backward."

Pelosi said in her letter that she was swayed to endorse Murtha, a longtime ally, by his early call for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq. Pelosi aides and Murtha supporters said the charges against him are trivial or untrue. A senior Pelosi aide conceded that her endorsement is risky but said that she had to show her loyalty to Murtha, who has been steadfastly loyal to her.

As for the ethics issue, "there's no substance to it," said Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Calif.), a strong supporter of Murtha.

At issue is Murtha's relationships with two defense lobbyists. Paul Magliocchetti of the PMA Group is a former aide to the lawmaker, and Robert "Kit" Murtha is his brother and was a senior partner at KSA Consulting from 2002 to 2005.

The PMA Group has become the go-to firm to approach Murtha as ranking Democrat on the Appropriations defense subcommittee, CREW charges. In the 2006 defense appropriations bill, PMA clients reaped at least 60 special provisions, or "earmarks," worth more than $95 million.

The PMA Group and its clients have been top campaign contributors for Murtha: $274,649 in the 2006 campaign cycle, $236,799 in the 2004 cycle and $279,074 in the 2002 cycle, according to CREW's tallies.

After Kit Murtha joined KSA Consulting in 2002, one of his first clients was a wireless networking company called Aeptec Microsystems Inc., which was seeking to build a business complex in Murtha's district with a Pennsylvania state grant. Aeptec executive Michael Hoban contributed $2,000 to Murtha's campaign that year.

In 2004, Murtha helped secure the grant. A few months later, the Appropriations subcommittee approved a $4.2 million earmark for the company.

Murtha may be the Democratic Party's consummate dealer in home-district spending. Taxpayers for Common Sense identified more than $103 million in earmarks in the 2006 defense spending bill that Murtha requested for his home district in southwestern Pennsylvania -- nearly $80 million of which cleared President Bush's desk.

DOJ_NMG_0093924

"Hoyer gains his influence the 'regular' way," said Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "He travels, and he raises money for his leadership [political action committee], which doles it out to help Democrats get elected. Murtha doesn't bother with that nicety. For years, he has used his powerful perch as the ranking Democrat on the defense appropriations subcommittee to dole out earmarks to build influence. Hoyer raises campaign cash; Murtha taps the taxpayer for influence."

Former congressman Chris Bell (D-Tex.) said yesterday that Murtha helped elevate Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) to the top Democratic spot on the House ethics committee, and that Murtha and Mollohan have worked to slow the ethics process to a crawl for much of the past two years.

As for the Abscam case, Murtha was not indicted and his conduct was cleared by the House ethics committee, but he did meet with FBI agents posing as Arab sheiks and, after refusing bribes on several occasions, appeared to leave open the possibility of doing business later. Hoyer has been criticizes as well for his legislative dealings, especially for his close ties to lobbyists and business interests. But it is Murtha's record that Pelosi will have to defend, watchdog groups said yesterday.

Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha supporter, said he was not aware of the ethical issues around the lawmaker. but said they will have little impact on Democrats as they gather Thursday to choose the next majority leader.

"The bottom line is, Nancy has decided what team she wants," Capuano said. "What members have to ask themselves is whether they want a unified leadership team or a fractured leadership team. That will make a difference in the next two years."

Hoyer and Pelosi have had a strained relationship since Hoyer competed with her in 2001 for the post of minority whip; Murtha managed her winning campaign. The urge to stay loyal to the presumed new Democratic speaker -- as well as to curry favor to obtain committee assignments -- will bring a substantial number of votes to Murtha, one of his supporters said.

Hoyer supporters continue to say he has more than enough votes to prevail, regardless of Pelosi's wishes. Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) said Pelosi timed her endorsement to come out after the votes were solidified, giving a nod to Murtha for the sake of loyalty but doing little to sway the election.

"This race is already a done deal," agreed Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah).

In the Senate, Democrats will elect new leaders today and Republicans will follow tomorrow. The top two Democratic leadership positions are set. Harry M. Reid (Nev.) will remain as party leader and Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) will remain as whip, but this time they will be in the majority, not the minority. A change is possible at the No. 3 slot, conference secretary. Sen. Debbie Stabenow (Mich.) holds that position, but Senate sources said she may surrender it for a seat on the Finance Committee.

It was unclear who would succeed her, but Senate aides said it probably would be another woman. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.) will remain chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Among Republicans, Mitch McConnell (Ky.) is set to become Senate minority leader, moving into the vacancy left by the retiring Bill Frist (Tenn.). There could be a contest between two Southerners seeking to succeed McConnell as party whip. Senate insiders said Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) appears to have enough votes, but former majority leader Trent Lott (Miss.) was still seeking support yesterday.

Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.) is in line for the No. 3 post of Republican Conference chairman, now held by Rick Santorum (Pa.), who lost last week. Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) has agreed to chair the party's campaign committee, succeeding Elizabeth Dole (N.C.) after a disappointing election for the GOP.

House Dems Brace For 2nd Round (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Democrats are locked in an internal dispute over a top post that highlights the party's ideological tensions and the assertive style of their leader, Nancy Pelosi, less than a week after winning majority control for the first time since 1994.

Pelosi's decision to endorse her close friend, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, for House majority leader over her current deputy, Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, was a surprise to some. Pelosi, a California Democrat, is in line to be the first female speaker of the House.

“This is her first real decision, and it's a tough one,” says Stephen Hess, a scholar with the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank. “I think it's very risky.”

For Pelosi, the risk is that she could end up on the losing end of an intraparty fight before she even takes the speaker's gavel in January. House Democrats, including those elected last week, will cast secret ballots for leaders on Thursday.

For Democrats, the risk is that their political honeymoon will be embittered by an awkward political fight. “We Democrats hate to see this,” says Rep. Elijah Cummings of Maryland, a Hoyer supporter. “Most of us like both of them.”

Murtha and Hoyer supporters disputed the significance of Pelosi's endorsement. Cummings says, “The question is whether she'll fight for Murtha.” Rep. Gene Taylor of Mississippi, a Murtha supporter, said “she already is” by making her preference public in a letter released Sunday.

Hoyer is a tireless political strategist who raised more than $600,000 for this year's Democratic candidates and campaigned in 80 districts. Murtha, a hawk on defense and foreign policy, helped the party find its voice on Iraq when he called last year for U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq. Some Democrats think that was key to the party's victory.

“The tide changed the day Jack Murtha publicly spoke out against the war in Iraq,” Rep. Bill Pascrell, D-N.J., said in a letter to colleagues. Pascrell is backing Murtha. Even Cummings said Murtha “deserves a lot of credit” for changing the debate on Iraq.

Bruce Braley, an incoming House member from Iowa, agreed that voter anger over Iraq was “the biggest factor” in his election and that it could fuel support for Murtha. “Everybody in the caucus is impacted by how the public perceives our position on Iraq,” said Braley, who supports Hoyer. Braley said Hoyer gave him advice, helped him raise money and loaned him a staff member for the campaign's final week.

Hoyer is confident of victory. “It looks very good,” he said Monday about the contest. He insisted he will hold no grudges against Pelosi for backing Murtha.

“She's a very loyal person,” Hoyer said.

Murtha was not available for comment Monday. He released a statement Sunday that he is “deeply gratified” for Pelosi's support.

Murtha and Pelosi are an odd couple: She hews to the liberal views of her San Francisco constituents; he's one of his party's more conservative members.

Pelosi told USA TODAY in July that the two bonded when Murtha visited her office shortly after her election in 1987 and spotted a carving in coal of a miner. Mining is an important industry in Murtha's western Pennsylvania district.

In 2001, Murtha managed Pelosi's successful campaign against Hoyer to be Democratic whip, the party's chief vote counter.

Some Democrats from rural areas like Murtha's politics. “He's pro-life and pro-gun,” Taylor said.

Cummings said Hoyer deserves the leader's job “because he has crisscrossed the country trying to help Democrats” and has been a good partner to Pelosi. “They strike the right balance,” Cummings said.

Murtha has been criticized by government watchdog groups such as the liberal Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW).

In the 1970s, Murtha was investigated, but never charged, in the Abscam sting that caught some members of Congress taking bribes. His brother, Kit Murtha, is a lobbyist whose clients have received defense contracts while Murtha has been the top-ranking Democrat on the defense appropriations committee.

“How can Americans believe that the Democrats will return integrity to the House when future Speaker Pelosi has endorsed an ethically-challenged member?” said Melanie Stone of CREW.

Power Struggles Unravel Democrats' Unity (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats returned to Capitol Hill on Monday to prepare for a transfer of power in Congress, but their postelection emphasis on unity quickly dissolved into power struggles and jockeying over the spoils of victory.

Much of the squabbling stemmed from the decision over the weekend by presumed House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to endorse a longtime loyalist to be her second-in-command. In backing Iraq war critic Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania for the post, Pelosi, of San Francisco, turned her back on another Democrat who is in line for the job and is favored by many of her party's more moderate members.

In her first high-profile move after the election, Pelosi signaled that she can be expected to prize personal loyalty as she oversees the fractious party.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, whom Pelosi did not support for the No. 2 post, may have enough votes to win the job of House majority leader himself. Hoyer is the current minority whip.

"Everywhere you go on Capitol Hill today, this is the topic of conversation," said Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Atwater), who supports Hoyer. "It would have been easier for some of us not to have to exercise our independence quite so early."

The House Democratic Caucus is scheduled to select its majority leader Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0093926

Pelosi may have another problem. As the crop of freshly elected Democrats — including many younger ones who campaigned to the right of the party line — came to Capitol Hill for orientation Monday, they encountered a leadership dominated by mostly liberal, old-school Democrats.

Cardoza, a leader of the conservative coalition in the House known as the Blue Dogs, warned that Democratic cohesion would suffer if the liberals in line to head many of the chamber's key committees don't take party moderates into account. "We have to try to build a consensus, and it's not going to be an automatic, top-down way, or we'll have conflict on the floor," Cardoza said.

Despite such concerns, Democrats continued to celebrate recapturing the power they lost 12 years ago.

"Everybody's smiling, everybody's high-fiving," said Rep. Bob Filner (D-Chula Vista), who is likely to become chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Republicans, meanwhile, plunged into a round of recriminations provoked by their election losses. House leadership contests were developing, pitting more conservative party members against those who have been at the helm.

"We did not just lose our majority — we lost our way," said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who is trying to oust Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) as the GOP leader in the next Congress.

In his case against Boehner, Pence contends that public disaffection over the growth in government spending under the GOP-controlled Congress paved the way for the election losses.

The lame-duck session that brought members of both parties back to the Capitol this week will grapple with the year's unfinished business — including the need to pass a raft of spending bills that fund major government agencies. But much of the spotlight will be on the decisions that lay the groundwork for next year's session.

The transfer of power in the Senate has been marked by minimal conflict within the parties. Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, minority leader for the last two years, will be elected majority leader today. His chief lieutenant, Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, will be majority whip.

Senate Republicans are poised to elect on Wednesday a new party leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. He will replace Sen. Bill Frist of Tennessee, who is retiring.

Significantly more drama surrounds the contests in the House.

Emotions and tensions are running high in the battle between Hoyer and Murtha. As in most congressional leadership elections, the outcome hinges largely on personal relationships, not ideology. But divisions over the war in Iraq are playing a part. Murtha, known as a strong supporter of the military, emerged as a hero of the left when he became a leading critic of the conflict a year ago; Hoyer has been more hawkish.

And even though Hoyer has served as Pelosi's chief deputy, the two haven't healed the split between them caused by past leadership fights. Still, many House Democrats were surprised that she went public with her endorsement of Murtha.

A Democrat close to Pelosi said she was motivated by her loyalty to Murtha — a firm ally as she moved up the leadership ladder — and her belief that Democrats would not have won control of Congress if he had not taken the lead in ramping up the party's opposition to President Bush's policy in Iraq.

Some argued that by publicly siding with Murtha, Pelosi could undercut one of her boldest pronouncements in the wake of her party's victory — that they would run "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history."

These critics point to Murtha's brush with the law in the 1980s, when he was investigated in connection with the Abscam bribery scandal on Capitol Hill. He was cleared in that probe, but some watchdog groups have continued to question his ethics. As a senior member of the House Appropriations Committee, Murtha has been an unapologetic master of "earmarking" money for local projects — a practice the critics say invites corruption.

"John Murtha is not the right poster child" for a message that stresses ethics, said Thomas Mann, an expert on Congress at the centrist Brookings Institution think tank.

Pelosi will make another potentially divisive decision in the coming weeks when she chooses the new leader of the Intelligence Committee. Her associates say she has decided not to elevate Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, the ranking Democrat on the panel but a colleague with whom Pelosi has had strained relations.

Next in line for the chair is Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.), an African American. He is backed by the Congressional Black Caucus, but some Democrats worry that he would undermine the party's message on ethics because he was impeached as a federal judge in the early 1980s.

On other panels, Pelosi is expected to stick to tradition and allow seniority to dictate committee leadership choices. With that approach, Democrats will return the powerful positions to some lawmakers who held the jobs before the GOP takeover after the 1994 elections. Also, Pelosi has indicated that the principal forum for investigations and oversight will be the Government Reform Committee, to be chaired by Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles).

A key question is whether, under Democratic rule, committees will become throwbacks to the days when chairmen presided over insular fiefdoms that took little input from party leaders. Pelosi has made it clear that she expects panel chiefs to behave more like team players — even if she does not impose the kind of discipline enforced by former Rep. Tom DeLay when he was a GOP House leader.

"She is not dictatorial like DeLay, but she has a game plan," said Daniel Weiss, chief of staff to Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez), incoming chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce.

Pelosi Backs Murtha As House Leader (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, November 14, 2006

Nancy Pelosi, incoming Democratic Speaker of the House, came under fire from an ethics watchdog on Monday following her endorsement of John Murtha to the number two leadership post in the new Congress.

Melanie Sloan, a former prosecutor who heads Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (Crew), said Mrs Pelosi's support of the Pennsylvania Democrat did not bode well for the future Speaker's commitment to enacting ethics legislation.

Mr Murtha is a veteran lawmaker whose ties to the military have made him one of the most effective Democratic party voices in opposition to the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq.

But he has been frequently criticised by Crew over allegations that he abused his position as a member of the defence appropriations sub-committee by showing favour to a lobbying firm of a former long-term staffer and clients of Robert "Kit" Murtha, his brother.

He has also been criticised for taking advantage of earmarking, the practice of appropriating funds for government projects that benefit individual lawmakers' constituents.

"How can Americans believe that the Democrats will return integrity to the House when future Speaker Pelosi has endorsed an ethically challenged member for a leadership position? Rep Murtha is the wrong choice for the job," Ms Sloan said.

Mr Murtha's office did not return calls for comment.

In supporting Mr Murtha, Mrs Pelosi has made the forthcoming election for majority leader the earliest test of her leadership. He is competing for the job with Mrs Pelosi's current deputy, Maryland's Steny Hoyer, who claimed over the weekend to have the support of the majority of the Democratic caucus behind him.

In her letter, Mrs Pelosi credited Mr Murtha for helping to change the national debate on Iraq, making it the central theme of the election and the Democrats' victory over Republicans.

"Your strong voice for national security, the war on terror and Iraq provides genuine leadership for our party, and I count on you to continue to lead on these vital issues," she said.

But her choice could have wider ramifications for Democrats' pledge to enact meaningful lobbying and earmark reform.

On Monday Mrs Pelosi was criticised by John Boehner, the current majority leader, for claims that she has changed her position on earmark reform six days after the election.

Pelosi Draws Fire For Backing Murtha (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is under fire from fellow Democrats and outside liberals for publicly backing Rep. John P. Murtha's bid to become majority leader, saying that the presumed speaker's acts have cast doubt on her party's promise to clean up the "culture of corruption" in Washington.

"How can Americans believe that the Democrats will return integrity to the House when future Speaker Pelosi has endorsed an ethically challenged member for a leadership position?" said Melanie Sloan, executive director of the liberal group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). "Representative Murtha is the wrong choice for this job."

Most notably, Mr. Murtha was an "unindicted co-conspirator" in the Abscam scandal of the 1980s when FBI agents posed as emissaries of an Arab sheik and lured several congressmen into a Capitol Hill town house to hand out $50,000 bribes. Mr. Murtha was among those offered money, but he declined.

"I'm not interested. I'm sorry," he said, adding: "You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't."

The following year, the ethics panel in the then-Democrat-controlled House declined -- on a "near party-line vote," according to press accounts at the time -- to file ethics charges against the Pennsylvania Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0093928

More recently, according to press reports and a dossier compiled by CREW, Mr. Murtha abused his position as ranking member of the defense appropriations subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee to benefit clients of his brother, Robert "Kit" Murtha, who is a registered lobbyist. The $417 billion defense appropriations bill that went through the subcommittee in 2004 benefited at least 10 companies represented by Robert Murtha's firm, which lobbied the congressman directly, according to the group.

"Future House Speaker Pelosi's endorsement of Rep. Murtha, one of the most unethical members of Congress, shows that she may have prioritized ethics reform merely to win votes with no real commitment to changing the culture of corruption," Ms. Sloan said.

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider dismissed the concerns and said Mr. Murtha "has addressed these issues."

"Leader Pelosi will show that Democrats will change the way business is done in Washington," Ms. Crider said.

But many Democrats adamantly oppose Mr. Murtha and say Mrs. Pelosi blundered badly by throwing her public support behind a tainted figure just one week after winning so many campaigns that promised to clean up corruption in Washington.

"This is cloakroom conversation," one Democrat said. "This sends a very bad message as the first thing she's gotten involved in. The whole Abscam thing is a problem, and so is the whole wheeler-dealer thing."

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who now holds the whip position, has said he has the votes needed to win the majority-leader post in this week's elections among Democrats. Hoyer allies say he has the support of 13 of the 19 top Democrats in the House and public statements of support from at least 28 of the 40 new members.

In addition to concerns about Mr. Murtha's background, many Hoyer supporters also say they are concerned about too much power in the hands of Mrs. Pelosi and one of her closest confidants -- Mr. Murtha. Mr. Hoyer provided a counterbalance as a Pelosi rival in past leadership elections, they say, which is why so many committee chairmen-to-be support him.

Many centrist Democrats, whose ranks ballooned in the last election, also support Mr. Hoyer.

"If moderates don't feel they have a voice in the leadership, Pelosi will have a problem because the moderates will revolt," one Democrat said.

While Mr. Murtha has fewer public supporters, he's picked up one of the most influential.

"I salute your courageous leadership that changed the national debate and helped make Iraq the central issue of this historic election," Mrs. Pelosi wrote in a personal letter to Mr. Murtha. "Your leadership gave so many Americans, including respected military leaders, the encouragement to voice their own disapproval at a failed policy ... . The enthusiastic response of Americans all across this nation gave an enormous lift to our Democratic efforts, and your unsurpassed personal solicitations produced millions of dollars."

Republicans, meanwhile, sat back and enjoyed the first fight inside the new Democratic majority.

"If this is the way Nancy Pelosi plans to clean up Washington, Republicans could be back in the majority sooner than they think," said one Republican staffer.

Backing This Hopeful For No. 2 Job Is Risky For Incoming House Speaker (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — The intensifying fight for the No. 2 Democratic leadership job in the House is evolving into an early test of the power of the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, after her decision to throw her public support behind Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Murtha, widely considered an underdog to Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the current second-ranking Democrat, sought on Monday to use a new letter of support from Ms. Pelosi to gain ground, asking for new pledges from Democrats who converged on Washington after their decisive midterm election victory.

Mr. Murtha and his allies said the role he played in questioning the war in Iraq had helped legitimize Democratic opposition to the war and turn it into a winning campaign issue, making him the natural choice for majority leader at a time when Iraq policy will dominate Congress.

“When the public speaks, things are going to change,” Mr. Murtha, a decorated Vietnam veteran, said on Monday.

Mr. Hoyer and Mr. Murtha are similar in some respects, both veterans of the byzantine appropriations process and skilled in winning money for local projects in the annual spending bills. While Mr. Murtha has been closely allied with Ms. Pelosi against the war, he is well to the right of her on many social issues like abortion and gun control and is known for his ability to work with conservatives in both parties. Mr. Hoyer is more liberal over all on social issues but is considered a pro-business Democrat.

While Mr. Hoyer has been a fixture in the party leadership, Mr. Murtha eschewed the spotlight and seemed content to wield his considerable influence well behind the scenes until he took a highly publicized stand against the war.

DOJ_NMG_0093929

But Mr. Murtha is also coming under the spotlight on another subject that dominated the campaign: Congressional ethics. He helped block changes in ethics policies that Democrats proposed last year. He has also been an astute backroom-deal maker known for trading votes for the pet projects known as earmarks. He has had family members who lobbied on issues under his control, and he was caught up in the Abscam corruption scandal more than 25 years ago, though he was never charged.

The leader of one watchdog group said Monday that Mr. Murtha's record should disqualify him for the No. 2 job, particularly since Democrats campaigned so hard against Republican corruption and have promised to make new ethics and lobbying rules a priority.

"How can Americans believe that the Democrats will return integrity to the House when future Speaker Pelosi has endorsed an ethically challenged member for a leadership position?" asked Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a Democratic-leaning group that focuses on government integrity. "Representative Murtha is the wrong choice for this job."

Mr. Murtha dismissed the attack and promised that, if elected majority leader, he would help formulate a strict ethics policy. "Wait until you see the ethics package we support and we pass," he said. "No meals, no trips, nothing. I support it 100 percent."

Mr. Hoyer, who learned of Ms. Pelosi's letter of support for Mr. Murtha while he was courting new Democratic members at a reception on Sunday, said he did not expect much of a shift in votes as a result of what he described as her low-key endorsement.

"We have seen no sign of that," Mr. Hoyer said.

He and his allies say he has well more than a majority of Democrats pledged to back him in Thursday's election, providing a cushion to account for any lawmakers who might stray in the secret ballot.

Mr. Hoyer said Ms. Pelosi, with whom he has had an occasionally tense relationship since he unsuccessfully challenged her for party whip in 2001, had already told him she would vote for Mr. Murtha. But Mr. Hoyer said many of their colleagues believed that he and Ms. Pelosi had demonstrated a strong ability to work together over the past four years.

"We got the victory," he said. "Why change?"

Ms. Pelosi's preference for Mr. Murtha had been well known since he ran her campaign for House whip against Mr. Hoyer. In the past year, she has come to believe that Mr. Murtha did the party — and her — a service by putting his own military credentials behind a call to begin removing troops from Iraq.

But the letter of support she provided Mr. Murtha was surprising, since it meant that Ms. Pelosi could be perceived as being weakened before she even takes her new office if Mr. Murtha falls short.

Ms. Pelosi's allies said she was willing to take the risk because of her deep loyalty to Mr. Murtha and since it was already assumed by many that she was working to advance his candidacy.

She and her allies have also taken the view that Mr. Murtha's scrapes regarding ethics should not be an impediment to his election. And some of his backers say the Abscam scandal of 1980 is ancient history.

In that case, Mr. Murtha was among lawmakers caught on film being offered bribes by F.B.I. agents posing as Arab businessmen. Mr. Murtha, a protégé of Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., refused a bribe, saying he was not interested "at this point." He went on to testify against some of those sent to prison, and the federal government chose not to indict him. He was cleared by the House ethics committee, but the committee counsel quit after the case was dropped.

"It was 26 years ago," said Representative Kendrick B. Meek, Democrat of Florida and a former Florida state trooper who is supporting Mr. Murtha.

Mr. Meek said he and others believed that Democrats needed a close-knit leadership team at this critical point, avoiding conflict in the crucial positions. "We need a united top shelf," he said.

But Mr. Hoyer has won support from respected veterans who are in line to take over top committees, including Representatives Henry A. Waxman of California, John D. Dingell of Michigan, Barney Frank of Massachusetts and Ike Skelton of Missouri, along with Representative John Lewis of Georgia, a veteran of the civil rights struggle. He has also won public support from leading Democratic progressives and more than 20 of the incoming freshmen.

Democrats on both sides of the leadership fight say that they wish the battle could have been avoided, in the interests of starting out together, but that such contests are a fact of life, particularly with the lure of new power.

"They happen, and we will deal with them and see what happens," said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California.

A Choice For Democrats (WP)

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093930

LOYALTY IS an admirable quality, but sometimes it can be taken too far. That is the case with the decision by the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), to offer a public endorsement of the bid of Pennsylvania Rep. John P. Murtha (D) to become majority leader. Ms. Pelosi's preference for Mr. Murtha was no secret; he managed her campaign for minority leader against Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), now Mr. Murtha's rival for the majority leader post. What was surprising was that Ms. Pelosi would weigh in publicly on Mr. Murtha's behalf, albeit -- as she pointedly noted at the beginning of her letter -- in response to his request.

On the merits, Mr. Hoyer is by far the better choice for the job. He is a moderate and highly capable legislator whose selection would reinforce Ms. Pelosi's announced commitment to govern from the center.

Mr. Murtha's candidacy is troubling for several reasons, beginning with his position on the war in Iraq. A former Marine, Mr. Murtha deserves credit for sounding an alarm about the deteriorating situation a year ago. But his descriptions of the stakes there have been consistently unrealistic, and his solutions irresponsible. Just last week he denied that the United States was fighting terrorism in Iraq, though al-Qaeda is known to play a major part in the insurgency. He said the United States should abandon even the effort to train the Iraqi army and should "redeploy as soon as practicable," an extreme step that most congressional Democrats oppose. He claimed that "stability in the Middle East, stability in Iraq," would come from such an abrupt withdrawal; in fact, virtually all Iraqi and Middle Eastern leaders have said that it would lead to a greatly escalated conflict that could spread through the region.

Mr. Murtha would also be the wrong choice as majority leader after an election in which a large number of voters expressed unhappiness with Washington business as usual. Mr. Murtha has been a force against stronger ethics and lobbying rules. He was one of just four Democrats whose votes helped kill a strong Democratic package of lobbying reforms this spring.

As a senior member of the House Appropriations Committee, he has been an avid participant in the orgy of earmarking, including numerous projects sought by a lobbying firm that employed his brother. During the Abscam congressional bribery investigation in 1980, Mr. Murtha was videotaped discussing a bribe with an undercover FBI agent. ("You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't, you know," Mr. Murtha said.) He wasn't indicted, but it's fair to say the episode raised questions about his integrity.

Mr. Hoyer says he has the support of a majority of members of the Democratic caucus. We hope they aren't persuaded otherwise by Ms. Pelosi's letter.

Reid Backed Planned Bridge Near His Land (AP-Y)

AP, November 14, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., backed funding for a bridge between Nevada and Arizona that could affect the value of property he owns nearby.

The planned span over the Colorado River between Laughlin, Nev., and Bullhead City, Ariz., got an $18 million boost in last year's massive federal transportation bill.

Reid, who's in line to become Senate majority leader after last week's election, owns 160 acres of undeveloped property in Bullhead City, several miles from the proposed bridge sites. Development is booming in the area and local officials in Laughlin and Bullhead City support a new crossing to ease traffic on the one existing bridge. They also expect it would add to property values.

Reid aides said his support for the bridge has nothing to do with his ownership of the Bullhead City property, which he values between $500,000 and $1 million on his annual financial disclosure forms. His spokesman said he had no plans to develop the property.

After the Los Angeles Times published a story on the issue Monday, Reid's office issued a five-page fact sheet in response.

According to the statement, Laughlin officials began pushing for another bridge after the nearby Hoover dam crossing was closed because of security concerns after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, pushing traffic onto a single Laughlin-Bullhead City bridge.

Reid and others in the Nevada delegation responded, securing $500,000 for planning in 2004. Reid and Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., then pushed for the $18 million in last year's $286 billion highway-mass transit bill.

A final location has not been designated for the bridge, which is projected to cost $30 million to $40 million.

"Sen. Reid's support for the bridge had absolutely nothing to do with property he owned," said the statement from his office. "Sen. Reid supported this project for one reason only — his continuing efforts to move Nevada forward."

Reid and other incoming Democratic leaders have promised to bring more openness to the practice of earmarking, where lawmakers insert funding for pet projects into legislation with little scrutiny.

DOJ_NMG_0093931

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., was criticized after it was disclosed that he sold property near his home in Kendall County, Ill., for a $1.8 million profit last year after championing a $207 million earmark in the same bill for a nearby connector road.

'Draft Cantor' Move Pondered (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

Unhappy with the current candidates, a small but aggressive group of House Republicans are agitating for current Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) to get into the race for Minority Whip, according to interviews with multiple GOP lawmakers who requested anonymity.

These Members are emboldened by what they say is a lack of support for incumbent Majority Whip Roy Blunt's (Mo.) campaign, and frustration that the popular Cantor opted out of a leadership bid in deference to Blunt, who elevated the Virginian to Chief Deputy Whip when he was a freshman.

Cantor has pledged to not challenge Blunt head-on in a leadership race — a pledge Cantor has no intention of breaking, according to sources not affiliated with Cantor's office.

"This is not Eric working this, we are honoring his commitment to Roy," said one House Republican. But "it's not fair. We don't feel like we are being given the opportunity to vote for the guy we want in there."

Cantor's office, meanwhile, emphasized his work on behalf of Blunt.

"Congressman Cantor is not in the race and is enjoying the opportunity to help Congressman Blunt," said Rob Collins, a top aide to Cantor.

"Congressman Cantor believes we need to move beyond this election to begin to define how the liberal agenda in Congress will weaken America. Mr. Cantor looks forward to working with the next Republican Whip, Roy Blunt and the rest of the leadership team to do just that."

Members interviewed for this story stopped short of officially calling it a draft movement to get Cantor in the Whip race, but they are examining Republican Conference rules governing leadership races to discuss options to get Cantor on the ballot through a nominating petition, or spark a grass-roots campaign for him as a write-in candidate for Whip.

By nearly all accounts, Cantor has significant support in the Conference, making him a likely favorite in any race. Members said they would not be working to force Cantor into a bid if they believed Blunt already had locked up the votes for his bid.

"This is a very volatile situation right now," observed another Member sympathetic to Blunt. "I am as certain as I can be that Blunt does not have the votes right now."

Rep. John Shadegg (Ariz.) is the only challenger to Blunt in the Whip race. His support is difficult to ascertain because he has not released a list of public backers, but neither has Blunt. Shadegg's bid has been aided by the perception that Blunt is not viewed as favorably in his race as now-Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) is in his bid for Minority Leader.

But Cantor would scramble the current dynamic as Members who have committed to Shadegg could jump ship if Cantor somehow gets in. "I am supporting John Shadegg but if Eric gets in the race, he's got my support," said a third Member.

Privately, Shadegg also has told lawmakers that he would maintain Cantor as Chief Deputy Whip if he is elected, according to Members.

Lawmakers who are trying to get Cantor in the race said Member-to-Member conversations picked up dramatically Monday as Members returned to town. Approximately six to 10 Members actively are discussing getting Cantor into the race, and if that support intensifies significantly, there could be an effort to ask Blunt to step out of the race.

"I believe there will be a very strong push to ask Mr. Blunt to step aside" if the support for Cantor intensifies, observed another Member. The Member said it would be a "calculated risk" because if Blunt declined to exit the race and won, it could aggravate tensions within the Conference.

Blunt's office emphatically refutes that he is considering dropping his bid.

"Congressman Blunt has spoken to every member of the Conference with the help of Mr. Cantor. They are a good team," said Burson Taylor, a spokeswoman for Blunt. "Congressman Blunt is grateful for all of Mr. Cantor's support. ... We feel very good about where we are right now."

Blunt met with more than two dozen supportive Members on Monday night in his Whip office to discuss his leadership campaign.

In other races, Boehner held a conference call with supportive Members on Sunday evening. According to sources familiar with the call, Boehner he was confident he would win the Minority Leader race, going so far as to say he could win it on a first ballot, despite facing challenges from Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.) and Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (Texas).

DOJ_NMG_0093932

Barton and Pence both met with reporters Monday to promote their candidacies. Barton outlined a nine-step program to winning back the House majority, and reiterated his "Majority Back Guarantee" pledge to return the GOP to the majority in six years or less, or opt out of a leadership bid.

The House Republican Conference will meet Wednesday and Thursday this week to give members an opportunity to hear from each leadership candidate before Friday's scheduled elections.

Additionally, the Republican Study Committee will meet Wednesday with prospective leadership candidates.

Rep. Jack Kingston (Ga.) made his plea for Conference chairman on the Internet, with a video blog outlining his credentials for the post. Kingston is in a four-way race for the chairmanship against GOP Reps. Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.), Adam Putnam (Fla.) and Dan Lungren (Calif.).

Blackburn issued a "Dear Colleague" letter and messaging strategy, focusing on her private career in sales and marketing. "For twenty years I made my living helping small and large clients develop successful outreach plans, and I both appeared in and produced local television consumer affairs segments," she wrote. "I would like to put this experience to work for our Republican Conference."

While Blackburn largely has avoided stressing the fact that many Members believe a female presence should be in the leadership team, she has increasingly noted that the Conference will need someone to put up against presumed Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). The only other woman seeking a leadership post is Rep. Kay Granger (Texas), a vice chairman candidate.

Putnam's entry into the race has made it competitive, and while some Capitol Hill observers have speculated that Blackburn would have a better shot to win if she entered the vice chairman race, her office emphatically has shot down such suggestions.

The marathon race for National Republican Congressional Committee chairman picked up some speed, with the three candidates actively courting support. Rep. Tom Cole (Okla.) sent out a memo last week, and Rep. Phil English (Pa.) sent a "Dear Colleague" letter Thursday asking for votes. Rep. Pete Sessions (Texas) also is vying to head up the campaign committee.

While this race has been ongoing for most of the 109th Congress because NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) is term-limited, the race has taken on a greater sense of urgency now that Republicans have been relegated to minority status. "If you want to win back the majority, this is the race that really matters," said one lobbyist with ties to leadership.

In the Republican Policy Committee chairman race, Rep. Darrell Issa (Calif.) launched a Web site Monday, www.gopleadership.org, in support of his candidacy against Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.), who claimed the private backing of more than 50 Members on Friday.

Hispanic Is Expected To Be The Next Public Face Of The G.O.P. (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — Senator Mel Martinez of Florida is expected to be elected general chairman of the Republican National Committee in January, party officials said Monday. That would apparently make him the first Hispanic leader of the party and address concerns among Republican strategists that the party's standing among Hispanic voters had been hurt in the fight over immigration.

Mr. Martinez, 60, who will not step down from the Senate, will serve as the public face of the party — raising money, appearing on television and helping to rebuild the party after its losses in the election last week, officials said. Mike Duncan, who has been general counsel of the committee since 2002, will be named chairman, serving under Mr. Martinez and in charge of the day-to-day operations of the committee.

The appointments will be recommended by President Bush, all but assuring their ratification when the committee meets in January, party officials said. The two men will succeed Ken Mehlman, who is stepping down as party chairman and returning to the private sector when his term ends in January.

Mr. Martinez and Mr. Duncan will effectively share the responsibilities of Mr. Mehlman under the proposed arrangement, which was described by Republican officials who requested anonymity in exchange for discussing a decision that is not expected to be announced until later this week. That would allow Mr. Martinez to stay in the Senate, where the midterm election last week left Democrats with a 51-to-49 majority.

The two-person arrangement, with a public official as the party's face — and chief fund-raiser — is not unusual. Paul Laxalt, the former senator from Nevada, was the Republicans' general chairman when Ronald Reagan was president, while Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr. was chairman.

Mr. Martinez, a senator for just under two years, was not available for comment, his aides said.

DOJ_NMG_0093933

The selection of Mr. Martinez, who was born in Cuba, would follow an election in which Republicans suffered sharp setbacks in achieving one of Mr. Mehlman's main political goals: expanding the appeal of Republicans among Hispanic voters.

The percentage of Hispanics who voted for Republicans fell to 29 percent, from 44 percent in 2004. The decline came after a campaign in which many Congressional Republicans ran campaigns calling for tough anti-immigration measures and opposed measures that would allow for some illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship.

Democrats were quick to seize on the selection of Mr. Martinez as a signal of how worried Republicans were about suffering setbacks among Hispanics, the fastest-growing part of the electorate. "One of the greatest success stories of the early Rove era was their success with Latino voters," said Simon Rosenberg, the president of the centrist New Democratic Network, referring to Karl Rove, the president's chief political strategist. "And that has unraveled for them this year."

Before being elected to the Senate in a tight contest in 2004, Mr. Martinez, a lawyer, was secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development under Mr. Bush. Mr. Martinez, who has long been close to Mr. Bush, headed his Florida campaign in 2000. Republican officials said that in turning to Mr. Martinez, the White House saw someone who was a strong fund-raiser and could be an effective spokesman for the party, filling a role that will be important at least until the field of presidential contenders becomes clear.

Also on Monday, a spokeswoman for Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, the former Senate Republican leader, announced that he would seek to rejoin the leadership ranks this week after leaving the top job four years ago in an uproar over a racially charged comment.

Mr. Lott will oppose Senator Lamar Alexander of Tennessee for the No. 2 slot of whip in an election on Wednesday. Mr. Lott had been quietly testing his support. Should Mr. Lott win, it would be a remarkable comeback for the conservative legislative tactician. He was forced out in late 2002 after joking at the 100th birthday party for Senator Strom Thurmond that the nation would have been better off had Mr. Thurmond won the presidency in 1948, when he ran on a segregationist ticket. The remark drew strong criticism as being racially insensitive.

Lott Enlists Allies For Bid (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

As he presses ahead with his under-the-radar bid for Minority Whip, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) has enlisted roughly 10 Senators representing a cross section of the Republican Conference to help press his case in what appears to be a nail-biter contest for the No. 2 GOP leadership slot.

Lott has declined requests in recent days to talk about his leadership bid, but his office now avows that the one-time Majority Leader is actively campaigning for Whip against Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.). Republican sources in both the Lott and Alexander camps said the race is very tight heading into Wednesday's secret-ballot vote of 49 Republican Senators.

"Sen. Lott is running for Republican Whip," said Lott spokeswoman Susan Irby. "His name will be on the ballot. We are closing in on victory."

Lott has long hinted at a return to leadership, but kept his campaign largely on the sidelines until after his friend, Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), then also a candidate for the GOP Whip slot, lost his campaign for re-election Nov. 7. Since then, however, Lott has been talking to his colleagues and soliciting support for the job, sources close to the Senator said.

"He's made a lot of visits, and continues to make visits," said a source close to Lott.

As part of that, Lott has tapped several of his colleagues to make calls on his behalf and help line up commitments for his bid. They include junior Senators and several veteran Republicans including Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), a high-profile Senator and frontrunner for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, several sources confirmed.

"There are about 10 guys and gals on the ground who have been asked to do one or two things," said the source close to Lott. "Obviously this is an inside game in the Senate."

One thing is abundantly clear: Lott is running his own style of race. Unlike Alexander, he has made few public comments about his campaign and hasn't yet confirmed to the press whether he actually is running for the job.

Opinions differ on the motivation behind Lott's quiet campaign strategy, but most agree he could and may still bow out if he is unable to muster up a majority to win. As it stands, the Minority Whip post is the only contested race facing the Conference this week.

"If you don't announce until you have the votes, it's safer because you can save face if you don't have the votes," suggested one GOP Senate aide. "You don't want to be the guy who went from being leader to the guy who lost to Lamar. It's a risk."

A Lott ally added: "If Lott feels he can't win, he's not running."

While Lott and his backers stress his leadership experience, political savvy and knowledge of Senate strategy and tactics, Alexander has touted his desire to bring a "fresh face" to leadership and focused his candidacy around a message of unity — he insists he has no higher ambitions beyond Whip — and helping likely incoming Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) chart a course for the new minority Conference.

Those behind Alexander argue the Tennesseean isn't in it for himself, but rather to help build up the GOP team at a time when it is arguably demoralized and shaken. Lott's supporters, however, contend it is now more than ever that the GOP needs a shot in the arm, coming in the form of experience and a proven vote counter, to go at Democrats head on.

Lott has served as Whip in both the House and Senate, winning the latter contest by challenging and beating out then-Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.). Lott moved into the Majority Leader slot in 1996, a position he held until 2002 when he was forced to step down amid controversy over remarks at a birthday celebration for the late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) that were perceived as racially insensitive.

While Senators may still remember the incident, some now insist privately that Lott was treated unfairly, especially in the face of some recent events dogging the GOP.

"In light of the treatment that [Speaker Dennis] Hastert got from the [ex-Rep. Mark] Foley (R-Fla.) case, a lot of Members view Lott as getting a really raw deal," said one GOP Senate aide.

Backers of both Alexander and Lott have kept most of their supporter's names out of the headlines, but late last week Alexander claimed the support of a majority of the 49 voting Senators for the Whip post (only Senators slated to serve in the 110th Congress are allowed to cast votes in the contest). Alexander, a first-term Senator, former Tennessee governor and one-time presidential hopeful, entered the race late last year and has been collecting votes for some months.

"Alexander is seen as a team player and also people appreciate that nobody is running for president in the leadership," said a Republican Senate staffer. "They are all pulling for the team."

Alexander would need to have at least 25 Republicans on his side to win election to post, and he stressed Monday that his strength is growing, saying: "On Thursday a majority of my colleagues had committed to vote for me for Whip. Today, I have more commitments than I had on Thursday and I'm still working to build a consensus within our caucus."

Several GOP aides suggested that Alexander probably has a majority of Republican Senators backing him, but that the race is still fluid and likely will end up being extremely close. Aides to Senators backing Alexander and Lott alike suggested Monday that the outcome could come down to three or four Senators' votes.

Another Lott ally said while the Mississippi Senator isn't likely to stand for a vote if he can't win, he "has a very good way of pulling it out and coming out on top."

Lott supporters suggested Monday that the Mississippi Republican's campaign is fueled by the GOP's newfound minority status, and a desire among many Senators bring back a tested leader and one-time Whip who can help win the chamber in 2008.

"More than ever we need that brain power," said a Republican Senate aide. "There has been such a void — it's been a while since we've had somebody who knew what they were doing pulling the levers around here."

Public Expects The Dems To Deliver (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Americans are pinning their hopes for the country's future on the incoming Democratic Congress and its largely unfamiliar leaders, the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows.

In the poll taken Thursday through Sunday, just after Democrats swept to majorities in the House and Senate, 61% of those surveyed said that they want Democrats to have more influence than President Bush on the direction of the nation. Nearly half said the country will be better off under Democrats; 16% said it will be worse off; and one-third predicted no difference.

Bush's job-approval rating was 33%, tying his second-lowest ever. The Republican Party was viewed favorably by 35% — an eight-year low.

Democrats had a 57% favorable rating, their highest since January 2004 and 4 percentage points higher than the 53% share that exit polls indicated the party's congressional candidates won on Election Day.

Joel Benenson, a Democratic strategist whose firm worked on several Senate races, said the poll underscores the message voters sent Bush. "They expect the Democratic Party to have influence with the president," he said. "They want things to get done. They think the Democrats can help make that happen."

DOJ_NMG_0093935

Wes Anderson, a Republican strategist whose firm handled independent spending for the GOP Senate campaign committee, said voters fired his party for incompetence. "The challenge for the Democrats at this point is living up to the billing," he said. "The bar is set probably higher than they want it to be set."

Democrats appear for now to have buried their image as soft on security, despite charges by Bush and other Republicans that terrorists would gain ground if Democrats won majorities. By 63%-33%, poll respondents said it is not likely Democrats in Congress will take steps that would weaken national security.

In other expectations, 6 in 10 said it is likely Democrats in Congress will raise taxes. Half said it's likely Democrats will make prescription drugs less expensive and vote to pull all U.S. troops out of Iraq.

There was skepticism about Democratic pledges to clean up ethics and cut the budget deficit. About half said it's unlikely that Democrats will try to reduce corruption; 58% said deficit reduction is unlikely.

The Democrats set to lead their party on Capitol Hill are relatively unknown. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, in line to be speaker, had a 38% favorable rating. The same percentage said they had never heard of her or had no opinion about her.

More than half said they'd never heard of Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., or had no opinion of him. The future Senate majority leader was viewed favorably by 27%.

Only 24% in the poll identify themselves as Republicans, down from 31% just before the election. That's the smallest percentage since December 1998, when only 20% said they were Republicans. The post-election dropoff is not unusual for a losing party; self-identified Democrats fell from 34% to 28% in 1994, when Republicans seized Congress.

Democrats stayed relatively constant, edging from 34% to 35%. Independents registered the largest gain, from 32% before the election to 40% afterward.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who announced his plans to resign the day after the election and before the poll was taken, shot to a record 57% unfavorable rating — up 12 points since September.

Bring On The Seinfeld Congress (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

I'm afraid the election results still haven't registered in Washington. Democrats and Republicans keep making noises about working together to accomplish great things. But that's not what Americans voted for. They voted for gridlock.

They gave Congress a Seinfeld mandate to do nothing. The Democrats offered no bold new ideas, and they were rewarded with victory. Voters would like them to mop up the messes made by Republicans, but that's it. Find a way out of Iraq, and then avoid any more excellent adventures dreamed up by neoconservatives.

Besides Iraq, the big issue bothering voters was corruption, and the best way to appease them is by working less. The fewer favors you hand out, the fewer chances to sell your vote. The smartest political move for either party would be to take a vow of abstinence by outlawing earmarks.

It's traditional in Washington to measure a Congress's success by the number of bills it passes, but that's only because of all the lobbyists, lawyers and journalists whose livelihoods depend on quantity, not quality. A do-nothing Congress is bad for the local economy.

But it's fine for the rest of the country. The prospect of gridlock has been welcomed, as usual, on Wall Street. The brief era of fiscal responsibility in Washington in the 1990s occurred only because a Democratic president and a Republican Congress couldn't agree on how to spend the surplus.

The most successful legislation of the past decade was welfare reform, which essentially repealed the damage of the do-something Congresses of the 1960s and 1970s. Most of the legislative "victories" of President Bush's first term — like the No Child Left Behind Act and the prescription drug benefit — have turned out to be expensive mistakes.

Some Democrats say they'd like to expand these programs, but they've been vague about how to pay for them — and loath to talk about raising taxes. In fact, they've said one of their first priorities is cutting taxes. They want to reduce the impact of the alternative minimum tax, which hurts people making between $100,000 and $500,000 per year, especially ones living in areas with high local taxes.

But these victims are concentrated in blue states, the very places that keep electing senators who denounce "tax cuts for the rich." Why should Republicans agree to give affluent Democratic voters a tax break? Grant them their wish for social justice. If Republicans do nothing, the alternative minimum tax will gradually hit more and more people, bringing America closer to the flat-tax system favored by Republican economists.

If House Republicans heed the election results — and polls showing that most Americans want the federal government to do less — they'll elect Mike Pence of Indiana as their new leader. He's got the fiscal do-nothing credentials, having voted against Bush's expensive Medicare and education reforms.

He has also avoided the Republicans' losing strategy of bashing immigrants. Instead of just trying to seal the border, he has proposed letting immigrants enter legally if there are jobs waiting for them. With him in charge, Republicans could work out a deal with Democrats to undo Congress's past mistakes and let market forces, not rigid quotas, determine who enters America.

It's always possible, of course, that Democrats and Republicans could agree on some radical new venture. I still like to fantasize about a grand bargain on global warming: the Republicans support a carbon tax, and the Democrats agree to refund all the revenue into new personal retirement accounts for Social Security recipients. But I'm not expecting to see them make that deal any time soon.

Whatever they do the next two years, I won't be here to kick them around. This is my last column on the Op-Ed page. I've enjoyed the past couple of years in Washington, but one election cycle is enough. I'm returning full time to the subject and the city closest to my heart: science and New York. I'll be writing a column and a blog for the Science Times section.

I hate to abandon my libertarian comrades here fighting in the belly of the beast, but this is the right moment to leave. After six years of libertarians reluctantly electing Republicans as the lesser of two evils, we've finally had enough. We've voted out big-government conservatism, and the result is the happy state of gridlock. For now, our work is done. See you in January in a new column on a new page.

Sit Down And Legislate For A While (NYT)

By Adam Clymer

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

CONGRATULATIONS to the new class of freshmen senators-elect. Please stay a while.

In the era of the short attention span, a lifetime in the Senate may be hard for baby boomers to comprehend. It's certainly a difficult notion for the news media, easily bored by public figures who have been around for a long time, and already racing their engines to start covering the 2008 race for the White House. Instead of singling out potential legislators who may someday save Social Security or raise foreign aid to a substantial level, reporters are on the hunt for future presidents.

But the United States Senate deserves more from its members, new and old, than being treated as just a line on a would-be president's résumé. The framers, after all, dealt with the legislative branch in Article I of the Constitution, and not by accident.

There are, of course, practical arguments for senators to try for the White House as soon as they can. The less time in the Senate, the fewer votes there will be for their opponents' attack ads to distort. They may also sound less like senators if they run early — before they absorb the Beltway vernacular that mistakes phrases like "amendment in the second degree" or "recommit to conference" for comprehensible English.

Then there is what I call the "elevator factor." The Capitol has tiny elevators reserved for senators, and as they are cooped up together with colleagues who have been talked about as, or have actually become, candidates, they can't help thinking, "I'd be better than him" or, these days, "her."

Senators will also seek excitement in the frozen corn stubble of Iowa because the Senate lately can be a drag. The Senate's level of partisanship is almost as bad as the House's and the filibuster, or the threat of one, is now used routinely, not just for great issues of state. And — though this is sure to change with the incoming Democratic majority — recent Senates have abandoned oversight hearings, like the ones that brought Harry Truman to national attention during World War II.

Senators are always going to run for president — they are exposed to important issues and have the egos to think they know how to solve them. But a freshman, settling down into one of those desks in the back with ancient sets of initials carved into it, would do well to recall that Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Robert Wagner, Henry Cabot Lodge, Arthur Vandenberg and Ted Kennedy, to cite a few, all influenced the nation more than most presidents do — in large part because their longevity gave them an understanding of how the Senate works and the perspective to see what it needed to do.

Sure, Senators Clay, Webster and Kennedy all tried for the White House, but not until they were established figures in the Senate. Mr. Kennedy, in fact, became a historic "lawmaker" — literally, not in the casual headline usage — only after he abandoned his hopes of the presidency.

But there aren't enough like them. Too many senators worship at the Church of the Sunday Talk Show, and then, pleased with the attention, abandon the Senate for the alternative universe of nearly full-time presidential campaigning.

This next session of the Senate is not going to solve some great national problem like energy, but it can achieve smaller but important things like last year's bipartisan (mostly Hillary Clinton and Lindsey Graham) success in getting health care for National Guard and Reserve troops and their families. If that sort of issue is beneath freshman senators, then they're in the wrong line of work.

Junior senators should look for allies, and work with them to do something useful. There are a good handful of colleagues on both sides of the aisle who take their current jobs seriously — gentlemen like Charles Grassley or Jeff Bingaman, who are worth getting to know, regardless of party. They don't make magazine covers, but with some help these diligent lawmakers might restore to the Senate the considerable institutional pride it once deserved.

So, to those freshman senators-elect pondering the need for presidential exploratory committees: Wait a while. At least a term.

Don't imitate the able but impatient John Edwards, who ran during his first term, or Barack Obama, who is apparently considering the Edwards example.

If the presidency is really your goal, Senator Clinton is a better model. For six years she has worked at being a senator. She may be using her job as a steppingstone to the White House, but she's still giving full value both to the institution and to her constituents.

After all, concentrating on the Senate doesn't mean giving up on the presidency. Though a sitting senator hasn't been sent to the White House since 1960, senators with serious records do get to be president — after those records have gotten them picked as vice president, most recently, Harry Truman, Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon.

And if senators try for the presidency (or less arduously, the vice presidency) based on records of accomplishment rather than on reputations of presumed charisma or rafts of media buzz, they will be better presidents if they get there and can have a sense of pride even if they don't.

Besides, being a good senator is what the voters last week hired them to do.

A Question Of Ethics (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, November 14, 2006

In her first statement after the Democratic takeover of the House, the presumptive new speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, pledged that her party would create "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history."

History, however, should give citizens pause before they celebrate the dawn of a new day. Pelosi's promise is eerily similar to the vows of her two predecessors.

Notably, in this election, Democrats took back the seats that they lost in 1994 when Newt Gingrich, who became speaker, led a Republican takeover based in part on his promise to create the most ethical Congress in history. Yet, ethics quickly gave way to earmarks, and Gingrich left the House in scandal.

We heard the same words from Dennis Hastert in 1999, when he became speaker. During Hastert's speakership, the leadership actually loosened ethics rules and prevented some bipartisan reforms from coming to the House floor. Hastert even engineered the removal of GOP members from the ethics committee who had voted to admonish former majority leader Tom DeLay for his misconduct — before DeLay resigned under indictment.

This history explains why lobbyists on K Street are not packing moving boxes in anticipation of an outbreak of good government. After all, these same Democrats remained silent for many years in the face of corrupt practices, often engaging in the very conduct that would now have to be prohibited.

Even so, there is one unexpected glimmer of hope: They might not have a choice. To the surprise of both parties, exit polls cited corruption in Congress as one of the most important issues motivating citizens to vote. President Bush had campaigned for some of the most corrupt members of Congress. His political adviser, Karl Rove, admitted after the elections that "the profile of corruption in the exit polls was bigger than I'd expected."

Of course, "reform" can take the most curious forms in the parallel moral universe of Congress. For example, in 1997, the mislabeled House Ethics Reform Task Force moved to prevent ethics charges rather than ethics violations. Not only did the members bar citizens from bringing charges, but both parties also entered into a secret 7-year moratorium on any ethics charges by members.

While Republicans richly deserve the lion's share of blame for the grotesquely corrupt 109th Congress, it is only fair to note that ranking Democrats have long fought to preserve and benefit from many of the same loopholes and technicalities.

Democratic whip Dick Durbin of Illinois has been criticized for accepting trips for himself and his wife that were paid for by outside groups such as the not-for-profit Aspen Institute. Likewise, the presumptive Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, was recently scrutinized for alleged ethics lapses, including a controversial land deal in Las Vegas and the use of campaign funds to give Christmas bonuses to workers at his luxury condo building in Washington.

None of this means that the Democrats cannot show that they are capable of personal change with needed political reform. Yet, the last Democratic proposals for ethics reforms contain obvious gaps that would allow the continuation of corrupt practices, including some favored by their leadership.

If Pelosi is serious about “draining the swamp,” here are 10 practices that would have to end:

•Free vacations. Prohibit travel for members and their family and staff paid by outside groups, including not-for-profit organizations.

•Playing the market. Bar members from legislating in areas where they have financial interests by closing a loophole in the definition of “outside income,” which excludes investments and stocks. Better yet, require the use of blind trusts by members (already used by executive and judicial officers).

•Quid pro quo deals. End the practice of receiving windfall private deals from partners, who then receive generous government contracts. Require recusal from any matter in which a business partner has a direct financial interest.

•Self-policing. Create an independent office of ethics in which non-members investigate and rule on allegations of unethical conduct.

•Misuse of campaign funds. Prohibit the use of such funds for any purpose other than direct campaign costs for the original recipient, barring the transfer of funds to other candidates.

•Family lobbyists. Bar members from any official contact with family members who are employed as lobbyists and require recusal from any committee with jurisdiction over issues on which a spouse or a child is a lobbyist. Enact an ethics principle that expressly condemns the employment of spouses or children as lobbyists as harmful to the institution.

•Family businesses. Strengthen nepotism rules, including a ban on the hiring of spouses and family as campaign staff or contractors.

•Gifts. Change the scope of prohibited gifts to include the use of private jets by members and catered food for members or staff. Also require the valuation of gifts by an independent ethics committee.

•Club privileges. End all special access to the floor and other areas for former members that allows them free access as lobbyists.

•Earmarks. The primary currency for corrupt practices and pork barrel projects remains earmarks — special pet projects inserted into budgets outside of the usual competitive bidding and appropriations processes. Democrats have proposed changes but not the most obvious: Ban earmarks.

Believing in Pelosi's promise is the ultimate victory of hope over experience. Indeed, Democratic proposals still fall short of a true cleaning as opposed to a quick dust and polish in the “first 100 hours.” Yet, if she implements these 10 reforms, Pelosi can prove that it is possible for reformed sinners to sin no more.

Democrats' Real Victory (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

LITTLE ROCK -- Elections provoke myth-spinning. Republicans are in danger of spinning away from a full appreciation of the magnitude of their defeat last week. Democrats could spin themselves into useless arguments rooted in the past and ignore the opportunity American voters have offered them.

Some Republicans, including President Bush's political architect, Karl Rove, are trying to say that Tuesday's vote was no big deal. Democratic gains were at or below the incumbent party's usual losses in the sixth year of a presidency, and anyway many of the Democrats elected this year are "conservative."

Republicans believe this spin at their peril.

Many who play down the Democratic gains are the very same people who said six months ago that the Democrats had no chance of winning either the House or Senate. Incumbent-friendly congressional boundaries and the fact that many of the House and Senate seats Democrats needed to win were in previously pro-Bush areas meant Democrats needed a big and unlikely surge.

The surge happened. Votes are still being tallied, but it appears that the Democrats emerged with at least as large a margin in the popular vote in this year's House races as Bush enjoyed in winning two years ago. If Rove could claim that Bush's narrow majority was part of a "rolling realignment" to the Republicans, why is a comparable majority the other way insignificant? Democrats, by the way, also have an estimated 11 percent lead in the vote totals for Senate races and a 7 percent lead in governors' contests.

The notion that this election produced a different kind of "conservative" majority is simply wrong. Yes, Democrats won in part by nominating moderate candidates in moderate areas. But every newly elected Democrat was, by any fair reckoning, somewhere to the left of the vanquished Republican, especially on Iraq and economic issues.

Moreover, voters on Tuesday sent to Congress a pack of unapologetic progressives, including Sherrod Brown of Ohio and Bernie Sanders of Vermont in the Senate, and such new House members as John Yarmuth of Kentucky, Carol Shea-Porter in New Hampshire and Dave Loebsack in Iowa, among many others.

Some Republicans say that Sen. Joe Lieberman's reelection as an independent suggests that rejection of Bush's Iraq policies was not, to use Rove's word, the "determining" factor in the election. But exit polls make clear that Lieberman won despite his support for the war, not because of it.

Connecticut voters disapproved of the war by a margin of two to one, and nearly two-thirds favored withdrawing some or all of our troops. Lieberman, who enjoyed residual affection among Connecticut Democrats, managed to carry close to 40 percent of the vote among those who favored troop withdrawals, including a remarkable 29 percent among those who favor withdrawing all our troops.

Republicans make a mistake if they dismiss the depth of the Democratic victory and the disintegration of their coalition. Democrats now control 28 of the 50 governorships, many of them in previously red states such as Arkansas, and they picked up legislative chambers in seven states.

Democrats converted one-time Bush voters in large numbers and cut into core Republican constituencies. As the National Journal's Tom Edsall has pointed out, Republicans lost ground among white men, married people and religious voters. Nationwide, one of every seven Bush voters from 2004 backed a Democratic House candidate. In Ohio, Brown won 20 percent of those who voted for Bush two years ago; in Montana, Democrat Jon Tester won 18 percent of the Bush voters. In the Ohio governor's race, Ted Strickland, the winning Democrat, won 30 percent of Bush supporters from 2004.

But victory has not prevented the revival of what feels like an ancient feud between Democratic centrists, who are emphasizing the importance of moderate voters in Tuesday's results, and those on the party's left who point to the centrality of economic populism and impatience with the Iraq war.

To which the only rational response is: Stop! Moderates were indeed central to the Democrats' triumph, because Republicans vacated the political center. But these are angry moderates. Many are unhappy about Iraq, less on ideological grounds than because the Bush policy is such an obvious failure. The new Democratic voters are a mix of social conservatives (especially in the South and parts of the Midwest such as Indiana) and social libertarians (especially in the West). Many (especially in the Midwest) are angry about the flight of manufacturing jobs overseas.

Holding this coalition together will require subtlety and an acknowledgment that the comfortable old battles of the 1980s and '90s are irrelevant to 2006 and 2008. The old arrangements are dead, a truth that both parties need to recognize.

Clinton Outlines Legislative Priorities (AP-Y)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Monday outlined an ambitious agenda of legislative priorities while continuing to deflect questions about her presumed presidential ambitions.

"I will look at the possibilities, but I ... haven't really had the time to talk to people about it," Clinton told a breakfast gathering hosted by the Association for a Better New York. "It's been a busy election season that worked out well, so I will think about it. I'm open to thoughts."

Clinton was returning to Washington on Monday to participate in a lame-duck session of Congress in which lawmakers will tackle several pieces of unfinished business before ceding control of both the Senate and House to Democrats early next year.

But the New York senator was clearly looking ahead to the next Congress, which she, like other Democrats, has vowed will operate on a more bipartisan basis than it had under Republican control.

"We are ready to roll up our sleeves and work with our Republican counterparts. Our country works best when we govern from the vital, dynamic center," she said.

But Clinton still had bitter words for President Bush and his political advisers, including lead strategist Karl Rove, for creating a polarized environment that had stifled debate or disagreement.

"Karl Rove's theory is you just take your base, and you expand your base, and you basically just role over everybody who gets in your way," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0093940

Since cruising to re-election last week against a weak Republican challenger, Clinton has parried repeated questions about her political future. While she hasn't disclosed her plans, polls show her the clear front-runner for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, with a national infrastructure of strategists and advisers and at least $10 million in her campaign account.

"Before, I didn't have time to think — I was too focused on what I was doing," she later told reporters. "I'm thrilled by the results, and now I'll have some time to think."

In her remarks, Clinton outlined a range of challenges she said Democrats would tackle in the coming months, such as trimming the federal deficit, reducing dependence on foreign oil, and improving the image of the United States abroad.

She also said Democrats would focus on improving the quality and affordability of health care — a touchy matter for the former first lady, who in 1993 led her husband's calamitous attempt to overhaul the nation's health care system. The failure of that effort helped Republicans win control of both the Senate and House the following year.

"Health care is coming back," Clinton warned, adding, "It may be a bad dream for some."

Sleepless Over Security Breaches (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

Nearly 40 percent of federal technology officials say worries about security breaches involving telecommuters cause them to toss and turn at night, according to a survey released yesterday.

Asked which security issues keep them up at night, the technology officials listed concerns about remote access to systems, violation of employee privacy and disruption of agency operations.

The survey of 200 federal technology officials was conducted in August, when outrage remained strong over the May theft of a laptop and external hard drive from the home of an analyst for the Veterans Affairs Department. Although police recovered the equipment, the theft put millions of veterans at risk of identity theft.

"Right now, the aspect of security getting the most attention is data theft associated with laptops or personal digital assistants," said Gerald T. Charles Jr., an executive with Cisco Systems Inc., which sponsored the survey.

Concerns over computer security appear to be slowing the government's efforts to increase telecommuting, Charles said. Still, he noted, agencies are rethinking how they do business as they seek to use technology to respond to emergencies or to realign their workforces, he said.

For example, the General Services Administration and the Defense Department are examining whether telecommuting can help ease the demands on office space and traffic systems that will be placed on Fort Belvoir when base-closing orders relocate thousands of workers to southern Fairfax County over the next few years, Charles said.

The House Government Reform Committee and other congressional panels have faulted federal agencies for doing a poor job of protecting their information networks and computers from hackers and viruses. In a bid to tighten security, Congress approved the 2002 Federal Information Security Management Act, which requires agencies to meet certain computer security standards and to create procedures for reporting security problems.

The Cisco survey found that getting into compliance with the law and meeting goals laid out by the Office of Management and Budget and the Congress are key priorities for federal tech officials in the coming year.

But the technology officials listed a lack of personnel, tight budgets and problems in understanding FISMA regulations as key challenges in implementing security solutions.

Federal technology officials, representing 45 agencies and the military, also reported losing sleep over inadequately trained or unconcerned employees and software flaws.

Despite their concerns, 58 percent of the survey respondents said progress is being made on computer security at their agencies.

Cisco, the world's largest maker of computer networking equipment, sponsored the survey to help guide its business strategy, Charles said.Hearing for Regulatory Czar

Susan E. Dudley, President Bush's nominee to oversee federal regulatory policy at the OMB, told a Senate committee yesterday that her writings at a think tank were sometimes provocative but should not be taken as a sign that she would try to undermine or block federal rules that seek to protect the environment and public safety.

For the past eight years, Dudley has taught and written about regulation for the Mercatus Center at George Mason University. Her critics had assailed her for comments involving air bags, arsenic limits in drinking water and workplace injuries and said her writings show that she would take a hands-off approach to regulating corporations.

DOJ_NMG_0093941

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, and the committee's Democrats expressed concern about Dudley's writings. Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) told Dudley that regulatory decisions "cannot be left to political whim or individual political preferences."

Dudley promised to enforce the law and abide by presidential directives. She described herself as "fair and open-minded" and said her writings had sought to challenge how people think about the consequences of regulation.

After the hearing, Collins said Dudley "did a good job" and demonstrated that she understands the responsibilities of the OMB regulatory post.

Collins said she intends to hold the hearing record open so Democrats may ask more questions of Dudley. The nomination should come up for a vote next month, Collins said.

Panel To Target Shell Companies (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

Officials in all 50 states will incorporate nearly 2 million companies this year without identifying the owners -- a fact a Senate subcommittee fears could help money launderers, tax evaders or terrorist financiers.

"Although the vast majority of companies formed in the U.S. serve legitimate commercial purposes, they are attractive vehicles for those seeking to launder money, evade taxes or finance terrorism," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican and chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs permanent subcommittee on investigations.

"Without company-ownership information, it is often difficult, and at times impossible, for U.S. law enforcement to identify and prosecute the criminals behind U.S. shell companies that are engaged in illicit activities," Mr. Coleman said.

A subcommittee hearing today will explore how to reduce the potential for abuse while preserving what Mr. Coleman described as "an effective, efficient system that does not derail or unnecessarily delay" legitimate businesses.

"Criminals seeking to launder money, evade taxes or commit other crimes want to cloak their actions in secrecy," said the subcommittee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan. "And right now, that's exactly what they get when they establish a U.S. shell company."

At the center of the hearing is an April report by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) that said none of the 50 states routinely requires applicants to disclose who will own a corporation and most states do not require ownership information for a new limited liability company. The report said the absence of company-ownership information enables people to conceal their identities while operating as U.S. companies.

At the hearing, officials from the Justice Department, the Internal Revenue Service and the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network are expected to testify about an increase in the use of U.S. shell companies for illicit activities and how their investigations have been impeded by the lack of company-ownership information.

The GAO report noted that U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials reported that a Nevada-based corporation received more than 3,700 suspicious wire transfers totaling $81 million over two years, but the case was not prosecuted, because ICE was unable to identify the corporation's owners.

It also said the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network found that from April 1996 to January 2004, financial institutions filed 397 suspicious-activity reports, concerning a total of almost $4 billion that involved U.S. shell companies, Eastern European countries and U.S. bank accounts.

The report also said the FBI found that U.S. shell companies are being used to launder billions from the former Soviet Union and that the bureau has more than 100 open cases investigating market manipulation, most of which involve U.S. shell companies. It said a Justice Department report found that Russian officials used shell companies in Pennsylvania and Delaware to divert $15 million in international aid intended to upgrade the safety of former Soviet nuclear-power plants.

Industrials Rise 23.45 To 12131.88 Amid Optimism (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Stocks crept higher, as investors looked ahead to what they hope will be reassuring inflation data and positive news from the Federal Reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0093942

Ahead of a stream of government reports today, the Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 23.45 points, or 0.19%, to 12131.88. It is up 13.2% in 2006, less than 50 points from the Nov. 8 record finish of 12176.54, and has risen in five of the past six sessions.

Reflecting optimism about economic growth, technology stocks were among the leaders. The tech-laden Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.70%, or 16.66 points, to 2406.38. It is ahead 9.1% this year, at its highest finish since 2001. It still would have to more than double to hit its own record, 5048.62, from March 2000.

Today, the government releases October wholesale inflation data and retail-sales numbers. The Federal Reserve is due to publish a summary of the minutes of its October interest-rate policy meeting. Consumer-price inflation numbers are due Thursday.

Hopes are high. Investors expect the inflation data to indicate that the pace of price increases is slowly falling back into the 2%-or-less annual range that the Fed considers acceptable. People think retail sales will show steady, although not eye-popping, gains ahead of what they hope will be a good holiday season. And they think the Fed minutes will contain no surprises, with most policy makers continuing to believe that, as long as inflation and growth remain moderate, interest rates can stay unchanged.

Any divergence from these expectations could send stocks lower, but lately, the economic news has been fair-to-good, and investors are hoping it will stay that way.

Investors were reassured by the continuing drop in crude-oil futures, which finished yesterday at their lowest level in more than a week. Crude fell back below $59, dropping $1.01 to $58.58 a barrel, a 4% decline for the year.

Richard Fisher, president of the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank, said the U.S. economy is "growing forcefully," which further allayed worries that the economy could slump.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock Index rose 0.25%, or 3.52 points, to 1384.42, up 10.9% this year. It, too, is far from its record, 1527.46, also hit in March 2000.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.39 billion shares, as 1,815 stocks rose and 1,513 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.607%. The 30-year bond was down 5/32 to yield 4.706%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 118.19 yen, up from 117.59 yen, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2803 from $1.2847.

Looking Back On Louis Brandeis On His 150th Birthday (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

In 1908, Louis Brandeis turned American law on its head with the “Brandeis brief.” The Supreme Court was in the midst of the notorious Lochner era, in which a pro-business majority routinely struck down laws protecting workers’ health and safety. Brandeis was defending an Oregon law that limited women’s workdays to 10 hours. It seemed likely the court would rule, as it just had in a similar case, that maximum-hours laws violated employers’ “right of free contract.”

In his brief, Brandeis devoted just two pages to legal analysis. He spent more than 100 pages setting out statistical and sociological data on the harm that long workdays did to women. His use of facts and sociological arguments was both shocking and enormously successful. The court upheld Oregon’s law, 9 to 0.

Brandeis, whose crusades against insurance companies and banks earned him the title “the people’s lawyer,” was born 150 years ago this week. He has many claims to fame: champion of the New Deal, first Jewish Supreme Court justice, creator of the legal doctrine of privacy. But it is Brandeis’s insistence on injecting facts and real-world analysis into the law that is his most lasting achievement, and one that resounds especially strongly today, when “reality-based” logic is so embattled.

Brandeis was born in Louisville, Ky., shortly before the start of the Civil War. As a Southerner and the son of a small merchant, he grew up with a Jeffersonian mistrust of big business. He entered Harvard Law School in 1875, and after graduating first in his class, remained in Boston to practice law. As a young lawyer, he co-wrote an article for the Harvard Law Review, “The Right to Privacy,” that Roscoe Pound, dean of the law school, would later say “did nothing less than add a chapter to our law.”

Brandeis was drawn to social causes. His first major victory was blocking a company from securing a monopolistic right to operate Boston’s subway system. Later, as special counsel to the Interstate Commerce Commission, he took on the railroad barons, insisting that they should not get rate increases “so long as the vicious system of interlocking directorates makes it impossible to know how much of the money is honestly and efficiently spent.”

And he fought for workers. The Brandeis brief may not look particularly progressive by contemporary standards. It emphasizes women's feeble physical condition compared with men's, and quotes such authorities as a cotton mill machine operator who told a Senate committee, "I have noticed that the hard, slavish overwork is driving those girls into the saloons." But the brief was perfectly calibrated for the Supreme Court of its day. In appealing to the justices' paternalistic concern for women, it found a chink in the court's pro-business armor.

Brandeis was so enamored of facts and real-world consequences that he found himself moonlighting as a journalist. He wrote a fine series of muckraking articles on the "money trusts" for Harper's Weekly, which were later published as the book "Other People's Money and How the Bankers Use It."

When President Woodrow Wilson nominated Brandeis to the Supreme Court in 1916, conservatives worried that he would inject radical new ideas into the law. He did, on subjects ranging from civil liberties to workers' rights. (In 1937, he was part of the five-member majority that finally ended the Lochner era by upholding a state minimum wage law.) But it was his methodology, as much as his end results, that shook up the legal world. To Brandeis, every opinion — even on a subject as mundane as whether a state can require ice sellers to get a permit — was a chance to hold forth on the case's practical importance.

For Brandeis, raw data was always key. Oliver Wendell Holmes, his distinguished senior colleague, once complained that Brandeis "drove a harpoon into my midriff by saying that it would be for the good of my soul to devote my next leisure to the study of some domain of fact — suggesting the textile industry." Holmes protested, "I hate facts," but grumpily took a government report along with him on his summer vacation.

The Brandeis brief today bears the truest mark of a transformative idea: as radical as it was in its time, today it looks thoroughly conventional. Generations of litigators were quick to adopt its approach. The civil rights lawyers in Brown v. Board of Education prevailed in large part because of their Brandeisian briefs that presented social science data on the effect of segregation on black children.

We are living in an era when facts, and rational analysis, are on the ropes. The president has been inhabiting a world, Ron Suskind wrote in a 2004 New York Times Magazine article, that scorns "the reality-based community." Congress routinely adopts policies that cater to special interests, which are then justified by the sort of smarmy, fact-free spin that the comedian Stephen Colbert has labeled "truthiness."

But courts operating on the Brandeis model have, at their best, been a check on this disturbing trend. In its proudest moments, from the civil rights rulings of the 1960s to recent decisions reining in the Bush administration's war-on-terror excesses, the Supreme Court has insisted on focusing resolutely on the facts, and on the practical effect of the challenged policies on real people.

Decisions like these are Brandeis's true legacy. His greatest lesson was that — as he wrote in a famous dissent, excoriating the majority for not letting government do more to battle the Great Depression — "in the exercise of this high power, we must be ever on our guard, lest we erect our prejudices into legal principles."

Restaurant Group Sues Over Health Plan (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 13 — A legal battle over a plan to offer free or low-cost health care to all uninsured residents here has been set in motion by a group of the city's most important and beloved constituents: restaurants.

A culinary trade group with more than 800 members has sued the city, saying a central provision of the health care program, established by the city's Board of Supervisors in July, violates federal employment law.

The group, the Golden Gate Restaurant Association, filed the lawsuit in Federal District Court here. It urges the court to strike down the part of the plan that requires businesses with 20 or more employees to pay for the cost of each worker's health care. The ordinance is to take effect in July 2007.

The association argues that the program conflicts with the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act, or Erisa, saying that the act exclusively governs the administration of employee welfare benefit plans.

"We are for health care and support expanding coverage for all," said Kevin Westlye, executive director of the association. "But there are no cost controls in this ordinance. Many businesses simply can't afford it."

Mr. Westlye said the restaurant association had worked closely with the city in developing the measure, the San Francisco Health Care Security Ordinance, which is intended to give an estimated 82,000 uninsured residents access to medical services, at a cost of $200 million a year.

DOJ_NMG_0093944

The program does not offer health insurance but rather finances the cost of services provided by hospitals, doctors and health networks. Financing would come from taxes, sliding-scale premiums and businesses, whose contributions would total $30 million to $40 million a year.

"We said that won't work," Mr. Westlye said. "That model is broken, which is why we have a national health care crisis."

The group is seeking an injunction to block only the requirement that businesses pay into the plan, "without disturbing all other lawful parts of the ordinance," the suit says. It also asks the court to settle a fundamental dispute: whether the national standards for benefit and pension plans described by Erisa apply to and trump provisions for health benefits established by the San Francisco ordinance.

The restaurant association argues that parts of the ordinance are pre-empted by federal law.

In a similar conflict, a federal judge in Maryland struck down that state's health insurance law in July. Citing Erisa, the judge ruled that the state law violated federal law by requiring an employer contribution to the plan.

San Francisco officials were aware of the Maryland case as they drafted their ordinance, said Matt Dorsey, a spokesman for the San Francisco city attorney, Dennis Herrera. Mr. Dorsey said great care had been taken to avoid the problems that arose in Maryland.

"We believe the San Francisco legislation was narrowly tailored to avoid pre-emption by Erisa," Mr. Dorsey said.

When the ordinance was being drafted, the restaurant group proposed other ways to finance health care, including a quarter-cent sales tax, Mr. Westlye said, but negotiations failed. The group then tried to draft a ballot measure, but state law prohibits establishing sales tax through voter initiatives, he said.

The group was reluctant to file a lawsuit, Mr. Westlye said, but after negotiating with city officials for a year, attending public hearings and exploring ballot initiatives, it ran out of options.

"We told them this will hit restaurants broadside; we can't afford it," Mr. Westlye said. "The answer we got back from public officials was, 'Raise your prices.' "

But with 2,500 restaurants, cafes and bistros in the city, he said, "there's only so much elasticity."

Mr. Dorsey said the city's position was that Erisa rules did not pre-empt the new health care program.

"We'll see them in court," he said.

Fla. Senator Mel Martinez To Chair RNC (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, November 14, 2006

Florida Sen. Mel Martinez, a prominent Hispanic who previously served in President Bush's Cabinet, will assume the high-profile post of Republican National Committee general chairman, GOP officials said Monday.

Martinez, 60, will remain in the Senate when he takes the reins of the RNC in January, said the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid pre-empting a formal announcement. The first-term senator will be the face of the party, focusing on fundraising, outreach and travel to promote the GOP agenda.

At the same time, Mike Duncan, the RNC's current general counsel and a former party treasurer, will be named chairman and will be put in charge of running the everyday operations at the party's Capitol Hill headquarters, the officials said.

The current party chairman, Ken Mehlman, is leaving his post in January at the end of his two-year term.

As a team, Martinez and Duncan will be responsible for leading the RNC during Bush's final two years in office and throughout the 2008 presidential election cycle.

Splitting the chairmanship in two is not new.

President Reagan once chose Sen. Paul Laxalt of Nevada to be general chairman while Frank Fahrenkopf was chairman, and President Clinton initially had Sen. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Don Fowler share the Democratic Party role in the same fashion.

Kerry Feehery, a Martinez spokeswoman, and her counterparts at the RNC declined to comment.

By tapping Martinez to be the party's public persona, the White House turned to a lawmaker who has been a staunch supporter of the president — including on the issue of comprehensive immigration reform that includes a guest-worker program — and one of the more politically savvy Republican senators.

Martinez, of Cuban descent, will fill the post as the GOP is seeking to make inroads with Hispanics, considered a swing voting group. He is one of three Hispanics in the Senate along with Democratic Sens. Ken Salazar of Colorado and Bob Menendez of New Jersey.

DOJ_NMG_0093945

In last week's elections, exit polls conducted for The Associated Press and the networks showed 69 percent of Hispanics voted for Democrats compared with 30 percent for Republicans, a decline for the GOP compared with 2004 when Bush got about 40 percent of the Hispanic vote.

Martinez served as Bush's secretary of Housing and Urban Development from 2001 until 2003, when he resigned to run for the Senate seat left open by Democratic Sen. Bob Graham's retirement.

In a race marked by hard-hitting television ads and squabbling over Iraq, Martinez was elected with 49 percent of the vote — a slim margin that was credited to Bush's win in that state.

Early in his Senate tenure, Martinez faced a politically unflattering situation.

A Martinez aide wrote a one-page unsigned memo that laid out the political benefits of getting involved in the fate of Terri Schiavo, a Florida woman whose end-of-life battle became a rallying cry for conservatives. Senate Republicans disavowed the memo. Its author resigned.

Before serving in the Cabinet, Martinez's national profile was raised as the drama surrounding a Cuban boy named Elian Gonzalez unfolded in 2000.

The top county official in Orange County, Fla., at the time, Martinez argued on national television talk shows and before a U.S. Senate committee that the boy should stay in the United States. He also invited Gonzalez to Walt Disney World before the boy was returned to Cuba.

For his part, Martinez fled Cuba in 1962 as a 15-year-old. His parents remained on the communist island, hoping one day to join him. He eventually was placed with a foster family in Orlando, studied English and worked odd jobs that helped him buy his father a used car when his parents arrived in the United States four years later.

Martinez put himself through college, earned a law degree, and eventually made millions as a trial lawyer before entering politics.

Florida Senator Will Be A Top RNC Officer (WP)

By Jim VandeHei

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), a close White House ally and a Cuban American, has agreed to become the next general chairman of the Republican National Committee, GOP officials said. The appointment comes in the wake of an election that yielded shrinking GOP support from Hispanic voters.

Martinez, a first-term senator, will remain in office and serve as the party's chief spokesman and fundraiser heading into the 2008 elections. Mike Duncan, the RNC's current general counsel and a former party treasurer, will manage day-to-day operations and be elected chairman in January, Republican aides said.

An official announcement is expected soon.

The current RNC chairman, Ken Mehlman, will step aside in January, after spending much of his tenure updating the party's technological infrastructure and reaching out to minority groups, especially African Americans and Hispanics. Exit polls last week showed that Mehlman's efforts were overwhelmed by voter concerns about the war, corruption and the hard-line approach some Republicans assumed in this year's immigration debate.

Democrats won 69 percent of the Hispanic vote last Tuesday, a 10-year high. That was seen as a big setback at the White House in particular, after Bush won 55 percent of the Hispanic vote in 2004.

Mehlman said in an interview last week that he is concerned about where the party stands with Hispanics. Hispanics are not single-issue voters, but GOP officials said the tone of the immigration debate hurt the party's standing with the fastest-growing minority group.

While Bush pushed for a comprehensive package that included a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, the Republican-controlled Congress demanded a fence-first law that emphasized security.

Exit polling showed that 57 percent of voters favor allowing illegal immigrants a shot at legal status. Martinez is a leading advocate of a Bush-style solution to the nation's immigration problems.

The selection of Martinez was a setback for Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who last week lost a Senate race and who has expressed interest in the job. GOP officials said it was not coincidental that both Steele and Martinez are minorities who have shown an ability to broaden the party's appeal. Republicans captured 10 percent of the African American vote last week, identical to the 2004 number.

It also does not hurt that Martinez is familiar with Florida, the electoral prize that has been a main arena in recent presidential elections. Martinez won election there in 2004, after resigning as secretary of Housing and Urban Development to make the run.

Martinez earned some national fame in 2000 when, as a top U.S. official, he strenuously argued before Congress and TV cameras that a Cuban boy named Elian Gonzalez should not be forced to return to Cuba. Five years later, he was again on the national stage, this time unintentionally, when a top aide of his was outed as the author of a memo detailing a political strategy for intervening to keep Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged Florida woman, alive.

The only Hispanic Republican in the Senate, Martinez, 60, is expected to focus mostly on speaking out for GOP candidates, raising money and pushing the party to broaden its reach. Duncan will be the nuts-and-bolts leader. The dual-leadership model is fairly common for modern party committees. It allows high-profile party officials to lend their experience to the committee without being consumed by managing a large organization.

Florida's Martinez Tapped For RNC Chief (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

Florida Sen. Mel Martinez, co-author of a bill to grant amnesty to illegal aliens, has been picked by White House strategist Karl Rove to be general chairman of the Republican National Committee, RNC officials confirmed yesterday.

Some RNC members greeted the news as another example of White House cronyism, reminiscent of President Bush's attempt to name his personal friend and general counsel Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court, a nomination withdrawn in response to outrage from the party's conservative supporters.

While the chairman is elected by the 165-member RNC -- which next meets in Washington in January -- the committee traditionally acts as a rubber stamp for a Republican president when the party controls the White House.

The surprise Martinez appointment, leaked yesterday to selected TV outlets and wire services, cut off a move by conservative Republicans to have Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele take over the national party chairmanship. Current Chairman Ken Mehlman announced last week he would step down at the January meeting.

While Mr. Martinez will remain in his Senate seat in becoming the public spokesman for the RNC as general chairman, committee members said, the RNC's current general counsel Mike Duncan -- a committee member from Kentucky -- will be named chairman to run the day-to-day national party operations.

Mr. Martinez "will do a first-rate job for the Republican Party," said Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican, who said he has "the highest regard for his ability and experience, and highly [supports] his candidacy."

An RNC spokeswoman said she could not officially confirm the Martinez-Duncan appointments and that an official announcement would be made in a couple of days. Mr. Martinez served as the Bush administration's secretary of Housing and Urban Development before narrowly winning a 2004 Senate race in Florida.

Some RNC members, already dismayed by last week's election that swept Republicans from control of Congress, expressed anger at the way Mr. Rove leaked his choice of Mr. Martinez immediately after a conference call in which the Florida senator's name was floated for the first time.

During the call yesterday with RNC members in which Mr. Rove, Mr. Mehlman and White House Political Director Sara Taylor participated, some members raised the names of Mr. Martinez and Mr. Duncan as possible successors to Mr. Mehlman, said an RNC member who was involved.

"But Rove and Mehlman never said they were going to name these people as chairmen, and we never voted or even gave our opinion," the member said.

The move was seen as a signal that the White House intends to push through Congress the "comprehensive" immigration bill -- which Mr. Martinez and Mr. Hagel backed in the Senate -- that was blocked by conservative Republicans in the House.

"Clearly, Martinez is going to lead the fight for amnesty that Bush couldn't win when Republicans controlled the Congress," the RNC member said.

While campaigning for the Senate in Maryland, Mr. Steele was an outspoken critic of the Hagel-Martinez measure -- which would have created a guest-worker program and allowed most illegal aliens to become citizens -- blaming "the partisan gamesmanship of Washington insiders" for the failure to deal with the problem.

"Until we see Congress take some real and immediate steps to secure our borders, we can hardly expect Americans to seriously consider proposals for dealing with those illegal immigrants already in our country and those employers who fail to adequately report them," Mr. Steele told the Baltimore Sun in August.

DOJ_NMG_0093947

Aides to the lieutenant governor confided that Mr. Steele was "furious over his treatment by Bush operatives," who they said accused him of "not being a team player" because he had spoken to The Washington Times last week after his name was first proposed for the RNC post. Steele aides said White House officials threatened to withhold from Mr. Steele a Cabinet appointment he had been promised in lieu of the RNC chairmanship.

Mr. Steele's campaign -- particularly his humorous TV ads and his nationally televised debate against Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin on NBC's "Meet the Press" -- impressed many conservative Republicans.

"Michael Steele would make a superb Republican National Committee chairman," former House Speaker Newt Gingrich told The Washington Times. "His race for the Senate was probably the most positive and most likable of any race in 2006."

"Steele ran one of the best Senate campaigns in the country," said North Carolina Rep. Patrick T. McHenry. "Steele would be great in a prominent and strategy-making spot in the party."

"Everybody I know down here who got a chance to see Steele's campaign ads thought they were great -- they had substance, and so does he," said Cindy Costa, a South Carolina RNC member from Charleston.

Two months after taking office, Mr. Martinez was involved in an incident that caused Republicans embarrassment in the Terri Schiavo case, when -- as he later explained -- he accidentally handed Sen. Tom Harkin, Iowa Democrat, a memo describing political motivations for the high-profile congressional effort to save the incapacitated Florida woman's life.

"This is an important moral issue, and the pro-life base will be excited that the Senate is debating this important issue," said the March 2005 memo, written by a Martinez aide. "This is a great political issue because Senator [Bill] Nelson of Florida has already refused to become a co-sponsor, and this is a tough issue for Democrats."

Some RNC members yesterday saw the naming of Mr. Martinez as a continuing tendency of the Bush administration to manipulate the national party.

Diversity In Cannon Fodder (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

It didn't work. The Republican Party put up three high-profile black candidates to try to weaken the bond between the Democratic Party and African Americans, and all three got slammed by the voters, big-time. After a week of reflection, maybe Ken Blackwell, Lynn Swann and Michael Steele have come to understand that they were never intended to be viable candidates. From the start, they were more like cannon fodder.

There is no reason Republicans can't someday win a big share of the African American vote. All the GOP has to do is adopt policies that most black Americans believe will work to their advantage, rather than leave them behind. Oh, and Republicans also need to drop all those coded appeals to white racists, such as the infamous "Playboy party" ad that helped defeat Democrat Harold Ford Jr. in Tennessee.

Instead of making a legitimate play for the black vote, Republicans convinced themselves that tokenism would be enough. Judging from last Tuesday's returns, they didn't convince anybody else.

Whatever Karl Rove was smoking when he issued all those hyper-confident preelection forecasts, he and other Republican strategists couldn't have seriously thought that Ken Blackwell would win the race for governor of Ohio. Blackwell's far-right views are too extreme for a state so evenly divided between red and blue, and his controversial tenure as Ohio's secretary of state -- his decisions may have decided who won that state in the 2004 presidential contest, and thus who won the White House -- ensured that Democrats would be motivated to come out and vote against him.

If Blackwell's candidacy was a long shot, Swann's run for governor of Pennsylvania was more of a joke. The Republicans chose as their candidate a man who was one of the finest wide receivers ever to play in the National Football League -- and who really should have stuck with football.

Swann, a political novice, lost his race by 21 percentage points. He did better than the experienced Blackwell, who lost by 24 points. Swann was merely unimpressive; Blackwell was scary.

Michael Steele's run for the Senate was another story. Steele, Maryland's lieutenant governor, was recruited by the White House to run in what has historically been a Democratic stronghold. He was another sacrificial lamb, like Blackwell and Swann, an African American face meant as a demonstration to voters that the Republican Party had finally become serious about diversity.

Then funny things started happening. Steele's white opponent, Rep. Ben Cardin, ran an unimaginative and plodding campaign. Steele, on the other hand, proved to be a natural on the trail.

Steele's television ads deserve a page in the annals of American politics. Shot against a white background, they had the minimalist look and post-postmodern sensibility of those commercials for Apple or the Gap. They managed to deliver all image and no substance -- and, yes, I meant to use those absolute terms "all" and "no." Speaking to the camera, Steele told voters he knew what they were thinking -- but didn't specify what that might be. He promised to be a different kind of senator -- again, no hint of what that might mean. About the only thing the ads firmly established was that Steele likes puppies.

Republican strategists looked at the numbers and saw that Steele might actually win as long as he kept pretending not to be a Republican. Several prominent black Democrats, piqued that there were no African Americans at the top of the ticket in Maryland, endorsed Steele. Some analysts saw the race as a toss-up.

Last week Steele lost by 10 points. That's better than Blackwell and Swann did, but still a landslide.

Nationwide, the black vote went overwhelmingly to Democratic candidates, as usual. In some races, there were indications that Latino voters are becoming angry about the Republicans' demagoguery over the immigration issue.

I remember attending the 2000 Republican convention, when the party made a great show of supposed inclusion. On the podium, you saw a rainbow of speakers and performers. Out in the hall, the number of black and brown faces was statistically insignificant.

Maybe someday the Republican Party will make a serious play for minority voters, but it won't be with a platform of tax cuts for the wealthy and indiscriminate spending cuts for social programs. The party will never break through until it manages to dispel its image of hostility toward policies that seek to lift up the disadvantaged. African Americans would love to have a real choice between the two parties, and maybe we will someday.

In the meantime, Republicans, don't bother with tokens. They don't fool anybody.

Democrats Fail To Hit The Beat In Dixieland (FT)

By Andrew Ward

Financial Times, November 14, 2006

As Democrats elsewhere in the US celebrated victory in last week's midterm election, John Bradbury, the party's candidate in Georgia's ninth congressional district, had little to cheer about.

Mr Bradbury, who quit his job as a long-distance truck driver to run for office, received only 23 per cent of the vote as Nathan Deal, his Republican opponent, was elected for an eighth consecutive term.

"We were heartened by what we saw nationally," he says. "But it was obvious early on that the national trend would not be reflected locally."

Mr Bradbury's mixed emotions were shared with Democrats across the south as the party made little progress towards loosening the Republican stranglehold over Dixieland.

While Democrats made inroads into the peripheries of the south, winning a Senate seat in Virginia and House seats in North Carolina, Florida and Texas, the Deep South states, such as Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, remained dominated by Republicans.

Exit polls showed that only 36 per cent of white voters in the south voted for Democratic House candidates, compared with 58 per cent in the north-east where the party made its biggest gains.

"The values and priorities of Americans in different parts of the country are diverging," says Merle Black, professor of politics at Atlanta's Emory University and author of a soon-to-be-published book called Divided America. For Republicans, the preservation of its critical southern support base was the sole source of comfort from an otherwise miserable election.

But analysts warn that an increased concentration of southern conservatives among the party leadership could make it difficult to win back moderate voters elsewhere in the country.

"There will be tension between southern Republicans who believe the party lost because it wasn't conservative enough and others who want to shift to the centre," says Charles Bullock, professor of political science at the University of Georgia.

For Democrats, the election proved that the party is capable of winning power in Washington without the south. But it also showed that the push by Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, to make the party competitive nationwide – the so-called "50-state strategy" – has a long way to go.

Once dominant in the south, the Democrats have been declining in the region since Richard Nixon's "southern strategy" to convert white southerners to the Republicans in 1968. The realignment has become entrenched over the past two decades as the Republicans have claimed a monopoly on Bible Belt social values.

"Republicans have been successful in defining Democrats as a party of urban liberals and African-Americans," explains Seth Cohen, a Georgia-based attorney and Democratic activist.

Nowhere has the shift in loyalty been clearer than in Georgia's ninth congressional district, stretching from the affluent northern suburbs of Atlanta to the foothills of the Appalachian Mountains.

DOJ_NMG_0093949

Mr Deal, the incumbent, was first elected in 1992 as a Democrat, continuing the party's 119-year unbroken hold on the seat. But he switched sides in 1995 and the district has since become so reliably Republican that he ran unopposed in three of the past five elections.

Mr Bradbury, a resident of the district, developed the idea to challenge Mr Deal during his long truck drives delivering building materials around the south-east. Radio reports about the war in Iraq and corruption in Washington convinced him that the ninth district deserved a choice, however slim his chance of winning.

With a campaign budget of about $10,000 (£7,810) – nearly half of it funded with his own cash –- Mr Bradbury was no match for Mr Deal, who raised more than $1m. On the campaign trail, he found voters open to his arguments but deeply suspicious of his party.

"What bothers people about the Democrats are wedge issues such as abortion and gun control," he says. "We need to convince voters that we are not going to take their guns and kill their babies."

Jim Webb, the victorious Senate candidate in Virginia, and Harold Ford, who narrowly lost the Tennessee Senate race, have been cited as models for how Democrats can compete effectively in the south. Both combined traditional Democratic policies on healthcare and the minimum wage with conservative stances on gay marriage, gun control and immigration.

Mr Bradbury says he sees signs of life returning to the Democrats in northern Georgia, citing several counties where the party is becoming more organised after years of dormancy. "It's going to take a lot of intensive work at the grassroots level," he says.

The 50-year-old father of three is considering running for Congress again in 2008 but accepts that may be too soon for the ninth district to return to the Democratic fold. "Will it happen in my lifetime? Yes. Will it happen in my political lifetime? I'm not sure."

Connecticut Race Tightens, Error Found (AP-Y)

By Susan Haigh, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

Democrat Joe Courtney's lead in the 2nd Congressional District dropped to 66 votes Monday after officials discovered he was mistakenly given 100 extra votes over Republican Rep. Rob Simmons, an election official said.

"It was human error," said Lebanon election moderator John Bendoraitis. "It was strictly misreading one number on one machine."

The discovery significantly tightens one of the closest congressional races in the nation. Preliminary Election Day returns had Courtney winning by 167 votes out of nearly 250,000 ballots cast.

It was one of 10 races across the nation that remained unresolved in the days after Election Day, and the only one in which a Democratic challenger had the lead.

Courtney claimed victory on Wednesday and was in Washington Monday to attend orientation sessions. Simmons has not conceded the race.

"We remain highly confident in the results for us and Joe is currently in Washington at the orientation getting ready to take his seat in the 110th Congress," said Courtney spokesman Brian Farber.

Bendoraitis said the error happened when an official on election night read the vote total on one of six machines as 363 votes for Courtney when it should have been 263. With the revised total, Courtney received 1,353 votes in Lebanon, compared with 1,585 for Simmons.

More than 30 of the 65 towns in the district were recounting their votes Monday. Others had already completed their recounts, and the rest must finish by the weekend.

As of Sunday, Courtney held a 166-vote lead.

"These things definitely happen," said state Republican Party Chairman George Gallo. "I still have hope in this stuff."

The recount was triggered because Courtney's unofficial victory margin of 167 votes was less than half of 1 percent and fewer than 2,000 votes.

Confusion, East To West (RC)

By Nicole Duran And David M. Drucker

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

A week after Election Day, 11 House candidates had yet to concede their races, as thousands of ballots face scrutiny in districts across America — with Republicans holding out hope that they might snatch one more seat from the jaws of defeat.

DOJ_NMG_0093950

Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) gained 101 votes Monday when election officials in the Nutmeg State discovered a clerical error, leaving him only 66 votes behind former state Rep. Joe Courtney (D), who already declared victory and arrived in Washington, D.C., Monday for freshman orientation.

On the flip side, Republicans looked poised to escape with a host of narrow victories — including a few in highly vulnerable seats — even as the Democrats in those races refuse to quit.

Good-government advocates said the number of elections that haven't been resolved isn't altogether surprising. At least one race, in Florida's 13th district, is headed to court.

"Given how close how many of these races are, we don't think it's surprising at all," said Mary Boyle of Common Cause. "You have close races and you have doubts about voting machines and voting processes. Put those things together, it certainly could make it harder for people to concede quickly."

The margin of victory in several races last Tuesday was narrow, and while the Democrats swept to a major victory in the House, the GOP managed to hold off what could have been a much larger Democratic surge.

It looks as if Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio) and Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), both of whom were in serious danger of losing their seats, will return for the 110th Congress.

However, the Republicans came up short on plenty of close calls. Among them were two races in Georgia that, in the final weeks of the election, were considered their best opportunity for pickups in the 2006 cycle.

Meanwhile, in Arizona's 5th district, Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R) will not concede to Rep.-elect Harry Mitchell (D), although Republicans do not expect the outcome to change.

The National Republican Congressional Committee deployed teams of lawyers, political aides and communications specialists to the districts where recounts were possible last week. Feeling more confident this week, they have been recalled from everywhere but Florida and Connecticut.

Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said Democratic operatives also remain in those districts, though he would not disclose if DCCC staffers are also working in other districts.

"We're committed to making sure all the votes are counted in all these districts and we're confident they will be," Burton said.

The House Administration Committee, which has jurisdiction over federal elections, has deployed Republican and Democratic committee staffers to several states.

Republican observers have been sent to Connecticut's 2nd district, Florida's 13th, New Mexico's 1st and Washington's 8th.

"If it appears there's going to be a very narrow margin of victory in either direction, it is common to dispatch someone," said Salley Collins, the committee's GOP spokeswoman. "They're just there to observe and report back."

Democratic staffers are on the ground in Ohio's 2nd and 15th districts, North Carolina's 8th district, in addition to Washington and New Mexico, according to Denise Mixon, the committee's Democratic spokeswoman.

Connecticut's 2nd district

The 66-vote difference in the New London-based district is the narrowest margin among the unresolved House races.

Courtney declared victory but Simmons has yet to concede.

Courtney originally had a 167-vote lead but that was cut by 101 votes as election officials began recounting. Because the original difference in votes cast for the two was less than half of 1 percent, an automatic recount, as required by state law, was triggered.

As of late Monday, less than half of the towns in the district had recounted their ballots; by law, the recounts must be completed by Friday.

Florida's 13th district

Unlucky 13 and the shadow of Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), who, as Florida secretary of state, rose to infamy during the 2000 presidential debacle in the Sunshine State, combined to make the campaign to succeed Harris the most chaotic race still in flux in the country.

More than 18,000 ballots were cast in the Sarasota-based district without indicating a choice for the highly competitive House race, an unusually high number.

Bank executive Christine Jennings (D), who trails auto dealer Vern Buchanan (R) by just 373 votes, thinks the new touch-screen voting machines used in Sarasota County malfunctioned, and sued Monday night to seize the machines and their data and extend the time necessary for a recount.

Outside groups also say the discrepancy is puzzling and Common Cause has gone so far as to call for a revote. "That's a very unusual step but we think this is a very extraordinary circumstance," Boyle said.

Georgia's 8th and 12th districts

DOJ_NMG_0093951

With nearly all precincts reporting in the 8th district, Rep. Jim Marshall (D) was leading former Rep. Mac Collins (R) by 1.2 points, while in the 12th, Rep. John Barrow (D) was up on former Rep. Max Burns (R) by a mere 928 votes.

Neither Republican has conceded.

If the results hold, Burns can request a recount under Georgia law. However, Collins, because the margin in his race exceeds 1 percent, cannot.

"I don't expect the outcome to change" in either district, NRCC spokesman Carl Forti conceded.

New Mexico's 1st district

Wilson edged out state Attorney General Patricia Madrid (D) by 1,337 votes.

Ray Baray, a spokesman for the New Mexico secretary of state's office, said a recount has failed to change the outcome of any race there going back at least to 1998.

The Madrid campaign could not be reached for comment Monday. It is likely she is waiting for the final count from Bernalillo County (Albuquerque) before deciding whether to ask for a recount, which she can do no matter the margin of victory.

North Carolina's 8th district

Rep. Robin Hayes (R) finished 465 votes ahead of teacher Larry Kissell (D).

Kissell would have the right to request a recount if Hayes' margin of victory shrunk to within 1 percent. But Johnnie McLean, a spokeswoman for the North Carolina Board of Elections, said recounts rarely change the outcome there.

The Hayes campaign is confident his victory will hold regardless, according to a spokesman. However, with 1,500 provisional ballots left to count, Kissell campaign spokesman Steve Hudson sounded optimistic that things could change before the obituary on his race is written.

"Our goal is to win it by Friday," Hudson said. "It's definitely going to get much closer."

All counties in North Carolina meet Friday to certify their results, with the state scheduled to certify on Nov. 28. Per a recently enacted state law, all votes are randomly canvassed following an election to ensure accuracy.

Ohio's 2nd district

Rep. Jean Schmidt (R) unofficially leads Victoria Wulsin (D) by 2,323 votes, but Wulsin refuses to concede.

A unknown number of provisional and absentee ballots remain uncounted, prompting Wulsin to ask local election officials how many exist.

She has not ruled out seeking a recount after all the votes are tallied.

Ohio's 15th district

Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy (D) will not throw in the towel against Pryce until some 18,000 provisional and absentee ballots are counted.

Kilroy spokeswoman Amanda Wurst said she believes those ballots disproportionately contain votes for the Democrat and could erase the 3,536-vote advantage Pryce currently enjoys.

Kilroy aggressively courted college-age voters, who use provisional ballots in higher numbers because of their tendency to move around a lot, which makes it harder to prove their voting eligibility.

Wurst said the process is taking longer this year because newly enacted voter identification laws caused more provisional ballots to be cast. Additionally, more absentee ballots than usual were dropped now that voters do not need a reason to request one.

By law, elections officials have to start counting these ballots by Nov. 22.

Washington's 8th district

Freshman Rep. Dave Reichert (R) currently leads former Microsoft manager Darcy Burner (D) by 3,514 votes in the suburban Seattle district.

The Evergreen State enjoys high voter turnout, much of it by mail. As many as 20,000 absentee ballots remain uncounted in King County alone. The district also includes Pierce County.

Washington is infamous for its protracted recounts and many Republicans remain bitter over the outcome of the 2004 gubernatorial race, which they believe was skewed by negligence and/or fraud in heavily-Democratic King County.

The Washington secretary of state has until Dec. 7 to certify the results.

Wyoming At-Large

The unofficial tally gives 93,335 votes to Rep. Barbara Cubin (R) and 92,324 to Democrat Gary Trauner, according to state Election Director Peggy Nighswonger.

Those results will be certified Wednesday.

Separated by more than 1 percent, Trauner has until Friday to seek a recount.

DOJ_NMG_0093952

Nighswonger said there is no reason to suspect that Cubin's lead won't hold and Trauner has indicated he will not challenge the results.

"I will respect and accept the outcome" if Cubin's victory margin is not small enough to trigger an automatic recount, Trauner told the Casper Star-Tribune.

Should Trauner reverse course, he would have to submit $100 with an affidavit outlining the need for a recount.

If he seeks a recount and loses after a second tallying of the votes, he would be on the hook for the cost, estimated at $500 per county.

Trio Of House Members Weigh Possible '07 Campaigns (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

While exuberant House Democrats celebrated their new-found majority status last week, the midterm election results threw a monkey wrench into the future plans of a handful of lawmakers eyeing runs for other offices in 2007.

Reps. Chaka Fattah (D-Pa.), Ben Chandler (D-Ky.) and Bobby Jindal (R-La.) top the list of Members contemplating political campaigns in the off-year, and all are expected to make their decisions known shortly.

Last week, Democratic Illinois Reps. Jesse Jackson Jr. and Luis Gutierrez wasted little time in pulling the plug on their potential bids for mayor of Chicago in light of the news that their party is set to return to power after a 12-year hiatus.

For the two Chicago lawmakers, the decision to stay put versus gambling on going up against Mayor Richard Daley (D) seemed cut and dried.

Gutierrez, elected in 1992, served only two years in the majority before the 1994 GOP revolution. He is now set to become a Financial Services subcommittee chairman.

Jackson, who has a seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee, never has served in the majority.

But there are others who are still mulling runs in 2007, when off-year elections afford Members the opportunity to run for another office without having to give up their Congressional seats.

The first to decide about a 2007 bid likely will be Fattah, who has been gearing up to run for mayor of Philadelphia.

Fattah is expected to make an official announcement about his plans in the next week.

"He has said on or before his 50th birthday," which is Nov. 21, said Fattah spokeswoman Debra Anderson.

Fattah, first elected in 1994, is a member of the Appropriations Committee and no doubt will wield more power in the Democratically-controlled 110th Congress. Still, he is far down the line in seniority to become a cardinal, and he appears more likely than not to gamble on the free run regardless of the power shift.

With current Mayor John Street (D) term-limited and unable to seek another term, a wide-open Democratic primary is expected next year in the City of Brotherly Love.

Rep. Robert Brady (Pa.), chairman of the Philadelphia Democratic Party, also has had his name floated recently as among those interested in a mayoral bid. But many observers believe he is unlikely to run.

Other potential Democratic contenders include former Philadelphia City Councilman Michael Nutter, former City Controller Jonathan Saidel, state Rep. Dwight Evans, businessman Tom Knox and labor leader John Dougherty. Nutter is the only one who officially has announced his candidacy.

Elsewhere in the country, Democratic leaders in Kentucky are waiting to hear from Chandler, who could seek a rematch next year with now-Gov. Ernie Fletcher (R), a former Congressman. Chandler, who was then state attorney general, lost to Fletcher in 2003 but was elected to succeed him in the House in a 2004 special election.

"He's the elephant, or the donkey, in the room," said one source familiar with state politics, noting that Chandler likely would be the clear frontrunner for the Democratic nod next year if he wants it. "They're waiting to hear back from him."

Chandler is expected to make his announcement soon, said spokeswoman Jennifer Spalding, who also noted that his new-found majority status would be a factor for consideration.

"He's hoping to make that decision before Thanksgiving," Spalding said. "But the Democrats taking back the House is certainly a huge part of that decision-making process."

Several Democrats have been mentioned as possible candidates if Chandler doesn't run.

Fletcher's first term as governor has been marred by scandal, and although he has said he is running again, he faces the likelihood of a bruising primary.

Paducah businessman Billy Harper (R) already has tossed his hat into the ring against Chandler, and there are other GOP candidates likely to follow.

DOJ_NMG_0093953

Some observers wonder whether GOP Rep. Anne Northup (Ky.), who was defeated in her Louisville-based district last week, might run against Fletcher next year — or whether Republican returning Members of the Bluegrass State delegation might gamble on a run now that they are in the minority.

Among House Republicans, Jindal is first and foremost among likely contenders for other political offices in 2007.

Jindal is widely expected to run for governor next year — a decision it would appear his new minority status would have little impact on.

Jindal ran for governor in 2003 and lost a runoff to now-Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) by 4 points after finishing first in the all-party primary. He was elected to the House in 2004.

Last week, Jindal expressed interest in another gubernatorial bid and said he and his wife currently are mulling that option.

"He is going, in the next few weeks, to talk to supporters," said Trey Williams, Jindal's communication director. "He then will make a decision, probably in January."

House Members have seen mixed results in off-year election bids in recent years.

Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) ran for Los Angeles mayor in 2001, losing badly in a primary campaign that never really gained traction.

In 2005, Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.) gambled on a bid to become mayor of New York and narrowly missed making the Democratic runoff. He is widely expected to try again in 2009, when the job will be vacant.

In fact, Fletcher's 2003 gubernatorial bid is the only off-year election success story for any House Member since 2000.

Downcast GOP Faces Retirement Questions (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

Still reeling from a crippling electoral loss last week, Senate Republicans are privately bracing for another difficult cycle in 2008 and trying to figure out if they can quell the increased likelihood that some key incumbents may be ready to throw in the towel.

Retirements are on both parties' minds, but for the GOP, the prospect of their incumbents stepping aside is of greater consequence since 21 of their 49 Senators are up for re-election in 2008. With Republicans losing the majority, many of their most senior Senators must hand over powerful chairmanships and face Democratic rule.

"It's going to be a very uphill cycle," said one high-level Republican Senate aide. "We've got to find a way to gain seats and not lose them in a lopsided field."

The GOP certainly is at a mathematical disadvantage in 2008. Just 12 of the 51 Democratic Senators (the party counts two Independents in its Caucus) will be in-cycle.

"There are more of them than there are of us, and that's to our benefit," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "Having said that, we will encourage all of our incumbents to continue serving in the Senate."

Six of that dozen will become committee chairmen in January: Sens. Max Baucus (Mont.) on Finance, Joseph Biden (Del.) on Foreign Relations, Tom Harkin (Iowa) on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry, Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.) on Intelligence, Carl Levin (Mich.) on Armed Services and John Kerry (Mass.) on Small Business and Entrepreneurship.

By contrast, nine Republican Senators facing re-election in 2008 will trade in their gavels for ranking member status on Jan. 3. That in and of itself could give senior GOP Senators pause when thinking about another grueling campaign.

"Obviously, these Senators are going to think about themselves and their families," one Senate Republican aide said. "But particularly when you are talking to older Members, it's not like you can offer them more seniority or power, particularly now that we are in the minority."

At least publicly, GOP Senate leaders aren't ready to start speculating about the next cycle. When asked about his fears of future retirements in the Republican Conference, incoming Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) demurred: "I'm not going to start talking about that."

Soon to face a committee demotion are Republican Sens. Saxby Chambliss (Ga.) now Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry chairman, Susan Collins (Maine) on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, Larry Craig (Idaho) on Veterans Affairs, Pete Domenici (N.M.) on Energy and Natural Resources, Mike Enzi (Wyo.) on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, James Inhofe (Okla.) on Environment and Public Works, Pat Roberts (Kan.) on Intelligence and Ted Stevens on Commerce, Science and Transportation.

Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), current Armed Services chairman and also among those up for re-election in 2008, was slated to lose his gavel this year anyway due to term limits. Rumors have circulated for some time that the 79-year-old Senator may be ready to end his tenure at the end of the 110th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0093954

Republicans acknowledge it is too soon to know exactly how many of their incumbents may be eyeing the door, especially now that they no longer control the chamber. The one advantage, some say, is that many of the 21 GOP Senators up for re-election in 2008 are long-standing Members who have seen power shifts before.

"We're optimistic there won't be any retirements," said a senior GOP Senate aide. "These Senators don't think in single-year terms."

Among those Republicans mentioned as possible retirees next cycle are Sen. Wayne Allard (Colo.), who made a campaign promise to serve just two terms; Cochran, who just lost the Appropriations gavel; outgoing National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairwoman Elizabeth Dole (N.C.); Domenici, who is slated to lose his top GOP status on Energy in the 111th Congress; Inhofe; Stevens; and Warner.

Democrats are not immune from retirement fears either, but with newfound power on the Hill, insiders doubt many, if any, will step aside now. The exceptions may be Rockefeller, dogged by some ongoing health problems, or Kerry and Biden, both of whom want to run for president.

The task for candidate recruitment next cycle falls to Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), who has agreed to a second term as chairman of the DSCC, and Sen. John Ensign (Nev.), who is slated to take over the NRSC.

Here is an early look at the class of Senators up for re-election in 2008:

Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.)

Alexander is gunning to become Senate Minority Whip in the next Congress. It's hard to see how any top Democrats even contemplate a race against him. Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D), having just lost an open-seat race, might be mentioned. But taking on a widely popular ex-governor like Alexander doesn't seem like a realistic prospect.

Wayne Allard (R-Colo.)

This race will be one of the most competitive of the 2008 cycle regardless of what Allard decides to do. Allard said he would serve two terms when he was elected in 1996, but he has yet to reveal whether he will adhere to that pledge.

Rep. Mark Udall (D) has said he is running for the seat either way, and as of mid-October, he had $1.26 million in the bank already. Unless he decides to stay in the House now that the Democrats have the majority, he must be considered the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination.

If Allard does opt for retirement, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R) has said he will run. But he is unlikely to be the top choice of GOP leaders. Other possible contenders include outgoing Gov. Bill Owens, former Reps. Bob Schaffer and Scott McInnis and state Attorney General John Suther.

Colorado has been a killing field for Republicans in the past two election cycles, but that doesn't mean Udall would be a shoo-in.

Max Baucus (D-Mont.)

Baucus' re-election prospects rest largely on Rep. Denny Rehberg (R), who has been mulling and preparing for a run for higher office. Rehberg is the state's lone Congressman — next Congress he also will be the only Republican in the delegation — and it would be a battle of epic proportions. If he chooses not to run, Republicans likely would try to woo former Gov. Marc Racicot (R), but it's too soon to get a sense about whether Racicot might be interested.

Without those two big names, it's hard to see Baucus getting much of a real race. Still, the underlying Republican nature of the state also means Democrats can't take their eyes off it.

Joseph Biden (D-Del.)

Biden has said he is running for president in 2008. The question is whether that means he's ready to leave the Senate behind — a prospect that seems less likely now that he is set to take the Foreign Relations Committee gavel.

But if he does, Rep. Mike Castle would be the consensus GOP choice. Biden's son, Beau, was just elected state attorney general and has long been mentioned as a possible successor to his father or to Castle.

Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.)

Democrats would like nothing better than to avenge the defeat of former Sen. Max Cleland (D-Ga.) by knocking off Chambliss. The problem is that the Peach State has grown more and more friendly to Republicans.

It's hard to see Chambliss getting much of a real challenge unless Rep. Jim Marshall (D), who has been eyeing a statewide run, decides to take him on. Marshall just won re-election with 51 percent of the vote, not a promising sign for a Senate bid. Plus, the new Democratic majority in the House could be strong incentive to stay put.

The first signal of his future plans could come as early as Jan. 3, when many eyes will be watching to see if Marshall casts his vote for Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to be Speaker.

Outgoing Lt. Gov. Mark Taylor (D) just got trounced in his gubernatorial bid, and outgoing Secretary of State Cathy Cox (D) lost an abysmally run primary campaign to Taylor. Neither looks like a realistic option for national Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0093955

Former Georgia Secretary of State Lewis Massey and Michelle Nunn, daughter of former Sen. Sam Nunn (D-Ga.), looked at running for an open Senate seat in 2004 but ultimately declined.

If they weren't willing to run for an open seat, it's hard to believe they'd be interested in taking on Chambliss. But both could have a bright political future if and when Georgia Democrats are able to find their way.

Thad Cochran (R-Miss.)

With the loss of the GOP majority, Cochran moves from chairman to ranking member of the Appropriations Committee — a move that puts him on a list of potential GOP retirements in 2008.

If he runs again, this seat is safe.

But expect Democrats to make a strong play for an open seat, just as they were anticipating doing if Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) had opted for retirement instead of re-election this year.

In an open-seat scenario, Democrats would coalesce behind former state Attorney General Mike Moore (D). On the GOP side, one or more of the state's GOP House Members look likely to run. Rep. Chip Pickering (R) is all but certain to run if there is an open seat, but Rep. Roger Wicker (R) also has been eyeing a Senate run. Wicker is an appropriator, and the GOP's new minority status in the House could help fuel the decision about his future plans.

Norm Coleman (R-Minn.)

Minnesota will be a fiercely fought battleground in 2008, both on the presidential and Senate levels. Coleman has prepared for a tough fight, even if it isn't already obvious who it will come from.

Liberal talk-show host Al Franken has said he is planning to run as a Democrat, but it's highly likely party leaders will search for an alternative.

Rep. Betty McCollum (D), Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Ryback, St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman, wealthy attorney Mike Ciresi and outgoing Attorney General Mike Hatch, who narrowly lost the gubernatorial race last week, all are possible contenders.

Susan Collins (R-Maine)

Collins has never been as popular as Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) back home. The question is who might step forward to challenge her in 2008.

Rep. Tom Allen (D) might be a logical choice, but with Democrats now in the majority in the House, it's tough to see him gambling on a Senate run. State Senate Majority Leader Michael Brennan (D) also may take a look.

John Cornyn (R-Texas)

Cornyn is not expected to face any major challenge in his first re-election campaign.

Larry Craig (R-Idaho)

Craig lost the chairmanship of the Veterans Affairs Committee when the GOP lost its Senate majority. Unless he decides to call it quits, he's a safe bet for re-election.

Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.)

Dole advisers insist she will seek a second term, even if some Republican insiders seem to have remaining doubts.

Gov. Mike Easley (D) is term-limited and cannot run for re-election in 2008. But he has shown little interest in running for higher office thus far.

If Dole runs again, it's difficult to see any top challengers emerging.

Pete Domenici (R-N.M.)

Domenici tops the list of possible GOP retirements, although sources say it is unlikely he will make an early decision — even if GOP leaders push him to.

Rep. Heather Wilson would be the GOP frontrunner to succeed him if he does retire, but there are early indications that Rep. Steve Pearce (R) is not willing to cede her the nomination.

GOP leaders are likely to do whatever they can to avoid a bloody primary that would lay bare the divisions between moderates and conservatives in the state party. Party strategists also fear losing one or both House seats if they are vacated.

Rep. Tom Udall may not seek the Democratic nomination, even though he probably would be the frontrunner for it if he wanted to run.

With Democrats now in control of the House he appears content to rise through the committee leadership ranks — or wait to become Interior secretary, as his father was, if a Democrat is elected president.

If Udall doesn't run, Lt. Gov. Diane Denish, Albuquerque Mayor Martin Chavez or Public Regulation Commission Chairman Ben Ray Lujan — son of the state Speaker — may seek the Democratic nomination.

Gov. Bill Richardson (D) has said he has no interest in running for Senate — though there is some talk that he will encourage a strong Democrat to run even if Domenici seeks a seventh term. Richardson is close to the Lujans.

Dick Durbin (D-Ill.)

DOJ_NMG_0093956

Durbin is set to become Majority Whip in the new Congress. He is not likely to face a tough contest back home in increasingly Democrat-friendly Illinois.

Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.)

Enzi is expected to cruise to a third term.

Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.)

Graham's biggest threat would seem to come in the form of a primary challenge from the right, but there is none on the horizon.

Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.)

Hagel is not expected to face a difficult re-election contest if he runs again.

Tom Harkin (D-Iowa)

Republicans made a pass at ousting Harkin in 2002 but came up way short.

Republicans lost two House seats in Iowa in 2006, another sign that generating a tough contest for Harkin next cycle may again prove to be a tall order.

James Inhofe (R-Okla.)

Inhofe is not expected to face an aggressive re-election challenge, should he choose to run again.

Even if there is an open seat, Democrats might think twice before contesting it in a presidential election year given former Rep. Brad Carson's (D-Okla.) 2004 open-seat performance.

Carson, who was widely hailed as the best possible candidate Democrats could have gotten, suffered a 12-point loss.

Of course, if Gov. Brad Henry (D) decided he was interested in running for Senate, all bets would be off. Henry was just overwhelmingly re-elected to a second term.

Tim Johnson (D-S.D.)

After winning re-election in 2002 by just 524 votes, Johnson would appear to be the most vulnerable Democrat up for re-election in 2008.

But Democrats warn against writing his obituary just yet and argue that his approval ratings currently are higher than they have ever been.

The natural challenger to Johnson would be Gov. Mike Rounds (R), who was just elected to a second term last week. He has not signaled whether he will challenge Johnson in 2008, but there is little doubt he will face pressure from national GOP leaders to do so.

Still, Democrats point out that while Rounds won re-election, an abortion ban he signed into law was rejected by the voters in a statewide referendum.

Regardless, a Rounds versus Johnson contest would be among the most closely watched in the country.

John Kerry (D-Mass.)

The line of would-be successors to Kerry is long, and it begins with the 10-Member Bay State House delegation.

Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 White House nominee, is preparing to run for president again in 2008. If he does, there is much speculation that he might decide not to run for re-election.

Reps. Ed Markey (D) and Marty Meehan (D) have the largest campaign war chests and top the list of would-be contenders looking to move over from the House.

Still, with Democrats now in power in the House, there appears to be less incentive for most of the delegation to gamble on winning a bloody primary.

Markey is set to become an Energy and Commerce subcommittee chairman, and Meehan will gain an Armed Services subcommittee gavel. Rep. Barney Frank (D) is the incoming Financial Services chairman, and Rep. Jim McGovern will become the No. 2 Democrat on the Rules panel. Rep. Bill Delahunt (D) is in line to become chairman of an International Relations subcommittee, and Rep. Richard Neal (D) also is in line to become a Way and Means subcommittee chairman.

Rep. John Olver, just about the only Massachusetts Democrat who has not expressed interest in the Senate seat, is set to become an Appropriations cardinal.

If Kerry does run for re-election, he is not expected to face any significant challenge.

Mary Landrieu (D-La.)

It's almost a given that Landrieu will face a tough re-election contest in 2008, even if it isn't yet clear who is running against her.

There have been murmurs that state Treasurer John Kennedy (D) might be preparing to switch parties and run.

Now that Republicans no longer hold the House majority, perhaps one of the delegation's GOP Members will decide to run.

DOJ_NMG_0093957

Rep. Bobby Jindal (R) is preparing to run for governor next year. If he is successful in ousting Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D), the target on Landrieu only will get bigger. If he loses narrowly, he might look to the Senate race as a consolation prize.

Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.)

Lautenberg, who came out of retirement in 2002 to win this seat, appears to want another term, even though he will be 84 in 2008.

There are no signs he will have a competitive race for re-election.

Carl Levin (D-Mich.)

Levin will not face a competitive race for a sixth term. Republicans tried to make Sen. Debbie Stabenow's (D-Mich.) re-election difficult this year and they failed miserably. There is no evidence they'll be any more successful against a much more entrenched incumbent.

Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.)

The incoming Minority Leader doesn't appear particularly vulnerable to a tough re-election challenge.

That said, many will be watching what happens back home in the 2007 gubernatorial contest, when embattled Gov. Ernie Fletcher (R) faces re-election.

If Democrats are able to win the governor's office, chatter about taking on McConnell, who essentially runs the state GOP, might increase. But it still seems like a long shot.

Mark Pryor (D-Ark.)

Pryor, a member of the "Gang of 14," appears to be on solid ground heading into his first re-election race. Republicans just lost control of the state's governorship and only one Republican remains in the six-person Congressional delegation.

Outgoing Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) is preparing a White House run in 2008, but short of him opting to run for Senate instead, Pryor would appear to be fine.

Jack Reed (D-R.I.)

Reed is about as safe as safe incumbents come, especially considering voters in the Ocean State just threw out their Republican Senator primarily because they didn't like his party affiliation.

Pat Roberts (R-Kan.)

Roberts will be ranking member on the Intelligence Committee next Congress.

Democrats did just pick up a House seat in the Prairie State, where voters also overwhelmingly re-elected the Democratic governor.

Still, producing a tough challenge for Roberts won't be an easy task.

Rep. Dennis Moore (D) has been mentioned before, but he appears to have secured his GOP-leaning seat and House Democratic leaders would go out of their way to convince him not to leave.

Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.)

Rockefeller, 69, appears to be Democrats' most apparent retirement concern. In recent years his health has fluctuated, leading some to question whether he might run for a fifth term.

If he runs again, Rockefeller should have little trouble winning.

If he doesn't, Rep. Shelley Moore Capito would be the consensus GOP nominee.

On the Democratic side, former Gov. Gaston Caperton would be a top contender if he is interested. Caperton is now serving as president of the College Board.

State Treasurer John Perdue (D) also is mentioned as a possibility.

Democratic Reps. Alan Mollohan and Nick Rahall also might look at trying to move to the other chamber, although both now have big incentives to stay put in the House.

Rahall will become Resources chairman and Mollohan an Appropriations cardinal when the 110th Congress is gaveled in.

Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.)

Rep. Artur Davis (D) recently said he is mulling a challenge to Sessions in 2008. Davis hasn't been shy about his statewide ambitions, but it's questionable whether he'd leave behind his rising-star status in the Democratic-controlled House to run against Sessions.

It isn't likely Sessions will get a strong challenge otherwise.

Gordon Smith (R-Ore.)

Smith would appear to be increasingly vulnerable in a state that is growing more Democratic. But he maintains a close relationship with Sen. Ron Wyden (D), and unless former Gov. John Kitzhaber (D) decides to run, there aren't any obvious strong challengers on the horizon — yet.

Ted Stevens (R-Alaska)

DOJ_NMG_0093958

Republican strategists continue to insist that Stevens is not a retirement threat in 2008. Provided he runs again, his re-election contest will be a snoozer.

If he doesn't, the race could become quite competitive.

John Sununu (R-N.H.)

Sununu's greatest re-election challenge would come from Gov. John Lynch (D), who was just re-elected to a second two-year term.

Lynch, who ousted a Republican incumbent in 2004, has not indicated if he is interested in running for Senate.

A huge Democratic wave hit New Hampshire this year, and the fact that both GOP House Members were swept out of office must make Sununu nervous. Beyond Lynch, it's unclear whom party leaders might turn to. But the 2006 results make what once looked like a solid GOP hold in 2008 worth a second look from Democrats.

John Warner (R-Va.)

Warner heads into the 110th Congress without a ranking member title and with much speculation about his political future.

With back-to-back statewide losses for the Virginia GOP, Warner will face increasing pressure to run for a sixth term.

If he does, he would not face a competitive challenge.

But if there is an opening, expect a bloody GOP primary between Rep. Tom Davis and one or more of his House colleagues. Reps. Eric Cantor and Bob Goodlatte have been contemplating Senate bids, as has former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore (R).

On the Democratic side, hopes of picking up the seat rest squarely on the shoulders of former Gov. Mark Warner.

Mark Warner recently called off a 2008 White House bid, and he would be the strong favorite in an open-seat contest if he were to run. He ran for the Senate in 1996, losing by 5 points to John Warner. But many Democratic insiders believe he is more likely to run for governor again in 2009 than for a six-year Senate term.

If he does decline a run, he likely would help the party find another candidate. After Sen. George Allen's (R) ouster this year and Gov. Tim Kaine's (D) victory last year, an open seat in the Commonwealth is not an opportunity that Democrats are likely to waste.

Democrats' Wins Hinged On Muslims (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

Muslim voters, an electoral ally of President Bush as recently as 2000, played a key role in turning over control of the Senate to Democrats, a study shows.

"Although the-get-out-the-vote campaign was nonpartisan, there is no doubt that our strategy to support a large Muslim voter turnout in areas with potentially close election races was a correct one," said Mahdi Bray, director of the Muslim American Society (MAS) Freedom Foundation. "We looked at the states with close races and matched them up with states that had a large concentration of Muslims."

MAS also targeted races in Florida, Georgia, Michigan, North Carolina, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

In the U.S. Senate race in Virginia, more than 50,000 self-identified Muslim voters went to the polls, MAS said. A commanding majority of them, 92 percent, or 47,092, voted for the Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr. Mr. Webb won his race against Sen. George Allen, the Republican incumbent, by 9,326 votes.

"If Muslims had decided to put their weight behind Allen, Republicans would have had at least a tie in the Senate," said Mukit Hossain of MAS, which conducted the survey.

Muslim turnout of registered voters was exceptionally high in Virginia, at 86 percent, MAS reported. About 13 percent, or 7,822, of them were first-time voters.

Muslims also celebrated the victory of Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress. The Democrat won his race with 56 percent of the vote in Minnesota's traditionally liberal 5th District. Mr. Ellison, who describes himself as a moderate Muslim, won the backing of the National Jewish Democratic Council, even though his opponent, Republican Alan Fine, was Jewish.

Muslim voters have not always turned against Republican candidates. A survey by the Center for American Islamic Relations found that 78 percent of Muslims supported Mr. Bush during his first presidential election in 2000.

CAIR found that Muslims were drawn to Mr. Bush's conservative stances on social issues and their hope that he would overturn provisions of a 1996 law, backed by the Clinton administration, that allowed for "secret evidence" in the deportation of immigrants with suspected terrorist ties.

Some estimates show that 60,000 Muslims voted for Mr. Bush in Florida. Those numbers nearly flipped in 2004, with most surveys showing Mr. Bush receiving about 7 percent of Muslim support against his opponent, Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

Mr. Hossain is president of the Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, a group that endorsed Mr. Webb's candidacy. However, Mr. Hossain says neither the Virginia PAC nor MAS has a partisan affiliation. He said the PAC endorsed Mr. Webb and other Democratic candidates because of their positions on civil liberties, immigration and health care.

Mr. Hossain did not hide his personal preference for Mr. Webb and his enthusiasm for Democratic victories a week ago, appearing at a press conference yesterday wearing a Webb campaign button on his jacket.

Female Voters Played Key Role In Midterms (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

Women -- especially blacks and Hispanics -- helped Democrats win power this month, and they are determined to ensure their issues aren't neglected, women's rights leaders said yesterday.

The airwaves may be filled with "white males gloating about how they won this election," but "without African Americans, Latinos and women," there would have been no victory, said E. Faye Williams, president of the National Congress of Black Women.

Top legislative items include raising the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, providing "fair pay" for women and broadening access to emergency contraception, Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women (NOW), said at a National Council of Women's Organizations (NCWO) press conference yesterday.

In state after state, women's votes pushed Democrats over the top, said Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation, citing data from a new election analysis from Lake Research Partners for Ms. magazine and Women Donors Network.

Ms. Smeal, publisher of Ms. magazine, said the victories of Sens.-elect James H. Webb Jr. in Virginia, Jon Tester in Montana and Claire McCaskill in Missouri were particularly satisfying.

Olga Vives, NOW executive vice president, said Hispanic voters, angry over a "hatred-filled approach" to immigration policy, helped chase out one Republican senator and at least three Republican congressmen, and forced another Republican congressman into a runoff race. The Hispanic vote was "disastrous" to Republicans, she said.

After 12 years of neglect under Republican rule, the women's right's agenda is "broad and long," said Ms. Gandy.

But initial legislative plans from putative congressional leaders, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Sen. Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, "bode well for women, if they are not blocked by Bush allies still stung by the voters' repudiation of their agenda," she said.

The new Congress should see a resurgence of power from the women's congressional caucus, said NCWO leader Martha Burk. The 40-member "blue dog" conservative Democrat caucus may be attracting press coverage as a new power broker, but that distinction more rightly belongs to the women's caucus, which has at least 70 members, said pollster Denise Baer, president of Strategic Research Concepts.

A final key goal is to keep close ties with Mrs. Pelosi.

"People are going to be jockeying so much for their own interests and their own agendas -- she's going to be a target," said Yvonne Scruggs-Leftwich, a longtime civil rights activist.

She "needs a point person" whose sole job is to "listen to what's going on in the real world" and get back to people, she said. "We are all sophisticated. We know [Mrs. Pelosi] can't come to the phone. But somebody's got to be the message carrier."

AP: Giuliani Takes Step Toward '08 Bid (AP-Y)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

Former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, a moderate Republican best known for his stewardship of the city after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, has taken the first step in a 2008 presidential bid.

The former mayor filed papers to create the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee, Inc., establishing a New York-based panel that would allow him to raise money to explore a White House run and travel the country.

The four-page filing, obtained by The Associated Press, lists the purpose of the non-profit corporation "to conduct federal 'testing the waters' activity under the Federal Election Campaign Act for Rudy Giuliani."

DOJ_NMG_0093960

The paperwork, dated last Friday, is signed by Bobby Burchfield, a partner at the DC-based law firm of McDermott Will & Emery, a firm that handles political work.

Giuliani spokeswoman Sunny Mindel declined to comment.

One potential rival for the GOP nomination, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, said Sunday he was taking the initial step of setting up an exploratory committee.

Under federal election law, an exploratory committee allows an individual to travel and gauge the level of support for a candidacy without formally declaring themselves a candidate and adhering to all the federal rules of fundraising. An individual who spends money only to test the waters — but not to campaign for office — does not have to register as a candidate under the election law.

The GOP field is expected to grow with Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Sen. Bill Frist of Tennessee, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and New York Gov. George Pataki expected to join the presidential fray.

Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa has filed to establish a full-blown campaign committee and will make a more formal announcement of his candidacy later this month.

Giuliani was widely praised for leading the city during and after the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. He has said for months that he would wait until the end of the 2006 elections to decide whether to embark on a White House bid.

The former mayor is a moderate who supports gun control, same-sex civil unions, embryonic stem-cell research and abortion rights — stands that would put him at odds with the majority of the GOP conservative base.

Giuliani has tried to sidestep those differences and offered strong praise for President Bush at the 2004 GOP convention in New York.

"It doesn't matter what the media does to ridicule him or misinterpret him or defeat him. They ridiculed Winston Churchill. They belittled Ronald Reagan. But like President Bush, they were optimists. Leaders need to be optimists. Their vision is beyond the present, and it's set on a future of real peace and security," Giuliani said.

"Some call it stubbornness. I call it principled leadership."

In 2006, the Giuliani brand remained strong. He headlined fundraisers for Republican candidates nationwide and his travel has done little to deny 2008 ambitions. During a visit earlier this month to Columbia, S.C., Giuliani dodged the question: "There's a chance, but that's after this election is over."

He then left South Carolina for New Hampshire, site of the nation's first primary and another GOP fundraiser.

Giuliani enjoys strong name recognition and a recent AP-AOL News poll conducted in late October found that among Republicans Giuliani was essentially tied with Condoleezza Rice and McCain on who they would most like to see elected president in 2008.

Rice has insisted that she will not run.

Giuliani, who was in his final months as New York City mayor when a pair of planes crashed into the World Trade Center's towers, became a national hero. Within hours of the attack, the mayor was visiting the site, caked in dust and walking through the chaos — a moment replayed repeatedly on television.

Assuming the role of "America's Mayor" and Time Magazine's Person of the Year for 2001, Giuliani remained an in-demand speaker and GOP fundraiser. He was the first Republican to lead New York in decades, had cut crime and redeveloped rundown parts of the city.

He was a former U.S. attorney, leading campaigns against organized crime and corruption. He spent two years as the Justice Department's No. 3 post, overseeing all U.S. attorneys, the Drug Enforcement Agency and the U.S. Marshals Service. The Brooklyn native was first elected New York's mayor in 1993.

Giuliani eyed a run for the U.S. Senate in 2000, but ended that bid while battling prostate cancer and a made-for-tabloids divorce from television star Donna Hanover. The messy divorce and his relationship with Judith Nathan also made his campaign against Hillary Rodham Clinton all the more difficult.

Long before the Sept. 11 attacks, the mayor cultivated a kind of celebrity status. He made a cameo on "Seinfeld" in 1993 and "Mad About You" the next year. He hosted Saturday Night Live in 1997 and followed up with other cameos. And in 2002, he was a presenter at MTV's Video Music Awards.

Giuliani Takes First Step Toward Presidential Bid (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093961

Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York City, has taken the first step toward mounting a presidential candidacy, forming an organization on Friday to explore a White House run.

Mr. Giuliani stopped short of filing documents with the Federal Election Commission to create a presidential campaign committee, a step that Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa, a Democrat, has taken. Instead, he filed to form a nonprofit group in New York State. Other politicians, like Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, have said they planned to file.

"Mayor Giuliani has not made a decision yet," John H. Gross, a lawyer at Proskauer Rose and a former campaign treasurer for Mr. Giuliani, said in a statement. "With the filing of this document, we have taken the necessary legal steps so an organization can be put in place and money can be raised to explore a possible presidential run in 2008."

In another statement, Anthony V. Carbonetti, a former chief of staff to Mr. Giuliani, said, "Rudy has traveled the country campaigning tirelessly on behalf of Republican candidates and has had the opportunity to speak with Americans on a wide variety of issues. They have been encouraging him to run for president, and this filing affords him the opportunity to raise money and put together an organization to assist him in making his decision."

As news of Mr. Giuliani's action emerged today, some Democrats rushed to criticize him. "It's unclear whether or not Rudy Giuliani will be able to just 'explain away' the fact that he's consistently taken positions that are completely opposite to the conservative Republican base on issues they hold near and dear," a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, Karen Finney, said in a statement.

Mr. Giuliani, who was mayor from 1993 to 2001, has expressed socially liberal views including support for gay rights and abortion rights. He has traveled widely in recent months, stumping for Republican candidates in Florida, Illinois, Michigan, New Hampshire, South Carolina and elsewhere. Several of those candidates lost in the midterm elections last week when the Democrats recaptured both houses of Congress.

On Sunday, after a speech in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., Mr. Giuliani said he did not view the election as a rebuke to Republicans, but urged the party to commit itself to fiscal discipline and immigration reform.

Federal election law allows individuals exploring a candidacy to "test the waters" before deciding to run for federal office. The prospective candidate does not need to register with the commission, but must abide by the same contribution and spending limits as declared candidates.

The commission advises any individual doing such preliminary exploration to keep detailed financial records, because if the individual formally becomes a candidate, money raised and spent on "testing the waters" will be considered as contributions and expenditures under federal law.

Individuals who are "testing the waters" may pay for polling, phone calls, travel, political consultants, office space and stationery, among other things. But they may not raise more money than "reasonably required for exploratory activity," use public advertising to publicize their intention to run, make statements that refer to themselves as candidates, or campaign for office.

"It's likely that presidential candidates will have to raise at least $100 million by the end of 2007," the chairman of the Federal Election Commission, Michael E. Toner, said in an interview. "Rudy Giuliani is clearly one of those candidates who can raise that amount of money."

Once prospective presidential candidates file exploratory papers with the Federal Election Commission, they are required to file monthly fund-raising reports. Several aspirants intend to wait until at least January, so that their first fund-raising disclosure is not due until late February, giving them more time to raise money.

If Mr. Giuliani decides to run, he will be able to transfer money from his new organization, the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee, to his federal campaign committee.

In a four-page filing submitted on Friday to the New York State Department of State and obtained by The New York Times, the new organization was listed as a nonprofit corporation. Bobby R. Burchfield, a partner who handles corporate litigation at McDermott Will & Emery, a firm in Washington, filed the papers. Mr. Gross was listed as a director of the organization, along with Peter J. Powers, a former deputy mayor, and Dennison Young Jr., a former federal prosecutor who was Mr. Giuliani's chief counsel.

Leader Of Virginia's Republicans Resigns (RTD)

By Tyler Whitley

Richmond Times-Dispatch, November 14, 2006

Kate Obenshain Griffin, who presided over two straight statewide losses, resigned yesterday as chairwoman of the Republican Party of Virginia, effective tomorrow.

DOJ_NMG_0093962

She said she will serve as chief of staff for the remainder of U.S. Sen. George Allen's term and take responsibility for closing his offices in Washington and around the state, and assisting with a smooth transition. She said Allen asked her to serve as chief of staff.

Allen, who lost the Senate race to Democrat Jim Webb last Tuesday, will serve until the first week in January, when Webb is sworn in.

"I can think of no higher honor than doing all I can to preserve his outstanding legacy and helping to fortify his future," Griffin said.

Griffin is an Allen protégé. She is the daughter of the late Richard D. Obenshain, considered the founder of the modern Republican Party in Virginia. Obenshain was killed in a plane crash in August 1978 while running for the U.S. Senate. His replacement, John W. Warner, is serving his 28th year in the Senate.

It is customary for party chairmen to leave after a series of losses. The party's candidate for governor, Jerry W. Kilgore, lost to Democrat Timothy M. Kaine last year. Griffin said no one asked her to quit.

"I'm proud of the job we have done," she said, but declined to answer when asked whether she resigned knowing she would be asked to.

"Senator Allen's loss is certainly fresh on all our minds and heavy on our hearts," Griffin said. "Of course, that loss was coupled with a tremendous victory in that we returned all our congressmen and congresswomen to the U.S. House of Representatives."

Griffin praised the existing staff of the state Republican Party, which runs the day-to-day-activities. Shawn Smith, the party's executive director, is expected to resign today. He declined to comment when asked whether he planned to stay on.

"She has been a loyal advocate for our conservative cause," Smith said.

Republican sources say Allen is pushing for Ed Gillespie, who lives in Fairfax County and is a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, to be chairman of the state party. Gillespie was an adviser to the Allen campaign.

The sources said Gillespie would have the prestige to stand up against the various factions that are already fighting for control of the party.

Dick Wadhams, who ran Allen's Senate campaign and who is being blamed by many Republicans for the loss, had been Allen's chief of staff before the campaign. But sources say he has already returned to his home in Colorado.

Griffin, who lives in Winchester, has been chairwoman for three years. She was brought in by Allen and Kilgore after an eavesdropping scandal left the party in disarray. The chairman and executive director both lost their jobs.

"We have come through many challenges that have threatened our party to its core," Griffin wrote yesterday in a letter to Republican leaders.

She said the party's finances are stable and its infrastructure, including voter lists and technology, is in good shape.

After her brief tenure on Capitol Hill, Griffin said she looks forward to "a somewhat normal life with particular attention to my No. 1 job -- being a mom." She has four children, ages 9 to 4, and is married to Phillip S. Griffin II, a Winchester lawyer. She worked in the Allen administration when he was governor from 1994 to 1998.

For Evangelicals, Supporting Israel Is 'God's Foreign Policy' (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — As Israeli bombs fell on Lebanon for a second week last July, the Rev. John Hagee of San Antonio arrived in Washington with 3,500 evangelicals for the first annual conference of his newly founded organization, Christians United For Israel.

At a dinner addressed by the Israeli ambassador, a handful of Republican senators and the chairman of the Republican Party, Mr. Hagee read greetings from President Bush and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and dispatched the crowd with a message for their representatives in Congress. Tell them "to let Israel do their job" of destroying the Lebanese militia, Hezbollah, Mr. Hagee said.

He called the conflict "a battle between good and evil" and said support for Israel was "God's foreign policy."

The next day he took the same message to the White House.

Many conservative Christians say they believe that the president's support for Israel fulfills a biblical injunction to protect the Jewish state, which some of them think will play a pivotal role in the second coming. Many on the left, in turn, fear that such theology may influence decisions the administration makes toward Israel and the Middle East.

Administration officials say that the meeting with Mr. Hagee was a courtesy for a political ally and that evangelical theology has no effect on policy making. But the alliance of Israel, its evangelical Christian supporters and President Bush has never been closer or more potent. In the wake of the summer war in southern Lebanon, reports that Hezbollah's sponsor, Iran, may be pushing for nuclear weapons have galvanized conservative Christian support for Israel into a political force that will be hard to ignore.

For one thing, white evangelicals make up about a quarter of the electorate. Whatever strains may be creeping into the Israeli-American alliance over Iraq, the Palestinians and Iran, a large part of the Republican Party's base remains committed to a fiercely pro-Israel agenda that seems likely to have an effect on policy choices.

Mr. Hagee says his message for the White House was, "Every time there has been a fight like this over the last 50 years, the State Department would send someone over in a jet to call for a cease-fire. The terrorists would rest, rearm and retaliate." He added, "Appeasement has never helped the Jewish people."

This time Elliott Abrams, the White House deputy national security adviser who met with him, essentially agreed, Mr. Hagee said.

Leaving the White House offices, "we felt we were on the right track," he said.

Now, in tandem with the Israeli government, many evangelical Christians have focused on a new villain, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Evangelical broadcasters and commentators have seized on Mr. Ahmadinejad's comments questioning the Holocaust and calling for the abolition of the Israeli state. And many evangelicals now talk of the Iranian leader as a "mortal threat" to Israel.

Some evangelical leaders say they are wary of reports that a panel including former Secretary of State James A. Baker III might recommend negotiating with Iran about the future of Iraq. "It certainly bothers me," said Dr. James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family and one of the most influential conservative Christians. "That has the same kind of feel to it as the British negotiating with Germany, Italy and Japan in the run up to World War II."

At rallies this fall for Christian conservative voters, Dr. Dobson sometimes singled out Mr. Ahmadinejad as a reason to go to the polls, arguing that Democrats could not be trusted to face down such dangers. "Hitler told everybody what he was going to do, and Ahmadinejad is saying exactly what he is going to do," Dr. Dobson explained. "He is talking genocide."

The same name, with many pronunciations, comes up repeatedly on Christian talk radio shows, said Gary Bauer, a Christian conservative political organizer. "I am not sure there is a foreign leader who has made a bigger splash in American culture since Khrushchev, certainly among committed Christians," he said.

Mr. Hagee, for his part, said Mr. Ahmadinejad's comments about Israel and the Holocaust were part of what motivated him to found Christians United For Israel late last year. Since the fight with Hezbollah, Mr. Hagee said, he is doing all he can to keep the pressure on United States officials to take a hard line with Iran.

When 5,000 evangelicals gathered last month for a "Night to Honor Israel" at his San Antonio megachurch, for example, Mr. Ahmadinejad was much discussed.

Mr. Hagee compared the Iranian leader with the biblical pharaoh of Egypt. "Pharaoh threatened Israel and he ended up fish food," Mr. Hagee said, to great applause.

Evangelical Christians who know President Bush, including Marvin Olasky, editor of the magazine World and a former Bush adviser, said Mr. Bush, unlike President Reagan, has never shown any interest in prophecies of the second coming.

Such theological details, however, have not kept the Israeli government and Jewish pro-Israel lobbying groups from capitalizing on the powerful support of American evangelicals. Fearing a backlash over Lebanon last July, Israeli officials and their American allies sought public statements of support from American evangelicals. Some groups declined because of risks to missionaries in the Arab world.

Dr. Dobson read a statement on his popular radio program expressing "heartache" at the civilian casualties but comparing Israel's fight to "the Biblical skirmish between little David and mighty Goliath." He explained, "There sits little Israel with its five million beleaguered Jews, surrounded by five hundred million Muslims whose leaders are determined to drive it into the sea."

Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein, the founder of the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews and the Israeli government's official goodwill ambassador to evangelicals, said the statements turned out to be superfluous because there was a groundswell of grass roots evangelical support.

Mr. Eckstein said he had discovered the depth of that support when he ran television commercials on the Fox News Channel seeking donations. The response, mainly from evangelicals, "burned out the call centers," Mr. Eckstein said. During the five-week war, his group added 30,000 new donors. Thanks to the influx of money, he said his organization has exceeded its income from the first 10 months of last year by 60 percent, putting it on track to pull in $80 million this year. "The war really generated a momentum," Mr. Eckstein said.

Evangelicals' support for Israel, of course, is far from uniform. Mr. Hagee is an author of several books about the interpretation of biblical prophecies. He says he believes the Bible assigns Israel a pivotal role as a harbinger of the second coming. Citing passages from Revelation and Ezekiel, he argues that conflict between Israel and Iran may be a sign that that time is approaching.

Others say they believe more generally that God maintains his Old Testament covenant with the Jewish people and thus commands Christian believers to help protect their "older brothers."

"My theology indicates that Israel is covenant land," Dr. Dobson said in an interview.

Many conservative Christians and their Jewish allies acknowledge a certain tension between the evangelical belief in a Biblical commission to convert non-Christians and their simultaneous desire to help the Jews of Israel.

"Despite all the spiritual shortcomings of the Jewish people," Dr. Dobson said, "according to scripture — and those criticisms come not from Christians but from the Old Testament. Just look in Deuteronomy, where Jews are referred to as a stiff-necked and stubborn people — despite all of that, God has chosen to bless them as his people. God chose to bless Abraham and his seed not because they were a perfect people any more than the rest of the human family."

Dr. Dobson, along with some other evangelicals, has expressed disappointment with what he saw as the Bush administration's pressure on Israel to sign the cease-fire that ended the fight.

"They began by saying they had to take a hard line, by saying they would support Israel and they ended up urging them to compromise and go home," Dr. Dobson said. "All that is going to do is allow everybody to reload. That didn't solve anything." (Mr. Hagee said that he believed the administration gave Israel "ample time" but that Israel erred by not "unleashing the full might of its ground troops" until it was too late.)

The Israeli government and its American allies have been building their alliance with evangelicals for decades. Israeli officials began working closely with Mr. Hagee and his church, for example, a quarter century ago, when he met several times with then-Prime Minister Menachem Begin.

The Jerusalem Post, an English-language newspaper, recently started an edition for American Christians.

The Israeli government temporarily cut off ties with the Christian broadcaster Pat Robertson after he suggested that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke might have been God's punishment for withdrawing from territory that belonged to the Biblical Israel. But then Mr. Robertson flew to Israel during the fight with Hezbollah. In a gesture of reconciliation, the Israeli government recently worked with him to film a television commercial to attract Christian tourists.

"Israel — to walk where Jesus walked, to pray where Jesus prayed, to stand where he stood — there is no other place like it on earth," Mr. Robertson says in the commercial, according to the Jerusalem Post.

The Third California (WSJ)

By Joel Kotkin

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- Amidst the Republican rout, some important political lessons can be drawn from the results in California. Oft dismissed by conservatives as "the left coast" and written off as hopelessly blue, the state election revealed some critical trends that may prove decisive -- for both parties -- in 2008 and beyond.

Arnold Schwarzenegger's 17-point victory alone commands some attention, since it is easily the most impressive score by any Republican in a Democratic-leaning state this year -- and it suggests a future for pro-environment, pro-business, fiscally conservative and socially moderate politics. In trying to excuse their drubbing at the top of the ticket, some California Democrats spin the tale that Mr. Schwarzenegger won only by morphing into one of them. Yet in reality, Phil Angelides, the man he defeated, was the clear favorite of party activists who just this spring brimmed with confidence about their chances of bringing the Terminator to extinction.

Mr. Angelides duly followed the left-wing, Bush-bashing script -- seemingly ideal in a state where barely one in three voters supports the president. Campaigning against Iraq and for a classic redistributionist agenda funded with higher taxes, Mr. Angelides won handily among liberal voters in a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans by 43% to 34%.

The key to Mr. Schwarzenegger's victory lay not in seducing the left, but through his mastery of the state's rising independent center. According to exit polls, he beat Mr. Angelides by nearly 20 points among self-described moderates and independents. These voters may well be the key to the political future, certainly in California. * * *

As political analysts such as New America's David Lesher have pointed out, the "not party" now constitutes California's ascendant political grouping. Over the past decade, people registering without a major party affiliation have accounted for a remarkable 91% of all the growth in the electorate. They now constitute one in every five voters. These independents clearly have the wind to their backs, with disproportionate support among both Latino adults and young people. Indeed, nearly 40% of the state's voters under 25 have chosen to either register as "decline to state" or belong to a small party. If these trends continue, by 2025 independents could outnumber both Democrats and Republicans.

Such independents were critical in the recall of former Gov. Gray Davis and Mr. Schwarzenegger's election in 2003, but they are far from traditional conservatives. In fact, according to a Public Policy Institute of California survey conducted by Mark Baldassare, most are both environment-oriented -- Mr. Schwarzenegger's tough stand on global warming probably paid off with many of them -- and moderate to liberal on social issues. Yet at the same time, a majority also believes that government "wastes a lot of the taxpayers' money." In short, they blend anti-government populism with environmental consciousness.

The fiscal conservatism of California's electorate was plainly evident in the initiatives, where voters resoundingly voted down many of the pet pork-barrel projects of the elite left. They rejected one measure that would have steeply lifted the cost of cigarettes to pay for health care, and another that sought new levies on California's oil industry in order to fund renewable fuels and energy-awareness education. Similarly, voters overwhelmingly turned down a cynical bid by public employee unions to promote public financing of political campaigns and to tilt laws on contributions in ways that favored unions over businesses. This politically motivated raid on the Treasury lost almost three-to-one, passing only in the leftist stronghold of San Francisco.

On the other hand, the voters did embrace a series of infrastructure bonds that had been agreed upon by the legislature and the governor. Although the measures lacked imagination and were far from adequate to meet the state's growing needs, Californians proved willing to pay for new investments in the state's creaking physical public works. * * *

Two factors help explain California's lurch to the middle. One is demographics, and the other our real-life experience with what Republicans like to call "the Pelosi Democrats."

As to the former, California is in the midst of a massive movement of population -- and political power -- away from the coasts and toward what Brookings demographer Bill Frey and I have described as "the third California." This vast region, whose politics trend moderate to conservative, extends from the areas north of Sacramento down to the sprawling suburbs of San Bernardino-Riverside, east of Los Angeles.

The geographic shift is driven by such things as comparatively low housing prices, growing job opportunities for middle-class families and, for businesses, an often more welcoming regulatory environment. Since 2000, the third California is home to the vast majority of the state's population growth. The population in this region has grown by over 12%; coastal southern California ("the second California"), by contrast, has grown by barely 4%, while the Bay area ("the first California") has increased only marginally. Today, the third California accounts for almost 30% of the state's population. It already has more people than the liberal Bay area, and that gap is expected to widen significantly.

Some theorize that as coastal voters move east, they will bring their liberal values along with Whole Foods and Starbucks. Yet the evidence so far shows that these voters are changed by their new circumstances, such as home-ownership and childbearing, that may make them less likely to stick to liberal orthodoxies. "If you look at the results here, this place remains pretty conservative," suggests John Husing, a prominent economist in the San Bernardino-Riverside region and a self-described long-time middle-of-the-road Democrat. "These are people who came out of the coasts and like the fact they are new property owners and they want to protect what they have."

These trends were already evident in 2004, when support in the third California helped President Bush to add two-and-a-half points to his total in 2000. This year, the more nuanced approach of Mr. Schwarzenegger worked even better. San Francisco, Marin, Alameda and Los Angeles counties all dutifully voted for Mr. Angelides, but their voters were swamped by big counties like Fresno, Riverside and Kern, which backed Mr. Schwarzenegger by better than 2-1. Perhaps most significantly, Hispanics, particularly inland, also support him. He won 40% of the Latino vote, compared to the less than 30% who supported GOP congressional candidates nationwide, and he pulled this off despite an ill-advised flirtation with anti-immigration activists earlier in the year.

Meanwhile, those who think doctrinaire right-wingers have much of a future in the state are delusional. As Mr. Schwarzenegger was coasting to victory, his most attractive right-wing running mates, Tom McClintock and Bruce McPherson, failed to break past 45% of the vote.

In what could be a harbinger of things to come, the dynamic in California was driven in large part by the long-standing Democratic control of the legislature. Unlike the rest of the country, we may have already experienced what it's like to be ruled by "Pelosi Democrats."

The far-left character of the legislature has been shaped as much by bipartisan gerrymandering as by shifts in public opinion. The drawing of district lines assures that GOP districts are more likely to elect fundamentalist Republicans like Mr. McClintock who cannot win statewide. Yet the biggest winners have been the shaping of immigrant-dominated districts, which have few voters but many people. These have proved easy pickings for the increasingly Latino-dominated Democratic political machines, and their public employee and trial-lawyer allies. This has created a seemingly permanent, increasingly leftist Democratic majority in both houses. Despite the centrist tilt of the electorate, moderates in both parties have become an endangered species in Sacramento.

This unfortunate confluence does much to explain how Mr. Schwarzenegger got into office in the first place. Under relentless pressure from his party's left in the legislature, Gray Davis -- against his natural instincts -- caved in to a radical agenda that boosted workers' compensation rates to stratospheric levels, promoted the rights of "transgender" workers, and encouraged employees to sue their bosses. The resulting fiscal disaster, job losses and frustration among businesses, big and small, helped propel Mr. Schwarzenegger into office. Since then, the Democratic leadership has continued to keep him there by pushing such unpopular measures as drivers' licenses for illegal aliens, as well as a bonehead attempt to force schools to include "the contributions" of gays and lesbians in public-school textbooks. Such walks on the ideological wild side have kept the legislature unpopular with voters. In May, the solons had approval ratings of 23%.

Herein may lie the most critical lesson that California can pass on to the rest of the country. Unwilling to let the loonies have clear access to the Treasury, Californians have decided to stymie them with -- literally in this case -- a political strongman. If Ms. Pelosi's crew starts acting in much the same way as their Sacramento counterparts, Americans in the rest of the country could opt for a similar strategy when the next presidential election comes around.

Insurers' Plan Aims To Cover Uninsured (WP/AP)

By Kevin Freking

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Health insurance companies proposed a $300 billion plan Monday aimed at getting coverage for all uninsured children in three years and for most adults within 10.

The plan includes tax breaks for the working poor and increased spending by the government for Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

"This bold program would expand coverage to tens of millions within a framework that is fiscally sound and promotes individual responsibility," said J. Grover Thomas Jr., board chairman of America's Health Insurance Plans.

The largest of the tax breaks would go for universal health accounts. Individuals could set aside up to $2,000 a year and families up to $4,000 and use the money to pay for any type of health insurance, not just plans that require patients to pay significant upfront costs.

The insurers also called for giving low-income families a tax credit worth up to $500 when they secure health insurance for their children.

They said their proposal would go a long way toward providing basic coverage to more than 40 million uninsured, the group said.

The trade group made no recommendations as to how the government should pay the bill of $300 billion over 10 years, but it noted that expanding coverage to the uninsured would bring significant savings to the insured. That's because the insured subsidize much of the health care provided to the uninsured in the form of higher monthly premiums.

Americans spend about $2 trillion a year on health care, and about $600 billion of that money comes from the federal government.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said Monday morning that he had not yet seen the insurers' proposal, but he did sense that there were opportunities to expand insurance coverage next year that lawmakers from both parties could back.

Lawmakers from both parties have said reauthorizing the children's health program next year would be a priority, and many have expressed hope that the program would be expanded.

The American Medical Association, which represents physicians, said it welcomed the plan.

"Clearly, current programs to cover the uninsured are insufficient and more must be done," said Dr. Ardis D. Hoven, an AMA board member.

"The fact that even the health insurance industry is talking reform shows a growing consensus that reform is really needed," said Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., who is expected next year to oversee the Senate's Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. "We showed in Massachusetts that bipartisan progress on health care is possible, and we should do the same here in Washington."

The expansion of Medicaid, a state-federal partnership, to all people at 100 percent of poverty would help about 12 million people become insured. The universal health accounts would help about 25 million people afford insurance, the insurance group said.

DOJ_NMG_0093967

The early focus would be on children. The trade group calls for letting families at 300 percent of poverty or below participate in the State Children's Health Insurance Program. That expansion would help about 5 million people get insurance. The child tax credit would help about 3 million get coverage.

The goal is to get all uninsured children coverage within three years, and 95 percent of uninsured adults would get coverage within 10 years. Insurers would contribute through efforts to rein in administrative costs, the group said.

Health Insurance Industry Urges Expansion Of Coverage (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — The health insurance industry proposed an expansion of Medicaid and new tax breaks on Monday with the goal of guaranteeing coverage for all children in three years and for virtually all adults within 10 years.

New members of Congress, especially those elected on a pledge to help the uninsured, are likely to embrace many of the proposals, which provide a benchmark for debate on the issue. The debate is likely to rage in the next Congress and in the 2008 presidential campaign.

The latest government figures show that 46.6 million Americans lacked health insurance in 2005, an increase of 17 percent, or 6.8 million, from 2000.

"We believe that every American should have access to affordable health care coverage," said J. Grover Thomas Jr., chairman of America's Health Insurance Plans, the main lobby for the industry, which offered the proposals.

The industry proposed these steps, estimated to cost $300 billion over 10 years:

¶The federal government and the states should expand Medicaid to cover all adults with annual incomes under the poverty level, including single adults who cannot now qualify. The poverty level is $16,600 for a family of three and $9,800 for an individual.

¶The Children's Health Insurance Program, financed jointly by the federal government and the states, should, at a minimum, cover all children in families with incomes less than twice the poverty level.

¶Congress should create tax incentives for people to establish "universal health accounts." People could take tax deductions for amounts contributed to such accounts. They could use the accounts to pay premiums for any type of health insurance. The federal government would help pay premiums for people with incomes below certain levels.

¶Congress should establish a tax credit for individuals and families who buy health insurance for their children. The credit would be $200 a child, up to a maximum of $500 for a family. It would be available to families with incomes up to three times the poverty level — up to $60,000 for a family of four.

The industry did not say how its proposals would be paid for; did not recommend any budget cuts or tax increases; and did not say what, if anything, it would do to slow the growth of health costs.

When hospitals care for the uninsured, they often pass on some of the costs to people who have health insurance. Jay M. Gellert, president of Health Net, a managed-care company based in Woodland Hills, Calif., said this "cost shift" threatened to make coverage unaffordable for employers, who provide health benefits to 175 million people.

Ronald F. Pollack, the executive director of Families USA, a liberal-leaning consumer group, said: "Given the insurance industry's history as a major opponent of health care reform in 1993-94, this set of proposals is very welcome. The proposals for public programs, in particular, are laudable."

Grace-Marie Turner, president of the Galen Institute, a research center that advocates free-market health policies, said: "Conservatives will be able to support this. It has something for everyone."

Under current law, employers can generally take tax deductions for the cost of providing health benefits to employees. The industry plan calls for a similar deduction for people who buy coverage on their own, in the individual health insurance market.

In a sense, insurers, like other industries, are recommending tax subsidies for the products they sell. More generally, they are proposing a public-private partnership to cope with a problem — the soaring cost of health care and health insurance — that affects families, employers and the nation's ability to compete in a global economy.

"We are the last industrialized country in the world not to have universal coverage," said George C. Halvorson, chairman of the Kaiser Permanente health plan.

Many economists say the tax code is biased against individual insurance. The industry said it was proposing "full tax deductibilty for health insurance premiums" to correct the bias.

C. Eugene Steuerle, a senior fellow at the Urban Institute, said he worried that such a change could create incentives for some employees to buy insurance on their own, rather than through the workplace. "Unless carefully designed," he said, "that change could reduce the incentives for employers to provide coverage, and we could get a net increase in the number of people without insurance."

Mr. Thomas, who is chairman of Trustmark Mutual Holding Company, based in Lake Forest, Ill., said this concern was unfounded. Workers would generally lose the employer's subsidy for their health care if they bought insurance outside the workplace, he said.

Many economists say the tax code, by subsidizing the purchase of health insurance, has fostered excessive use of health care services, driving up costs. "New subsidies could aggravate that problem," Mr. Steuerle said.

Hope For Millions Without Health Coverage (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Alarmed by the relentless erosion of employer-sponsored medical benefits, the health insurance industry today unveiled a proposal to extend coverage to more than 46 million uninsured persons.

Combining solutions favored by Democrats with some that Republicans have backed, the proposal by America's Health Insurance Plans calls for providing coverage within three years to all uninsured children, currently numbering about 8 million, and within 10 years to virtually all adults.

The trade group's plan would rely on a mixture of expanded federal and state programs and tax credits for workers and their families to purchase private health insurance.

"We should transcend the rigidly partisan political debates that have led only to stalemate," the group said in a statement accompanying the proposal. "Our nation needs a pragmatic approach driven by a broad understanding of the nature of the challenge and a strong commitment to the goal of covering all Americans."

AHIP, as the group is known, represents almost 1,300 companies that provide health insurance policies, including traditional fee-for-service plans and managed-care plans such as health maintenance organizations.

The insurance industry said its plan would cost the federal government $300 billion over 10 years, but the proposal lacked specifics on how it would be financed. Other estimates of providing coverage for all have been higher, $50 billion to $80 billion a year. By comparison, the federal government already spends more than $530 billion a year on two giant healthcare programs, Medicare for the elderly and Medicaid for the poor.

The high cost of health insurance is the main reason for the rising number of uninsured Americans. The Kaiser Family Foundation's 2006 healthcare survey found an average cost of almost $11,500 a year for an employer-sponsored family plan. Employers, particularly smaller businesses, have been shedding coverage as costs have risen, and many individuals find it too costly to purchase a plan on their own.

With Democrats taking over Congress next year, many policy leaders in the medical community, labor unions and even corporate boardrooms are hoping to revive a national debate that has been dormant since the collapse of the Clinton administration's plan more than 10 years ago.

"The election shows that Americans pay attention and they're willing to support change," Dr. Raymond J. Gibbons, president of the American Heart Assn., said Sunday at the group's annual scientific conference in Chicago. "There has been woefully little public discussion and, as a result, we haven't had the kind of national dialogue that's needed to find a solution."

Polls show that Americans strongly back guaranteed coverage for all, but support melts away if it would mean significantly higher taxes — suggesting that the next debate on overhauling healthcare will focus on controlling costs.

Already, U.S. employers say the high cost of health insurance for their workers puts them at a competitive disadvantage in the global marketplace. General Motors, for example, spent $5.3 billion for healthcare in 2005, more than it did on steel.

The health insurance industry's proposal would build on the current system, a mix of federal and state programs, employer plans and individuals buying their own coverage.

It calls for the expansion of the federally funded State Children's Health Insurance Program to cover all children in families with incomes up to twice the federal poverty level. That would help most children in low-income working families, since a family of four making up to $40,000 would be able to receive benefits.

Similarly, the plan would expand Medicaid eligibility to adults earning up to the federal poverty level, which is $9,800 for a single person.

The idea of using existing government programs to solve the problem of the uninsured has strong support among Democrats. But the insurance industry proposal also calls for two new tax breaks, a kind of approach traditionally favored by Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0093969

A new $200-per-child tax credit, or up to $500 per family, would go to middle-class families who could show that their children were covered. The plan also calls for the creation of universal health accounts, a kind of tax break that would make it more affordable for the self-employed and those not covered by an employer to buy coverage on their own.

Banks Pile Into Health Savings Accounts (WSJ)

By Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Just in time for benefits-enrollment season, health savings accounts are getting a big push from your local bank.

Nearly 1,100 banks now offer the tax-favored spending accounts, more than triple the number at the end of 2005, according to market-research firm Information Strategies Inc. The growth comes as more employees enroll in high-deductible health plans, which are paired with health savings accounts, or HSAs, to help pay for the deductible and other out-of-pocket medical costs. But savings not needed to pay medical expenses can accumulate in a HSA for years, and this has sparked bank interest in offering such accounts.

The abundance of new HSA offerings is triggering competition that is helping to push fees lower and expanding the options for consumers to invest their savings. Most HSAs previously earned interest, sometimes at relatively low rates. Now, banks increasingly are offering other investment options, including mutual funds, if consumers have a minimum required balance.

Consumers eligible to open a HSA have greater options. Here's what to consider:

• Accounts must be paired with a high-deductible health plan.

• Set-up charges and monthly fees can vary widely.

• Some HSAs offer investment options, while others only pay interest.

Plus, see a comparison of HSA offerings.

Among other options: Bank of America Corp. is expected to announce this week that it will introduce a new credit card, in partnership with major health plans, that will let holders earn rewards points that convert automatically into cash in their HSAs. And in January, the bank's customers will be able to invest their HSA balances in mutual funds offered by the bank's Columbia Management arm.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., which previously marketed its HSAs primarily through employers, will begin later this month to allow individuals to enroll for the accounts online. The bank also offers mutual-fund investments to its HSA holders.

The abundance of new offerings means consumers interested in a HSA need to shop around. The accounts vary widely in their structure and fees. Initial setup charges are $10 to $20 at Chase, for instance, but free at U.S. Bancorp. Ongoing monthly fees are $4 at BB&T Corp., but free at Huntington Bancshares Inc. Not all banks disclose the fees on their Web sites, while others make the information frustratingly hard to find.

It doesn't help that interest rates paid on the balances in HSAs vary widely. HSA Bank, of Sheboygan, Wisc., which specializes in health savings accounts and has customers in all 50 states, pays 1.98% interest on an average daily balance of $1,000, although rates are higher for bigger balances. Chase's current rate is 4.11%, regardless of the balance, while Bank of America pays 2.96%. Some banks offer a tiered system, including BB&T, which pays 1.49% for balances up to $2,499. That jumps to 4.47% for balances of $25,000 and greater.

The widening availability of HSAs is expected to help propel the total number of accounts by year end to about 3.6 million, holding $5 billion in combined deposits, according to Information Strategies. That's up from 1.1 million accounts and deposits totaling $1.2 billion at the end of 2005. The accounts are fairly new -- Congress first authorized them in 2003 -- so the number of account holders is still a small proportion of health-plan enrollees overall.

HSAs are funded with pretax money, and income continues to grow tax free. What's more, account holders don't have to pay taxes on withdrawals as long as the money is used for qualified medical expenses. However, withdrawals to pay for other expenses are taxed, and the account holder will likely also have to pay a penalty. Because the penalty disappears after an account holder turns 65, HSAs are increasingly being used as a tax-deferred savings vehicle to help cover both medical and non-medical expenses in retirement.

To qualify to open an account, you must first be enrolled in a high-deductible health plan, which typically charges the consumer a lower premium than plans that have smaller deductibles. About 75% of all HSAs have been opened directly by consumers, but that percentage is expected to slide as more big companies begin adopting the high-deductible health plans to help reduce soaring costs of health-care benefits. Some employers pay fees and make contributions into HSAs for their workers.

Early offerings of HSAs were led by niche banks catering to small-business owners wanting to offer some health-care options to workers while watching the bottom line. Now, bigger banks are increasingly getting into the business, attracted by the lucrative combination of deposits, account fees and sales leads for mutual funds and other investments generated by customers.

In turn, the presence of big banks in the industry is expected to quickly spread awareness and hasten the adoption of HSAs, experts say.

"We think it's going to be a great opportunity," says Karen Hill, vice president in the consumer-product management group at KeyCorp, a Cleveland bank with branches in 13 states that will start offering health savings accounts by year end. And Huntington Bancshares, in Columbus, Ohio, will promote its new health savings account, to be launched early next year, to business customers interested in offering them to employees. Individuals also will be able to open an HSA on Huntington's Web site.

Industry officials say improvements are still needed with HSAs, especially in areas such as customer service. For instance, many banks offer debit cards that HSA holders can use to make purchases. Most of these cards, however, aren't able to track whether charged expenses are qualified to count toward a health plan's deductible. This can be a big headache for customers stuck monitoring their spending and holding on to receipts in order to avoid federal penalties on nonqualifying purchases. One new debit-card offering, planned by KeyCorp for early next year, will include an optional feature that allows consumers to restrict the card's use only to health-care providers and pharmacies.

Lame Ducks Wing It (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

This is not just the season when bright-eyed freshmen arrive for their congressional orientation. It is also the season of What Now? for the many officeholders and staffers who will be out of jobs in January. Not even former senators are free from the specter of college tuition bills.

"The first thing you do is, you buy a tin cup and pencils so that you can be assured of some income tomorrow," says former Oklahoma governor Frank Keating, who, after finishing his second term in 2003, went on to head the American Council of Life Insurers and to write children's books.

Envy the lucky corporate recruiters and their ringing phones. Pity the members of Congress who hoped against hope that they wouldn't be looking for work right now.

Some of them don't even have rÃ©sumÃ©s.

"It's probably been 20 or 30 years for some of these folks since they've looked for a job," says Nels Olson, who heads the Washington office of Korn/Ferry International, a headhunting firm.

On the other hand, in a few months these former members may be stinking rich in their new gigs, so maybe we shouldn't feel bad for them.

Washington's biennial job search is bigger than usual this year. In addition to members of Congress who are retiring or who lost their reelection bids, hundreds of Republican committee staffers may lose their jobs because Democrats are taking over the House and the Senate.

Too bad there's no way to measure the exchange of business cards in the nation's capital. Imagine the paper wasted. Imagine the traffic at Kinko's through December, with folks copying their cover letters. Some savvy staffers started making discreet calls about new jobs even before they knew the results of their bosses' reelection campaigns.

Oh, the exhilaration and exhaustion of the job search. Although former members of Congress are typically not reduced to perusing the classifieds, they are not immune to the pain of being rejected by prospective employers. The amount of money an outgoing member can command varies widely. A former member of Congress with a rock-star reputation might make, say, $2 million a year, says Olson. Another, lesser member might earn only a puny $300,000.

"Some are in great demand," says Robert Barnett, an attorney who has represented many high-profile government officials -- including Bill Clinton -- in their move to the private sector. "Others, unfortunately, have very, very few options."

This is one of the reasons that some firms use recruiters. Stuart Pape, the managing partner at the law firm Patton Boggs, says intermediaries minimize the "potential awkwardness" that might arise if a firm makes an unwanted overture to an outgoing member, or an outgoing member makes an unwanted overture to a firm.

And some former members don't transition well to the world of private industry. Perhaps they're not used to having people say no to them, or maybe they don't have much management acumen.

"It can be challenging to go from one of 100 in the Senate into the real world," says Ivan H. Adler, a lobbying recruiter at the McCormick Group in Arlington. "They're like popcorn in the pan. Some pop and some don't."

Barnett, who -- unlike a headhunter -- is retained by the employee rather than the employer, negotiates jobs along a wide spectrum, from law and lobbying firms to trade associations, television punditry gigs and paid speech tours.

DOJ_NMG_0093971

"I have a whole 10-page, single-spaced checklist of issues that come up in these negotiations," he says, ticking off compensation, bonuses, raises, stock options and such matters as whether the employee gets car service or gets to fly first class. Sometimes the employee who retained him can get an employer to pay Barnett's fee. The hottest of the hotshots get to bring along a few of their own staff members -- whose salaries are, of course, paid by the new employer.

Former senator Warren B. Rudman (R-N.H.), who is now "of counsel" to Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP, says that when he announced he was retiring in 1992 he fielded two dozen calls from lobbying and law firms. A former lawyer, he didn't hire anyone to negotiate his salary and benefits.

"I'm very experienced at it," he says. "I couldn't think of anybody better."

With two years to go in the current presidential administration, firms have already begun to compile their wish lists for those at the White House and in Cabinet departments.

"We've sat down with firms and, much like the NBA draft, done a draft in a variety of areas," Adler says. Firms start by considering a best-case scenario, obtaining a high-level "King Kong," and then work their way down to a "cheetah," perhaps a staffer. To take a hypothetical, consider the Justice Department, he says. "If we can't get the attorney general, who's next?"

Although Adler works for the firms that hire him, he also is contacted by prospective employees. Yesterday, by 3 p.m. he'd heard from eight already. Not all of these people are losing their jobs in January, Adler says. Some have started thinking about their next step even though their jobs are good for another two years. The midterms, he says, were a "psychological impetus" for a lot of people to start looking, whether they have to or not.

1981 (WSJ)

By George Melloan

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Nancy Pelosi gets a "favorable" rating from only 24% of the respondents to a new Rasmussen poll, exactly the same as the soon-to-be-demoted Dennis Hastert. She is viewed unfavorably by 44%. In short, the first female speaker of the House starts with a large deficit in public confidence. She would be unwise to think that the only way to go from here is up.

A greater wisdom would suggest that the Democrats -- their victory last Tuesday notwithstanding -- will need far more political wisdom than they have displayed in the recent past if they are to maintain more than a temporary grip on power. The voters turned against the Republicans, as Dick Armey made clear on this page last week, because they forgot their lines and lapsed into partisan gibberish. Their audience got up and left.

The Democrats have not shown much evidence that they can do better. By and large they stick to the old mantra about being the party defending the weak and the poor, with very few specifics. But the party probably has more substance than it has sometimes displayed during its years in the wilderness. And clearly, the voters are demanding something more from Congress than old-fashioned pork-barrel, party-machine politics. * * *

To find a template for how the Democrats might conduct themselves profitably over the next two years, it is useful to go back 25 years to the signature achievement of the supply-side revolution, the Kemp-Roth tax bill. It was this sharp cut in tax rates, particularly in the highest income brackets, that set public policy on a new course under Ronald Reagan. Republicans celebrate this as solely their achievement -- or at least those do who haven't forgotten why their party started winning, instead of losing, elections. But the revolution could not have been launched without the aid of some thoughtful Democrats. Their party, after all, was in control of the House, which initiates tax legislation, in 1981 -- with a hearty 56% to 44% majority.

The Republicans had just elected Reagan, aided by Jimmy Carter's string of economic and foreign-policy disasters. But the party was hardly unified. Indeed, it looked a great deal like it has looked over the last two years, as a body trying to live up to its reputation as "the stupid party." As Irving Kristol wrote on this page on Nov. 20, 1981, the new Senate was in the hands of conservative Republicans who had "never learned nor forgotten any economics since the days of Herbert Hoover" and were thus wary of tax cuts.

Even the new administration was riddled with doubters, as the president learned to his dismay when his bright, young budget director, David Stockman (in the Atlantic magazine in November 1981) called Kemp-Roth -- signed by the president three months earlier -- a "Trojan horse" designed to lower taxes on high incomes, that would lead to large budget deficits.

But Rep. Jack Kemp of New York and Sen. William Roth of Delaware had established a supply-side beachhead in the Republican Party years earlier, with the help of the editorial page of this newspaper. The late Robert L. Bartley, who became editor of this page in 1972, spotted the merits of supply-side economics early in his tenure, drawing on the talents of editorial writers Jude Wanniski and Paul Craig Roberts and economists who were little known at the time, among them Arthur Laffer and Robert Mundell.

The 1970s were a time of economic-policy chaos, touched off when Richard Nixon abandoned the Bretton Woods monetary system and inflicted wage and price controls on the economy in August 1971. Among the results were fuel shortages and an inflation that could not be suppressed by government controls (something intelligent economists have always known).

On the intellectual front, however, something good happened. Events discredited Keynesian economic theory, which had dominated academic and political thought since the '30s. The U.S. economy lapsed into stagflation, something not possible if you believe, as most Keynesians did, that economic growth and moderate inflation are handmaidens. Politicians had flocked to Keynesianism because it gave them intellectual underpinning for something they love to do -- spend public funds -- by arguing that government can counter recession by writing more checks.

There was nothing complicated about supply-side theory. It was classical economics. Fundamentally, it held that you have to produce if you want to consume and that anything the government does to discourage production is damaging to economic growth. That includes not only excessive economic regulation (e.g., price and wage controls) but high tax rates on the marginal earnings of the most productive citizens. These are the people who earn surpluses above their immediate needs and thereby build the total pool of capital available to expand the capital stock and create new jobs.

Art Laffer, who was also a former hireling in the budget office, argued as well that static calculations of how much revenues would be lost by the tax cuts were wrong because they ignored the fact that the cuts would stimulate economic activity and draw funds hidden in tax shelters back into the revenue stream. He proved to be right.

Reagan -- who co-majored in economics at little Eureka College in Illinois back when they were still teaching classical economics -- had learned early in life that you have to work to eat, and understood all this well. Shortly after he took office, he put forward the Kemp-Roth bill, which called for a 30% reduction in tax rates.

The Democrats in the House also had been going through a learning process. Tip O'Neill, for all his rhetorical excesses, was a strong leader of the Democrat caucus and a practical politician. The Democrats knew that the nation's capital base had been dangerously eroded during the '70s inflation and that their party deserved some blame. So "capital formation" became the mantra of the Democrats and it was a very good one.

As Irving Kristol wrote in his 1981 piece, the Republican supply-siders and the Democrat capital formation crowd found a common purpose, overwhelming the troglodytes of both parties. Kemp-Roth passed, although congressional budget deficit worriers insisted on phasing it in over three years and reducing the size of the cuts to 25%. Meanwhile, Paul Volcker over at the Fed was slaughtering inflation, and quite a few unfortunates who had banked on its continuance, with a severe clampdown on money creation. The combination of congressional timidity and tight money provoked a sharp recession in 1982, one that sent even larger numbers of Republicans running for cover and brought jeers from their natural enemies.

But in January 1983, Bob Bartley opened the year with an editorial titled "At Last, a Tax Cut," making the point that, after all the hedges Congress had installed in Kemp-Roth, the year would finally bring a true reduction in tax rates that would benefit economic growth. He was right on the money. The economy soon leaped from the recession and the stagnation of the '70s. The growth rate exceeded the historically respectable 3% for the rest of the Reagan administration, and was the basis for the last 25 years of largely uninterrupted economic growth. Keynesian theory was finally dead and classical economics had been restored to its proper place.

Yet one point has been mostly overlooked. The Democrats who wanted policies to encourage capital formation were essentially on the same page as Reagan and the supply-siders. Capital formation is impossible without government policies that encourage work and investment. So the Democrats, if they had wanted to, could have taken some of the credit for the supply-side revolution. Not many have wanted to, apparently.

But that was yesterday, and now the Democrats are back in power in Congress. President Bush introduced some daring, new and much-needed policies in his first six years -- notably Social Security and immigration reform -- only to see them sidetracked by Republican disunity and weak leadership in Congress. Will the voters' decision to throw the bums out and give the Democrats a try produce better results? The congressional Democrats of 2006 don't look much like those of 25 years ago. But they now have an opportunity to demonstrate whether they can think as well as talk.

Let's Fight To Make America's Agenda The GOP's Agenda (RC)

By Rep. Joe Barton

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

My commitment to every House Republican is a legislative agenda that matches America's, and my "majority-back guarantee" is this: We will achieve a net gain of seats in each upcoming election cycle. If we fail to regain the majority within three election cycles, I will not seek the position of Minority Leader in the succeeding session.

DOJ_NMG_0093973

No Republican should be the next Minority Leader, but the voters of America decided otherwise, and I honor their decision.

House Republicans were once on track to become a permanent majority. Now some say the train has outrun the tracks, that we seemed to care more about the smoke and fire in the engine than who was in the cars and where we were taking them.

Let's get back on track by starting with the people who work and pay taxes and who expect us to deliver on our commitment to less government and more freedom. Government runs on the money taken from their pockets, and issue No. 1 should be sticking with the tax cuts so that working families decide how to spend their money instead of politicians and bureaucrats.

Next, "balance the budget" has been the oath and curse of every politician in the past half-century, and a promise to do it begins with a credibility gap. It is true that we've cut the deficit by $165 billion, but hardly anybody believes that balancing the budget by spending less is a consistent priority. That needs to change.

We should start with real entitlement reform. Entitlement spending amounts to $1.4 trillion, and it is now 53 percent of the budget and growing. Entitlement spending costs each American taxpayer $7,698 a year. People who work and pay taxes need help, too. If you believe in the sunrise, you also must believe in the sunset, and it seems clear that it is time for the sun to set on some programs.

It takes guts to say no, but the answer to bad ideas must be no. It's wrong when Medicaid, which is a welfare program for poor people, is spending its dollars on nursing home care for people who hide their wealth to seem poor.

It also is time to put the privacy of the people ahead of the needs of business. On the wall of my office is a sign that every visitor notices. It says, "Fear God, Tell the Truth, Make a Profit." Protecting privacy is about truth, not profit. I believe strongly in both, but truth-telling comes ahead of profit-making for a reason.

Finally, the House also has a responsibility that it even fails to recognize, much less exercise: holding the Senate accountable. In George Washington's ancient cup-and-saucer description of how Congress works, the Senate was the saucer where hot ideas from the House were poured so they might cool. That was then. Now it is the place where good bills go to die, and it is an elephants' graveyard for the president's agenda.

One final thing we need to get right as a party and as an institution is ethics. Nearly every Member of the House, on both sides of the aisle, is totally honest and hardworking. Yet voters are told every day that we are crooks, and they believe it. We need to come up with simple rules that are transparent to the public. When the occasional bad apple falls, let's deal with it openly, quickly and cleanly.

Where did we go wrong? Probably in blurring the essence of what makes Republicans distinct from Democrats. We spent money without requiring accountability, so much so that sometimes we must have looked like Democrats-lite. And except for welfare reform, we somehow managed to avoid credit for the good things that we did well despite rugged opposition and biting criticism from Democrats.

I know that when the Republican agenda matches America's agenda, our party prospers. That's why we won the majority in 1994, and while we have our disagreements, our party does not suffer the affliction of being a boiling-mad collection of fringe interests that make average Americans cringe.

Whoever does for America what Americans want done — cuts people's taxes, balances their budget, protects their privacy, cherishes integrity — they will be on track to become the most successful political party in history. That should be us, and that's why I am running for Minority Leader.

Bush And Israeli Prime Minister Maintain Tough Front On Iran (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — President Bush and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel kept up their tough talk on Iran on Monday, warning it once again to drop its nuclear ambitions, even as Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain suggested that Tehran could take a role in stabilizing Iraq under "a new partnership."

Officials in Israel have expressed increasing fear that Mr. Bush will reduce the pressure on Iran to cease its nuclear program as calls increase from European allies and at home to seek Tehran's help in Iraq.

But Mr. Bush, speaking after his meeting with the Israeli leader, said his position on talks with Iran had not changed. "If the Iranians want to have a dialogue with us, we have shown them a way forward," he said, "and that is for them to verify — verifiably suspend their enrichment activities."

DOJ_NMG_0093974

In comments to reporters, Mr. Olmert warned that Iran posed a threat not just to Israel, but to the world. A spokeswoman said later that was his main message to President Bush during their nearly hour-long Oval Office meeting on Monday, though State Department officials said Mr. Bush needed no such reminders.

"The fact that the leader of a nation such as Iran can threaten the very existence of another nation, as he does towards Israel," Mr. Olmert said of the Iranian leader Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, "is not something that we can tolerate or would ever tolerate."

Mr. Blair spoke in a foreign policy address in Britain about the same time that Mr. Bush and Mr. Olmert met, first in the Oval Office and then for a working lunch that included some of their top aides. It was the second White House meeting between the leaders since Mr. Olmert became prime minister, and their first since Israel's unsuccessful campaign against Hezbollah in Lebanon this summer.

Though Mr. Blair's stance on Iran, telegraphed in the British press beforehand, hovered over the talks in Washington, American officials were careful to note that Mr. Blair had made tough demands, including an insistence that Iran would have to change its behavior drastically to become a negotiating partner.

Both Mr. Bush and Mr. Olmert entered the talks in weakened political positions: Mr. Olmert's popularity has dipped significantly since the 34-day war with Hezbollah; Mr. Bush lost his governing Congressional majority just one week ago.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Olmert also warned Syria against interfering in Lebanon, where Hezbollah has provoked a political crisis by seeking more power in the government. But the two leaders seemed more open than they have been recently concerning possibly closer relations with Syria, with Mr. Olmert saying, "I hope that one day the conditions for contacts between them and us will be created."

A spokeswoman for Mr. Olmert, Miri Eisin, said Mr. Olmert and Mr. Bush discussed everything from the American elections to the Israeli economy. But Ms. Eisin said that "the Iranian issue was the main issue on the table" and that Mr. Olmert was comforted by Mr. Bush's tone.

Ms. Eisin said Mr. Bush and Mr. Olmert also discussed the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, though that process is in limbo as the militant Palestinian faction of Hamas seeks a new political leader who can work with President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority to form a coalition government. The United States and the European Union have suspended aid to the Authority until Hamas, which came into power in the spring, recognizes Israel and existing Palestinian agreements with it. Hamas and Mr. Abbas are seeking a way to restart the flow of money.

Bush Meets With Israeli PM, Urges Global Isolation Of Iran (USAT)

From Wire Reports

USA Today, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush called Monday for worldwide isolation of Iran until it "gives up its nuclear ambitions."

The risk to the world extends beyond Israel and the Middle East, Bush said after meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at the White House. The United States and Israel say Iran is working on nuclear weapons. Iran says its work is aimed at producing energy.

"Iran's nuclear ambitions are not in the world's interest," Bush said. "If Iran had nuclear weapons it would be terribly destabilizing."

Olmert said he was not looking for a confrontation with Iran. "I am not looking for wars," he said before meeting Bush. Israel is worried by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repeated calls to destroy Israel. Olmert said: "This is not an issue of Israel only. This is a moral issue of the whole world."

Bush's prescription for dealing with Iran: having the United Nations impose sanctions to force Iran to stop uranium enrichment. Diplomats at the U.N. have been trying to agree on a resolution that would place sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its enrichment program.

"If they continue to move forward with the program, there has to be a consequence," Bush said. "And a good place to start is working together to isolate the country."

Palestinian gestures toward peacemaking with Israel also were a key topic. In an interview with the Palestinian daily Al-Quds published Monday, Olmert said he would be willing to talk to the militant Hamas group that has led the Palestinian government since January if it renounced violence, recognized Israel and accepted past peace deals, as demanded by the United States, the European Union and Israel.

Bush, Olmert Unite Against Nuclear Arms In Iran (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And David Sands

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

President Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said yesterday that they cannot accept a nuclear-armed Iran, and the Israeli leader accused the Islamic republic of "fanaticism."

After a private meeting at the White House, they told reporters that they want to continue to isolate Iran until it halts uranium-enrichment efforts, which they think is part of a nuclear-weapons program.

"It's very important for the world to unite with one common voice to say to the Iranians that if you choose to continue forward, you'll be isolated. And one source of isolation would be economic isolation," Mr. Bush told reporters.

The United States has let European nations take the lead in the slow diplomacy to try to block Iran's nuclear program, but Mr. Bush -- with Israel as a very interested partner -- has pushed for stronger statements and specific consequences should Iran continue the program.

Mr. Olmert said that Israel, which is widely thought to have a nuclear arsenal, is worried about statements by Iran's president threatening the existence of Israel and that those threats are "not something that we can tolerate or would ever tolerate, and certainly not when we know that he is trying to possess nuclear weapons."

Briefing reporters after the White House meeting, Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin said the Iran problem and the Israeli-Palestinian peace process took up much of the discussions, with broad areas of agreement on both issues between the two leaders.

Mrs. Eisin said Israel was "not against compromise" with Tehran so long as the Islamic republic did not develop or acquire nuclear weapons. Iran, she said, "needs to fear the implications if they don't compromise" on the nuclear issue.

The spokeswoman sidestepped questions about an upcoming Iraq report by a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. The panel, which met with Mr. Bush yesterday just before Mr. Olmert did, is said to be considering several major changes to U.S. policy on Iraq and the Middle East, including direct talks with Syria and Iran, and pressure on Israel to seek a peace deal with moderate Palestinians.

Mrs. Eisin said that Israel recently has seen "very positive" statements by moderate Arab leaders in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan about reviving the peace process and that Mr. Olmert repeatedly has stressed willingness to meet with Palestinian Authority head Mahmoud Abbas "at any time."

The spokeswoman said that Mr. Bush and Mr. Olmert had a "long discussion" on Iraq, and that Mr. Olmert gave assurances that "Israel will be behind America whatever the U.S. chooses to do."

There were no major points of disagreement in the talks, Mrs. Eisin said.

"Not every visit is a dramatic one," she said. "This was not a dramatic visit."

Bush, Olmert Warn Of Threat In Iran (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, November 14, 2006

At a potential turning point in its war in Iraq, the Bush administration paused Monday to huddle with worried ally Israel over the crisis next door in Iran and to take stock of other Mideast trouble spots.

Israel is worried that political fallout from the Republican election losses and rising calls for U.S. engagement with Iran may soften President Bush's resolve against a country whose president has said the Jewish state should be wiped from the map. Bush offered some reassurance on Iran during an Oval Office meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"I recognize the threat to world peace that the Iranians ... pose, as does the prime minister," Bush told reporters following the 90-minute meeting.

Olmert's White House meeting, his first since an inconclusive war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon weakened his own political footing at home, also covered the deteriorating political situations in the Palestinians territories and in Lebanon, U.S. and Israeli officials said. Iraq was a topic, but Israelis made clear that Iran's influence and support for terrorism was foremost on Olmert's mind.

"The Iran issue was the main issue on the table," Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin told reporters after the session. "Talking about what you do with this combination, what do you do with a president who not only backs terror but is actively pursuing nuclear weapons?"

The United States alleges that Iran has a rogue nuclear weapons program and is pressing for United Nations Security Council sanctions to punish Iran if it will not scale back sensitive nuclear fuel production. Israel is a presumed target if Iran produced a bomb. Iran denies that it is trying to build nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0093976

The nuclear threat has been the focus of recent U.S. concern about its old adversary, but Iran also has unique influence within its Shiite neighbor Iraq and the potential to undermine the U.S. goals for a unified Iraqi government up to the task of securing and running the country when the U.S. withdraws.

Bush saw Olmert on the same day he was interviewed by an independent panel studying U.S. options in the Iraq war. The bipartisan group's report next month is expected to offer the Bush administration a possible path to change course or scale back its ambitions in the war now in its fourth year.

The Iraq Study Group may also address possible U.S. responses if the rising sectarian warfare in Iraq becomes the all-out civil war that Israel and many other Mideast neighbors fear.

One of the group's co-chairs, the influential Bush family adviser James A. Baker III, has said the United States should not cut off dialogue with its adversaries, and the group may recommend a new overture to Iran and Syria. Israeli officials say they fear any accommodation of Iran, and has tried to keep up pressure among European allies as well as the United States.

"There is no question that the Iranian threat is not just a threat for Israel, but for the whole world," Olmert said following the session with Bush. "The fanaticism and the extremism of the Iranian government, and the fact that the leader of a nation such as Iran can threaten the very existence of another nation, as he does towards the state of Israel, is not something that we can tolerate."

The Bush administration reversed itself earlier this year and offered to bargain face to face with Iran for the first time in years, if Iran would first suspend disputed nuclear activities.

Iran has so far refused the offer and spurned a package of economic and political incentives that the West hoped to trade for nuclear concessions.

Bush said the U.S. has not changed the terms, and he warned of "economic isolation" for Iran if it presses ahead.

"There has to be a consequence for their intransigence," Bush said.

Negotiations over initial, mild U.N. sanctions on Iran have gone slowly this fall, and it is not clear that the United States has support from key partners Russia and China to slap more punishing restrictions on the oil-rich regime. Neither the U.S. nor Israel has independent economic clout with Iran.

Why Iran Shares U.S. Spotlight With Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Last week's midterm elections were largely about Iraq, but when President Bush departs for an eight-day Asia swing today, another country will top his list of concerns: Iran.

How to deter Iran's nuclear ambitions and persuade the country to help stabilize neighboring Iraq is expected to be a main topic during Mr. Bush's private meetings with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao. Russia and China have expressed reservations about U.S. and European efforts to pass a United Nations Security Council resolution designed to force Iran to rein in its nuclear program.

The Bush administration has long ruled out direct talks with Iran unless Tehran suspends its uranium-enrichment efforts. But the White House is facing mounting domestic and international pressure to seek Iranian help in calming the situation in Iraq. British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Australian Premier John Howard said Monday they were in favor of talking to Iran and Syria about ways to reduce the violence in Iraq -- a stance shared by many influential U.S. lawmakers from both parties.

Calls for direct talks with Iran are likely to increase. The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel led by former Republican Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat, is expected to recommend that the U.S. negotiate with regional powerhouses like Iran and Syria about Iraq, said people familiar with its work.

Members of the Baker-Hamilton commission met with Mr. Bush and his top national-security team for the first time yesterday at the White House. Speaking to reporters afterward, Mr. Bush said he was "impressed by the questions they asked" and looking forward to reading the group's report. Many say they hope the report, which is expected next month, can serve as a blueprint for overhauling U.S. policy in Iraq.

The administration would face tough choices in any potential negotiations with Iran. Tehran is expected to seek U.S. concessions regarding its nuclear program in exchange for providing any assistance in Iraq. Mr. Bush has ruled out allowing Iran to develop nuclear weapons, so it is unclear what, if anything, the U.S. would be willing to give Iran in return for its help.

"They would certainly want a quid pro quo. And the question would be: If they want it, what are we prepared to give them?" said David Steinberg, a foreign-policy expert at Georgetown University.

White House officials yesterday reiterated that the U.S. would talk to Iran only if it halts its uranium-enrichment work, citing Mr. Bush's comments yesterday that his position on Iran "hasn't changed." National Security Council spokesman Gordon

Johndroe declined to say whether the administration expects Iran to seek U.S. concessions on its nuclear program in return for any assistance in Iraq, or how the U.S. would respond.

"What we expect Iran to do is stop meddling in Iraq, and to stop providing weapons there that are used to kill Iraqis and Americans," he said.

Mr. Bush is bringing a range of objectives to his Asia trip, which will take him to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia. The centerpiece is a three-day stop in Hanoi for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, where Mr. Bush is scheduled to sit down Sunday with a number of regional leaders, including President Hu, to talk trade, regional security, and issues such as North Korea's nuclear program.

Mr. Bush will depart for Asia on a sour note after the lame-duck Congress failed to pass legislation lifting Cold War-era economic restrictions on Vietnam and granting the country the same benefits as other U.S. trading partners in the World Trade Organization. Mr. Bush had hoped to arrive in Vietnam with the measure in place, but the congressional setback makes that far less likely. Even if they opt to try again, supporters of the bill have only a small window of time this week to get the bill through both the House and the Senate before Mr. Bush's arrival in Vietnam Friday.

Still, Iran will cast a shadow over Mr. Bush's trip, as he seeks to reach consensus with several putative allies over the nuclear programs of both Iran and North Korea.

For more than two months, the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- the U.S., Britain, France, China and Russia -- have tussled over how to pressure Tehran after it spurned an earlier U.N. resolution demanding it suspend its uranium-enrichment work, and persuade it to join talks on the future of its nuclear program.

Negotiations at the U.N. over the issue ground to a halt last week over Russian objections to a draft sanctions resolution put forward by Britain, France and Germany. Both Russia and China worry that a possible hard-line resolution could pave the way for an eventual military attack on Iran by the U.S. and others. Russia is also concerned that a sanctions push may turn Iran away from future talks and spur it to follow the example set by North Korea, which conducted its first nuclear-weapons test.

Moscow is eager to preserve Russia's lucrative business dealings with Iran, primarily at the nuclear-reactor project in the Iranian port city of Bushehr.

China, which considers Iran to be far less important strategically than North Korea, also is anxious to preserve good relations with Iran. Iran is China's third-largest supplier of crude oil and an expanding market for Chinese goods.

Mr. Putin met Saturday with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, as part of a Russian bid to head off international sanctions against Iran and launch six-country talks that would include both Iran and the U.S.

Last week's Democratic sweep to take control of Congress, combined with the anticipated recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, have led many to conclude that U.S. talks may be inevitable both with Iran and with Syria, another Iraqi neighbor and U.S. rival.

"There is no alternative to this approach," said Imad Moustapha, Syria's ambassador to Washington, who said he has met with people working on the Baker report. "If not today, if not in two months time, eventually the U.S. will re-engage with Syria. It is inevitable. And the same goes for Iran."

Tug Of War With U.S. Unsettles Neighbors (WT)

By Iason Athanasiadis

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

TEHRAN -- Iranian leaders say that years of efforts to improve relations with the country's Arab neighbors are being undermined by the hard-line policies of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the nation's support for Shi'ite groups in Iraq.

Some diplomats and foreign policy analysts argue that the United States is working to hasten this process by encouraging the formation of a Sunni political coalition in Baghdad with the tacit support of the region's conservative Arab states.

"The U.S. strategically needs to stay in Iraq, but all conditions are against it," said Ali Khorram, an analyst who has served as Iran's ambassador to various U.N. bodies. "For the situation to change, they're fabricating an enemy for the Arab countries of the region -- and that is the Islamic Republic of Iran."

Splits reportedly have been developing within the Iranian leadership since before the summer. A faction led by Ali Larijani, the secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, supports reopening negotiations with the West over Iran's nuclear program. Another group, led by Mr. Ahmadinejad, maintains a hard-line stance.

Mr. Ahmadinejad "is counting for everything on Iraq, on the U.S. getting stuck there," said a close acquaintance of the president. "But he doesn't realize that [President] Bush doesn't care, he doesn't have anything to lose."

Mr. Ahmadinejad "is doing a big gamble, and it's not a calculated one."

DOJ_NMG_0093978

Iran suffered through a destructive eight-year war after an Iraqi invasion in September 1980. The Arab states of the Persian Gulf bankrolled Saddam Hussein's war effort with an estimated $1 billion a year because they feared an aggressive revolutionary Shi'ite republic.

Since the start of that war, Iran has worked diplomatically to reassure its Arab neighbors that it is not a threat. President Mohammed Khatami pursued that effort aggressively until Mr. Ahmadinejad replaced him last year.

"Mahmoud [Ahmadinejad] is demolishing all these efforts that Khatami made to allay the Arabs' fears of us," said the president's close acquaintance.

"He believes that Iran has to be a superpower and does not like the Arab monarchies because he's anti-shah. So he's returning the revolution to where we started, and it's taken 25 years to assure [the Arabs] that we're not a threat."

Mr. Ahmadinejad told Jordan's King Abdullah II that improved relations with Arab states were a priority for his government, the Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

The leaders of Sunni Arab powerhouses Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan have warned against the creeping influence of political Shi'ite Islam after political gains by the minority sect in Iraq and Lebanon.

Many Iranians interpreted the war this summer between Israel and the Shi'ite Lebanese political movement Hezbollah as an indirect attempt by Israel and the United States to obstruct Tehran's reach in the Arab Middle East by targeting its Lebanese ally.

Saudi Arabia surprised the region when it publicly condemned Hezbollah's seizure of two Israeli soldiers -- the act that sparked the war -- as an "uncalculated adventure."

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit said Hezbollah Secretary-General Hassan Nasrallah sought a war with Israel "to find a way out" from international pressure for Lebanon to disarm his group and replace its soldiers in southern Lebanon with the Lebanese army.

Jordan's King Abdullah cautioned against a "Shi'ite axis" stretching from Tehran to Beirut, arcing across Baghdad and Damascus.

With a cease-fire holding in Lebanon, the focus has shifted to Iraq, where Iran has established a strong network of allies through generous funding to mostly Shi'ite and Kurdish groups. Several Shi'ite political groups waited out Saddam's rule in Tehran and returned in 2003 during the U.S.-led invasion.

"The U.S. will not leave Iraq until its attrition increases and reaches Vietnam levels," Mr. Khorram said. "Otherwise, both Republicans and Democrats will continue the policy of remaining there. U.S. politicians don't listen to anyone except a very high casualty rate."

Israel Army To Resume Guerrilla Training (AP)

By Mark Lavie

AP, November 14, 2006

The Israeli military will restore its guerrilla warfare training center following its experience fighting Hezbollah militants in Lebanon, using a distinctly modern method — paintball.

During the 34-day war last summer, Hezbollah guerrillas exacted a heavy toll against the Israelis with ambushes, mortars and anti-tank missiles. While not admitting that lack of guerrilla training was a factor in its shortcomings, the Israeli military is planning to restart the program, according to the current issue of the soldiers' weekly, Bamahaneh.

The Israeli military closed down its guerrilla warfare training facility at the Elyakim base in Israel's north after Israeli forces pulled out of Lebanon in 2000, following an 18-year guerrilla war against Hezbollah.

The military has been harshly criticized for the way it handled the latest fighting in Lebanon, and many soldiers, especially reservists, complained their equipment and training were inadequate.

Soldiers will learn camouflage techniques, navigation by GPS satellite systems, construction of hidden outposts and other skills, Bamahaneh said, and they will test their newly won abilities in paintball maneuvers.

Lt. Col. Lior Lifshitz, commander of the Elyakim base, told the weekly that he hopes to set up a permanent paintball course at the base. In addition, the guerrilla training will be taken to all the bases in the northern command area, with courses for both soldiers and officers.

"Our goal is to establish a cycle, so that within two years officers would receive extensive training and soldiers some training," Lifshitz told the publication.

The new center, which is to be operational within a few months, will also supply guerrilla warfare equipment to the various army units, the weekly reported.

Bush Faces New Calls To Shift Policies On Mideast (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

President Bush came under new pressure yesterday at home and abroad to alter his policies in the Middle East. British Prime Minister Tony Blair pushed for a broader Arab-Israeli peace initiative to help stabilize Iraq, while the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee pledged to take a hard line on seeking early troop withdrawals.

Bush offered little indication that he is planning to adjust his approach, telling reporters gathered in the Oval Office that "the best military options depend upon the conditions on the ground" in Iraq. The president also met for more than an hour with former secretary of state James A. Baker III, former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) and other members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is looking to chart a new course in the war.

Asked about calls for dialogue with Iran and Syria to help curb violence in Iraq, Bush said there was no change in his position that Iran must first suspend uranium enrichment. "Our focus of this administration is to convince the Iranians to give up its nuclear weapons ambitions," Bush said after a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. "That focus is based upon our strong desire for there to be peace in the Middle East. And an Iran with a nuclear weapon would be a destabilizing influence."

Bush and Olmert told reporters that they spoke at length about the problems posed by Iran. "There is no question that the Iranian threat is not just a threat for Israel but for the whole world," Olmert said.

The day's events underscored the rapidly evolving political landscape for the White House, which finds itself trying to balance the desire for change voiced by the electorate last Tuesday with the president's frequently stated conviction that the United States must remain engaged militarily in Iraq until the government there can maintain its own security.

The White House will also have to deal with a Congress controlled by Democrats, a difference highlighted by Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) as he outlined the new agenda of the Armed Services Committee, which for the past four years has been largely deferential to Bush's conduct of the war. Levin said he plans to step up the committee's activities, reviewing the state of military readiness and conducting more oversight of such issues as the rendition of terrorism suspects to countries suspected of practicing torture.

Levin also served notice that he intends to take a strong line on withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq, telling reporters that he thinks a slim majority of the Senate may back his call for a "phased redeployment" of more than 140,000 U.S. troops.

"We had 40 senators who voted that way essentially six months ago, roughly, and there may be 50 or 51 senators that will vote that way now," Levin said at a news conference, referring to a bill that would call on the president to inform the Iraqi government that U.S. forces would begin leaving Iraq in four to six months.

In London, meanwhile, Blair suggested a desire for a more aggressive Western initiative to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as a key to tamping down violence in the region, a recommendation that is also reportedly under consideration by the Iraq Study Group. Blair said that resolving the Arab-Israeli dispute, stabilizing Lebanon and pressuring Iran to halt its support of militants are key to helping reduce bloodshed in Iraq.

"A major part of the answer to Iraq lies not in Iraq itself but outside it, in the whole of the region where the same forces are at work, where the roots of this global terrorism are to be found, where the extremism flourishes," said Blair, Bush's closest international ally on Iraq.

Blair is scheduled to amplify his views today in a private videoconference with members of the Baker-Hamilton group, which will soon begin deliberating specific recommendations after months of interviews with senior policymakers in America, Iraq and elsewhere.

The White House was extremely guarded yesterday about the round of meetings the study group held with Bush and other members of his administration, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and Vice President Cheney. Bush said he was not going to "prejudge" the group's report, which is expected in early December. He said that they had a "really good discussion" and that he was looking forward to "interesting ideas."

White House press secretary Tony Snow and other aides offered little elaboration, describing the session as a "general conversation about the situation there." Snow said it was not a time for "proposal shopping" by the study group.

Rice postponed a trip to Vietnam for an Asia-Pacific conference to instead hold informal talks about Iraq at the State Department and the White House, the State Department said. She spent about an hour with the Iraq Study Group and planned to leave today for Vietnam.

While the Baker-Hamilton group is looking at a range of issues, many lawmakers believe its significance may be more about politics than advancing new proposals. "By now the lack of a silver bullet is clear to everybody," said Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), the incoming chairman of the House International Relations Committee. "I think the value of the Baker-Hamilton commission is it is bipartisan, and hopefully it will receive serious bipartisan study."

Levin said he has "some optimism" that the study group will come up with some viable alternatives to the Bush administration's current policy. He also emphasized that it may not be necessary for the Senate to bend to reach agreement with the White House. In addition to "most Democrats," he said, "I believe there are some Republicans who are interested in changing the dynamic in Iraq."

Levin emphasized repeatedly that he does not believe that the current approach to Iraq is sustainable. "We're getting deeper and deeper into a hole that we should stop digging, and that we should look for alternatives in order to promote the chances of success in Iraq," he said.

Like many U.S. officials, Levin expressed some frustration with the lack of political progress in Iraq in recent months. "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves," he said. "They, and they alone, are going to decide whether they're going to have a nation or whether they're going to have an all-out civil war."

Bush Focuses On Mideast As Troubles Mount (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, November 14, 2006

President George W. Bush and his cabinet on Monday grappled with the full range of Middle East crises – from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to Iraq's spiraling violence and the nuclear stand-off with Iran – as the White House comes under increasing pressure to change strategy on all fronts and find solutions through re-engagement.

Promising a "fresh look" and an openness to any new ideas on Iraq after the Republicans' defeat in mid-term elections for Congress last week, Mr Bush and his aides met in the Oval Office with members of the independent Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton.

The two sides shared views on the situation in Iraq, said Tony Snow, White House spokesman. "This was not a deposition," he told reporters. The group, backed by Congress, is expected to release its recommendations on the way forward in Iraq early next year when the new Democratic- controlled Congress will start work.

Analysts say Mr Baker and Mr Hamilton are looking at an integrated response to the crisis in Iraq, which will include recommendations for a regional dialogue bringing in Iran and Syria, and possibly a renewed effort to engage in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Tony Blair, the UK prime minister, is the latest ally to add his voice to calls on the US to involve Iran and Syria in dialogue on Iraq rather than seek only to isolate them.

Former officials said Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister who also met Mr Bush in the White House on Monday, was alarmed at suggestions of linkage between the peace process and events in Iraq or Iran's nuclear programme. A senior state department official raised a storm in September when he suggested at a pro-Israel forum that the US needed to make progress towards a two-state solution to the Palestinian conflict in order to gain leverage among Arab allies in forming a strong coalition against Iran.

Mr Bush, speaking alongside Mr Olmert, responded to Mr Blair's proposals by reiterating the US would not negotiate directly with Iran until it suspended its nuclear fuel programme, as demanded by the UN Security Council.

Both leaders, who would both find a warmer welcome in each other's legislatures rather than at home, spoke of the threat presented by Iran's nuclear programme. Mr Bush said Iran should face "isolation" through sanctions, which the US is struggling to organize in the face of opposition from China and Russia at the UN.

Earlier, Mr Olmert said on Iran: "I am not looking for wars." In an interview with NBC, he said he would accept "every compromise that will stop Iran from acquiring nuclear capabilities which will be acceptable to President Bush".

Asked about the possibility of Israeli re-opening peace talks with Syria, Mr Olmert Israel " would love to be able to have negotiations with Syria" but that Syria's behaviour in Lebanon and Iraq ruled out talks.

Blair Calls For 'Whole Middle East' Strategy, Pressure On Iran (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 13 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair said Monday that any solution to the Iraq crisis must involve a "whole Middle East" strategy that starts with addressing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and includes pressuring Iran to stop backing radical extremists across the region.

"Just as the situation is evolving, so our strategy has to evolve to meet it," Blair said in a foreign policy speech a day before he was to share his views in a videoconference with the Iraq Study Group, which is reviewing U.S. policy in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0093981

Blair, who has been President Bush's chief foreign ally in the Iraq war, offered no dramatic new policy proposals on Iraq or the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which he called the region's "core" issue.

But he placed new emphasis on the importance of confronting outside elements -- he singled out at length the government in Iran -- that are "trying to create mayhem inside Iraq."

"A major part of the answer to Iraq lies not in Iraq itself but outside it," Blair said during the speech at London's ornate Guildhall. He said Iraq policy must address the broader issue of a global anti-Western campaign of "terrorism based on a thoroughly warped misinterpretation of Islam."

"In Iraq, the pressure from such terrorism has changed the nature of the battle. Its purpose is now plain: to provoke civil war," Blair said, adding that Iran, al-Qaeda and other outside extremists were joining forces with Iraqi radicals to "foment hatred" and choke off development of Iraq's democratically elected government.

Blair said Iran was backing Shiite militias in Iraq, Hezbollah in Lebanon and the most radical elements of Hamas in the Palestinian territories. He said Iran was "using the pressure points in the region to thwart us."

"What is happening in the Middle East is not complex," Blair said. "It is simple. Iran is being confronted over its nuclear weapons ambitions. Its stock market has lost a third of its value in the last year, and foreign credit is increasingly hard to come by. The statements of the president -- such as wiping Israel from the face of the earth -- are causing alarm, even in Iran."

He said Iran's strategy has been to "put obstacles in the path to peace and paint us -- as they did over the Israel-Lebanon conflict -- as the aggressors. They inflame the Arab street. They create political turmoil in our democratic politics."

Blair said "a new partnership is possible" with Iran if it supports the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians, stops supporting extremists and cooperates with U.N. demands to curb its nuclear ambitions.

"Alternatively, they face the consequences of not doing so -- isolation," Blair said.

Blair passionately defended his close alliance with Bush and the United States, which has severely damaged his popularity among the British public.

"We need America. That is a fact," he said, calling Britain's partnerships with the United States and the European Union crucial to the country's future strength.

"Take any problem Britain wants solving: global terrorism (assuming you don't believe that, but for George Bush, it wouldn't exist); climate change; Israel-Palestine; Iran and North Korea's nuclear program; world trade; or Africa right now, Sudan in particular; global poverty. We may agree or disagree with the United States' position on some or all of these issues. But none of these vital British concerns can be addressed, let alone solved, without America."

Blair also defended Bush, who is wildly unpopular in Britain. He said some in Britain profess that it is not America they dislike, but Bush personally.

"That's a comforting argument. It separates anti-America from anti-Bush," Blair said. "However, in my view it is also a cop-out."

He said the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks "would have changed any American president's foreign policy."

"Following 9/11, American policy was going to shift," he said. "It was going to get out after the terrorists with all America's might, and any president who didn't do it wasn't going to be president for long."

Blair Urges Strategy Change In Mideast, Spotlighting Iran (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 13 — Confronted by likely changes in American policy on the war in Iraq, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain said Monday that the “nature of the battle” had changed and that Western strategy in the Middle East must “evolve,” possibly to include a “new partnership” with Iran.

Iran has a choice, Mr. Blair said, of partnership or isolation. But he took pains, in his annual foreign policy speech, to avoid giving the impression that he was making major policy changes in response to uncertainties surrounding the Bush administration after the American elections last week. He also laced his speech with criticism of Iran, accusing it of “using pressure points in the region” to thwart Western diplomacy.

President Bush said Monday in Washington that Iran must first halt its enrichment of nuclear fuel if it wanted to enter into negotiations, calling the prospect of a nuclear Iran “incredibly destabilizing.”

Mr. Blair’s nuanced gestures on Iran, and also Syria, were made a day before he speaks by video link to a bipartisan panel in Washington, the Iraq Study Group, on some of the same themes. Mr. Bush spoke to the group on Monday. Mr. Blair’s address Monday night was his first major statement since last week’s triumph by the Democrats in the American elections.

He rebutted the notion that Iraq's turmoil could be attributed to the way Britain and the United States had conducted their occupation.

He said terrorism in Iraq had "changed the nature of the battle," and added: "Its purpose is now plain: to provoke civil war. The violence is not therefore an accident or the result of faulty planning. It is a deliberate strategy. It is the direct result of outside extremists teaming up with internal extremists."

But he acknowledged that the Western strategy should change. "Just as the situation is evolving, so our strategy should evolve to meet it," he said.

He urged a major political, economic and military strengthening of the Iraqi government but went on to say that a "whole Middle East strategy" was needed: "Just as it is, in significant part, forces outside Iraq that are trying to create mayhem inside Iraq, so we have to have a strategy that pins them back, not only in Iraq but outside it, too."

"There is a fundamental misunderstanding that this is about changing policy on Syria and Iran," he continued. "First, those two countries do not at all share identical interests. But in any event that is not where we start."

Mr. Blair called a settlement between Israel and the Palestinians "the core" of the broader effort for peace, followed by a renewed effort to resolve differences over Lebanon.

Criticizing Iran's leadership, he said, "They help the most extreme elements of Hamas in Palestine, Hezbollah in Lebanon, Shia militia in Iraq." He repeated a call he made in July for Western powers to "offer Iran a clear strategic choice" to help Middle East peace efforts, withdraw support for "terrorism in Lebanon or Iraq" and abide by international nuclear obligations.

In advance of his speech, British newspapers and official leaks of the address had suggested that Mr. Blair would seek a new compact with both Syria and Iran as potential interlocutors for Middle East peace. But a British official, who spoke on condition of anonymity under civil service rules, said Mr. Blair did not wish to give the impression "that there is some big strategic shift going on" because Britain had always "had a policy of engagement with" Syria and Iran.

Des Browne, defense secretary of Britain, told the BBC on Monday, "Change has been under way for some time now and it distorts the reality to suggest that that change is predicated upon a change in American politics."

Britain, with France and Germany, has played a central role spearheading European efforts, in tandem with the United States, to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions. Mr. Blair sent his chief foreign policy adviser, Sir Nigel Sheinwald, on an unannounced visit to Syria last month, apparently to sound out the leadership there on its readiness to promote settlement efforts.

Mr. Blair also dwelt on his close support for the United States in Iraq, an alliance that has cost him much of the popularity he had when he took power in 1997. "We need America; that is a fact," he said.

But he balanced his remarks with overtures toward the European Union, some of whose leaders have questioned Mr. Blair's close ties to Mr. Bush.

"Our partnership with America and our membership of the European Union are precisely suited to Britain," he said. "For that reason, it would be insane for us to give up either relationship."

Mr. Blair is already under pressure from his own military to withdraw from Iraq. But calls by Democrats in the United States for new thinking on Iraq have unnerved some British politicians, who fear that a speedy American withdrawal would jeopardize British troops.

William Hague, the opposition Conservative Party spokesman on foreign affairs, said Monday, "It is very important that there is heavy British involvement in that reassessment, that it is not just an American process."

Blair Wants Iran To Aid Mideast Peace (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, November 14, 2006

The West should press Iran to help stem bloodshed in neighboring Iraq and build stability across the Middle East, British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Monday, outlining his hopes for a future peace process in the region.

Blair also rebuked critics who argue Britain's close relationship with the United States has been damaging and defended close involvement with the European Union, according to a text of his speech prepared for delivery.

"It would be insane — yes, I would put it as strongly as that — for us to give up either relationship," according to his speech. "Anti-Americanism or Euro-skepticism are not merely foolish, they are the surest route to the destruction of our true national interest."

Britain has sent more troops to Iraq than any nation besides the United States, and rising violence there — and a British death toll that reached 125 on Sunday — have heightened calls for a course change.

Because much of the militancy in Iraq comes from outside its borders, Blair said a "whole Middle East strategy" was needed to counter it.

DOJ_NMG_0093983

Resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict must be the core of such an approach, he argued, followed by efforts to stabilize Lebanon and unite moderate Arabs and Muslims behind a push for peace in those countries and in Iraq, Blair's speech said.

"A major part of the answer to Iraq lies not in Iraq itself but outside it, in the whole of the region where the same forces are at work, where the roots of this global terrorism are to be found, where the extremism flourishes," he said.

Blair accused Tehran of aiding Shiite militias in Iraq, Hezbollah in Lebanon and the most extreme elements of Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

"They put obstacles in the path to peace, paint us ... as the aggressors, inflame the Arab street and create political turmoil in our democratic politics," his text said.

The West must reiterate demands that Iran cease its support for extremists and suspend its uranium enrichment program. "Or alternatively they face the consequences of not doing so — isolation," he said.

Blair's address, to be delivered a day before he speaks by video-link to America's Iraq Study Group — a bipartisan Washington commission attempting to set a new course for the Iraq war_ is aimed at promoting dialogue with both Iran and Syria, his office said.

The prime minister's spokesman rejected the possibility that either country could be rewarded for cooperation in the Middle East peace process, ruling out any negotiations with Iran over its contentious nuclear program in return for support over Iraq.

President Bush's chief of staff, Josh Bolten, said Sunday the White House would consider opening talks with Syria and Iran if the study group headed by former Secretary of State James A Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton recommended it.

Blair said international forces must "plug any gaps" in training, equipment and command and control in the Iraqi army, as well as helping Baghdad's interior minister root out sectarianism in the police force. The prime minister has repeatedly said that British troops will remain in Iraq until Iraqi forces can take responsibility for security.

Blair Presses For Rethink In Iraq, Warns Iran (AFP)

By Prashant Rao

AFP, November 14, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair called for a change in strategy in violence-torn Iraq, in particular warning Iran to stop aiding insurgents there and elsewhere.

In a keynote speech in London, he said the three-year-old conflict -- in which US and British troops appear increasingly mired -- needs to be seen as part of a "whole Middle East" strategy.

"Just as the situation is evolving, so our strategy has to evolve to meet it," he said.

In advance of the speech, Blair's office had suggested he would focus his message on efforts to persuade Syria and Iran to help defuse the violence in Iraq, as well as elsewhere.

But the final version of the speech omitted almost all reference to Syria, while offering Iran a "strategic choice": essentially, help the West or face increasing isolation.

"There is a fundamental misunderstanding that this (strategy in the Middle East) is about changing policy on Syria and Iran ... in any event that is not where we start."

"On the contrary, a whole-region policy should start with Israel/Palestine. That is the core. We should then make progress on Lebanon. We should unite all moderate Arab and Muslim voices behind a push for peace in those countries but also in Iraq," he said.

In the wide-ranging address, he said a major part of the answer to the Iraq problem "lies not in Iraq itself but outside it, in the whole of the region where the same forces are at work."

"Just as it is, in significant part, forces outside Iraq that are trying to create mayhem inside Iraq, so we have to have a strategy that pins them back, not only in Iraq but outside of it too ...

"This is what I call a 'whole Middle East' strategy," he said.

Pressure for a change of direction in Iraq has been fueled by defeat for the Republican Party in last week's American mid-term elections, which led to the departure of Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and leaves Bush more vulnerable in Congress.

Speaking on Iran, Blair said Tehran's strategy was simple: to deflect pressure from the West over its nuclear plans -- which Washington suspects are a cover for developing atomic weapons -- it was helping extremists in Lebanon, Iraq, and in the Palestinian territories.

"It is a perfectly straightforward and clear strategy. It will only be defeated by an equally clear one," he said.

Under this, the West should "offer Iran a clear strategic choice: they help the Middle East peace process not hinder it; they stop supporting terrorism in Lebanon or Iraq; they abide by, not flout, their international obligations.

DOJ_NMG_0093984

"In that case, a new partnership is possible. Or alternatively they face the consequences of not doing so: isolation," he said.

Blair's speech came a day before he is due to give video-link evidence to the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel led by former US secretary of state James Baker, which is looking at current coalition policy in Iraq.

The British leader's testimony to the panel will come a day after the appearance of US President George W. Bush before the experts on Monday.

Speaking ahead of his testimony, Bush also warned the Iranians.

"It's very important for the world to unite with one common voice to say to the Iranians that, if you choose to continue forward, you'll be isolated," he said. "There has to be a consequence for their intransigence."

Candidate For Palestinian Premier Emerges (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 13 -- A former university president in the Gaza Strip emerged Monday as the top candidate to head a Palestinian national unity government now being assembled in a bid to end the economic sanctions that have crippled the Hamas-led administration.

Officials from the rival Hamas and Fatah movements said Mohammed Shubeir, 60, is the consensus choice to serve as prime minister in a future power-sharing government whose creation has proved elusive for months.

Shubeir is not a member of Hamas, the radical Islamic movement that has run the Palestinian Authority since soon after it won January parliamentary elections. But he is closely identified with Hamas in Gaza City, where he served as president of the Islamic University of Gaza -- a key training ground for the movement's leadership -- for 12 years before stepping down in 2005.

Shubeir's selection would mark a significant step toward resolving the months-long political crisis that has battered the Palestinian economy and set off a surge of partisan fighting in the territories, especially in Gaza. As prime minister, he would be part of a new cabinet that, in addition to ministers from Hamas and Fatah, would include technocrats from outside the two main parties, including some who have worked closely with the United States.

But officials from both parties warned that work remained to be done on the future government's political program, which international donors say must recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce violence and honor previous agreements with the Jewish state in return for a resumption of aid.

"It's not a done deal yet," said Saeb Erekat, a Fatah lawmaker and the Palestinians' chief negotiator with Israel, who called Shubeir "a very strong candidate" who would be nominated only if a deal is reached on a governing platform. "For the Quartet, it's the program. That's what will matter most."

After Hamas's electoral victory, the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union, known collectively as the Quartet, cut off aid that accounted for nearly half of the Palestinian Authority's operating budget. Israel also froze the roughly $55 million in monthly tax revenue it collects on the Palestinians' behalf. Israel, the United States and the European Union classify Hamas, whose founding charter calls for Israel's destruction, as a terrorist organization.

Hamas leaders refused to meet the Quartet's conditions. Their popularity in the territories slipped amid deepening economic hardship. The authority's 165,000 civil servants, more than half of them in the security forces, have received only a small fraction of their salaries in the past nine months.

Until now, Hamas officials in Gaza and the West Bank have shown more willingness to compromise than the group's hard-line political leadership in exile, led by Khaled Mashal in the Syrian capital of Damascus. Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, an Islamic University graduate, has already agreed to step aside so an independent official can lead the next government.

Hamas and Fatah officials said Mashal has endorsed Shubeir, who has a doctorate in microbiology from West Virginia University. Shubeir's father was a leader of the Muslim Brotherhood, the Islamic movement from which Hamas emerged. His candidacy also fulfills a demand by Hamas that the next prime minister come from Gaza.

But Hamas officials are still seeking assurances from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a member of Fatah, that international donors will restore aid if they dissolve the government. Those guarantees have not been given, although U.S. officials have been consulting closely with Abbas during the process.

Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem, said that regardless of who is in the next cabinet, it must meet the Quartet's criteria to receive aid.

"It is not the United States' role to decide who is and who is not in the Palestinian government," she said. "That is for them to decide."

Hamas, Fatah Agree On Leader (WT/AP)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- The rival Fatah and Hamas movements yesterday agreed on a candidate for prime minister of their emerging coalition government, turning to a U.S.-educated professor to end months of infighting and help lift a painful international aid boycott.

The agreement was the strongest sign of progress in the negotiations, which have dragged on for months, but the government's acceptance by the United States and European Union -- both key aid donors -- could hinge on whether it will recognize Israel and renounce violence.

The compromise to make Mohammed Shabir prime minister was announced in Syria by Moussa Abu Marzouk, a top official in Hamas' exiled leadership. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah also supports the nomination, aides said.

Hamas and Fatah are hopeful that the 60-year-old Mr. Shabir, a soft-spoken intellectual with a doctorate in microbiology from West Virginia University, will help persuade Israel and the West to lift economic sanctions imposed after the Hamas-led government took office in March.

The international community says the Palestinian government must renounce violence, accept previous peace deals and recognize Israel's right to exist. Hamas has rejected these conditions repeatedly.

Mr. Shabir has never voiced his positions on Israel publicly, but colleagues describe him as pragmatic. Speaking to Israel's Ha'aretz daily, he said he would act "realistically" if he is formally nominated.

Mr. Shabir is well-known in the Gaza Strip and has the stature to bridge the differences between Hamas and Mr. Abbas' more moderate Fatah. The power struggle between the sides has erupted into violence periodically.

Mr. Shabir was president of Gaza's Islamic University, a Hamas stronghold, for 15 years before retiring last year. In the high-profile position, he maintained good relations with Hamas.

Many senior Hamas officials worked or taught at the university. They include the current prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, who was Mr. Shabir's chief of staff. While thought to be sympathetic to Hamas, Mr. Shabir is not known to be a member.

Mr. Shabir also enjoys a good relationship with Fatah. When longtime Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was alive, Mr. Shabir was a frequent visitor.

If formally nominated, Mr. Shabir would lead an emerging government of professionals -- acceptable to the major political parties but independent of them -- that Mr. Abbas hopes will satisfy the international demands.

Officials say the so-called technocrat government would take a vague position toward Israel and focus on internal Palestinian affairs, while allowing Mr. Abbas to pursue peace talks with Israel. Mr. Abbas was elected in a separate presidential vote last year.

Respected economist Salam Fayyad is being considered for the post of finance minister, a job he held until the Hamas-led government took office. Mr. Fayyad, a former International Monetary Fund official, was credited with fighting mismanagement and cronyism.

Hamas Preparing To Relinquish Control (MCT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy, November 14, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank - Ten months after seizing power in a historic election, the hard-line Hamas movement is preparing to relinquish control of the Palestinian Authority in hopes of ending the international economic blockade that has prevented Hamas from effectively running the government.

In a significant concession, the Islamist militant group agreed Monday to accept a United States-educated microbiology professor to replace Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh as prime minister. As the new prime minister, Mohammed Shabir would head a coalition of largely apolitical intellectuals designed to end the Palestinian government's global isolation.

Although a new unity government could end Hamas' short-lived reign as the ruling Palestinian party in the Cabinet, it remains far from certain that it will succeed in persuading critical foreign donors to restore millions in funding.

As soon as Hamas formed the government in March, Israel and the international community cut off virtually all outside funding to the Palestinians. Since then, the Palestinian government has ground to a halt. Hospitals are barely running. Schools have been closed for weeks. Government workers haven't been paid regular salaries in months.

Hamas is still refusing to meet one of the core international demands, though: explicit recognition of Israel.

"It is impossible for us to come out and say we recognize Israel," said Hamas negotiator Eesa Nashar.

DOJ_NMG_0093986

If the new unity government fails to take that step, it seems unlikely that Israel, the European Union and the United States will agree to resume help for the Palestinian Authority.

Palestinian leaders have been mired in negotiations over the unity government for months. Negotiators have announced breakthroughs at various points, only to have each deal break down.

One sticking point until now has been Hamas' demand that it retain the post of prime minister. But Haniyeh and his political party now have agreed to cede control to a government led by largely apolitical specialists.

On Monday, the parties settled on Shabir, the longtime head of Islamic University in Gaza City, as the new prime minister.

Shabir, 60, served as president of the Hamas-allied university for 15 years.

Although the campus has produced and hired many top Hamas leaders, Shabir hasn't been a prominent political figure. Shabir, who received a doctorate in microbiology from West Virginia University, has maintained good relations with leaders from Hamas and its more moderate rivals in the Fatah party.

If the deal falls into place, Haniyeh would resign as prime minister, clearing the way for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to name Shabir as his replacement. Hamas and Abbas' Fatah party still have to agree on who will fill the other Cabinet posts, including that of foreign minister.

Hamas' decision is a significant concession. It long had argued that the international community should support its government because it fairly won the Palestinian elections in January.

Israeli leaders suggested that the political change was a clear sign that the international isolation had been a success.

"This policy is apparently working, and the proof of this is that Hamas members understand they cannot continue with their ideology and remain in power and receive money or legitimization from the international community," Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said in a weekend interview on Israel Radio.

Hamas leaders rejected that contention and noted that they'd sought to form a unity government from the start. Fatah refused to join the government until Hamas agreed to moderate its hard-line position on Israel.

Before restoring funding to the Palestinians, Israel and its global allies, known as the Quartet (Russia, the United States, the United Nations and the European Union), have demanded that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, accept past agreements and renounce violence.

If the new government takes those steps, Israeli and American officials said Monday that they would agree to work with the Palestinian coalition - even if it includes members of Hamas.

"If the government guidelines recognize the three conditions of the Quartet, then we would deal with that government," said Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

But Hamas is still refusing to explicitly accept Israel as a neighbor. Instead, it's agreeing to accept a platform that implicitly recognizes Israel.

Still, leaders with Hamas and Fatah voiced optimism Monday that the final critical details could be worked out and that the unity government could be installed by early December.

"We have arrived at the point of no return with regard to the formation of a national government," said Fatah spokesman Walid Awad. "We think there will be a positive outcome."

World Leaders Release Plan For Resolving East-West Rift (NYT)

By Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

ISTANBUL, Nov. 13 — Leaders from a variety of cultural and religious backgrounds on Monday announced a United Nations initiative to resolve the conflict between the West and the Muslim world.

They issued a framework for their effort, prepared over the past year, that singled out the Palestinian-Israeli conflict as a primary source of the deepening split.

“No other conflict carries such a powerful symbolic and emotional charge among people far removed from the battlefield,” Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, said at a news conference. “As long as the Palestinians live under occupation, exposed to daily frustration and humiliation, and as long as Israelis are blown up in buses and in dance halls, so long will passions everywhere be inflamed.”

The report was drafted by 20 scholars and other leaders, including Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa, Mohammad Khatami, the former Iranian president, and others from many nations. It calls for collective action on issues of education, youth and immigration.

Members of the panel and Mr. Annan emphasized their view that the causes of tensions are primarily political, not religious.

DOJ_NMG_0093987

The secretary general will appoint a representative to oversee the follow-up of the recommendations, which, Mr. Annan warned, will have little impact if Muslims in violent places — whether Iraqis, Afghans, Chechens or Palestinians — continue to perceive their situation merely as a case of being made victims by non-Muslims.

"If these conflicts or difficult situations can be resolved, it will have a positive impact on the work we are doing here," Mr. Annan said.

The host of the event, Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, emphasized the symbolic importance of holding it in Istanbul, which bridges East and West and is the leading city in a predominantly Muslim country taking steps to join the European Union.

Joining the European Union, he said, would "prove that the polarization between cultures is actually artificial and contrived."

The Alliance of Civilizations Initiative was the idea of Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero of Spain, who suggested it six months after terrorist bombings in Madrid killed 191 people in 2004.

"We're going to immobilize extremists, prevent their actions," Mr. Zapatero said here. "Nobody should doubt our victory."

Mr. Annan said in a written statement: "The problem is not the Koran or the Torah or the Bible. Indeed, I have often said that the problem is never the faith, it is the faithful and how they behave toward each other."

No Clash Of Civilizations, Says UN Report (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 14, 2006

CAIRO

A UN-sponsored group called the Alliance of Civilizations, created last year to find ways to bridge the growing divide between Muslim and Western societies, released a first report Monday that says the conflict over Israel and the Palestinian territories is the central driver in global tensions.

"Our emphasis on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is not meant to imply that it is the overt cause of all tensions between Muslim and Western societies," write the report's authors, a group of academics and present and former government officials from 19 different countries. "Nevertheless, it is our view that the Israeli-Palestinian issue has taken on a symbolic value that colors cross cultural and political relations ... well beyond its limited geographic scope."

But while the authors hope their report will invigorate and create cross-cultural dialogue, its tone implies that it is unlikely to be well received by the United States and Israel, focusing as it does on allegations of double standards by those two nations while giving less time to the faults of the Palestinians or specific Muslim governments.

Criticism of US policies, though at times oblique, is a major feature of the document and hits on themes that have angered representatives of the Bush administration in the past. For instance, in a discussion of Al Qaeda's attack on the US on Sept. 11, the report states: "Later, these attacks were presented as one of the justifications for the invasion of Iraq, whose link with them has never been demonstrated, feeding a perception among Muslim societies of unjust aggression stemming from the West."

While that is indeed a common view in Muslim countries, it is unlikely to gain the favor of the current US administration, whose representative to the United Nations, John Bolton, is an ardent supporter of the invasion of Iraq and a frequent critic of the world body. Earlier this year, Mr. Bolton characterized the UN Human Rights Commission as packed with officials from "some of the world's most notorious human rights abusers."

The report is the result of a UN-sanctioned "High Level Group" meeting of some twenty "eminent personalities" that UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan appointed last year. The group, which was cosponsored by the Prime Ministers of Turkey and Spain and included among its authors Nobel Peace Prize-winner Archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Iranian president Mohammed Khatami, issued the final report on Nov. 13 at its final meeting in Istanbul.

To be sure, the report is also framed as a direct challenge to the notion that a "Clash of Civilizations" is imminent - a concept first popularized by Samuel Huntington's 1996 book of the same name.

In a statement, Mr. Kofi Annan said it was clear that religion is not at the root of current tensions.

"The problem is not the Koran or the Torah or the Bible," Mr. Annan said. "The problem is never the faith, it is the faithful and how they behave towards each other."

That sentiment was echoed in an editorial published in the Houston Chronicle on Sunday by three of the report's authors, who also said that political repression in the Muslim world contributes to extremism.

"Denying peaceful opposition movements the freedom to express their views and jailing their supporters generate anger and resentment, encouraging some to join violent groups," wrote Mr. Tutu, former Indonesian foreign minister Ali Alatas, and Andri Azoulay, an advisor to Morocco's King Muhammed VI.

DOJ_NMG_0093988

"When Western governments lend their support - tacitly or overtly - to authoritarian regimes, they become part of the problem," the authors wrote.

The overall objective of the paper is to set out problems between the Muslim and the West as a matter of politics, and not of culture, and tends to see anger and misunderstanding as largely a problem of inadequate education.

For instance, the authors point to a recent Gallup poll that found 57 percent of Americans either responded "nothing" or "I don't know" when asked what they most admired about Muslim societies, as evidence for a need for education systems in both the West and Muslim countries to provide a "basic understanding of religious traditions other than their own."

The authors also point to another recent survey that found 30 percent of US government money for cultural exchanges go to programs with Europe - the societies with which the US has the most in common - while just 6 percent go to programs with the Middle East, arguably the place where such efforts could do the most good. How to build an alliance of civilizations

The UN's High Level Group report includes a set of concrete recommendations for the international community. Among the recommendations:

• The international community should draft a white paper to analyze the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.
• An international conference should be convened to reinvigorate the Middle East peace process.
• Ruling parties in the Muslim world should provide space for the participation of peaceful political groups.
• Leaders and shapers of public opinion should behave responsibly and work to promote understanding among cultures.
• The UN should appoint a high representative to assist in defusing cross-cultural tensions.
• The UN should establish a forum for the alliance of civilizations under its auspices.
• Journalists should receive improved training in intercultural understanding.
• Media content should aim to promote intercultural dialogue.
• Educational materials and media literacy programs in schools should face a critical review.
• Governments should increase the number of international youth exchanges and youth-oriented websites.
• The international community should create media campaigns to combat discrimination.

S. Korea: Nuke Talks May Begin In Dec. (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang

AP, November 14, 2006

South Korea's nuclear envoy said Tuesday that long-stalled six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear program could resume by mid-December.

On Monday, South Korea balked at Washington's demand that it fully join a U.S.-led effort to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the North's nuclear and missile weapons programs.

The South insisted that it was already doing enough to stem possible weapons proliferation from North Korea and announced no new measures to sanction the North under a U.N. Security Council resolution condemning Pyongyang's first test of a nuclear device on Oct. 9.

North Korea agreed earlier this month to return to the negotiations with China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and the United States after staying away from the talks for a year. A specific date for resuming the talks has not been set.

"I think it's possible to resume (the talks) by mid-December," Chun Yung-woo, Seoul's chief negotiator to the talks, said on South Korean radio channel PBC.

"We are making preparations with the thinking that it's more important to achieve substantial progress when the six-party talks resume than how quickly we would resume the talks," he said.

Chun could not immediately be reached for comment.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack also said no date has been set for resuming the talks and he ruled out November but said there is still hope for a meeting in December.

Once the talks resume, the top priority will be on determining whether North Korea is willing to give up its nuclear program, Chun said. He also said the North should not expect rewards just for returning to the negotiating table.

Chun was expected to discuss strategy for the nuclear talks with his U.S. and Japanese counterparts Wednesday in Hanoi on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

Meanwhile, Japan adopted a list of embargoed luxury items as part of its sanctions imposed on Pyongyang. Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said the list comprised 24 luxury goods believed to be used by senior North Korean officials such as cigarettes, liquor, perfume and motorcycles.

DOJ_NMG_0093989

"We hope that North Korea will accept these measures taken by Japan as the message of the international community's strong concern and condemnation" of its nuclear program, Shiozaki said.

The ban on luxury items is in line with U.N. sanctions that ban the sale of major arms to North Korea and call for the inspection of cargo entering and leaving the country. The U.N. resolution also calls for the freezing of assets of businesses supplying the North's nuclear and ballistic weapons programs, as well as restrictions on sales of luxury goods and travel bans on Pyongyang officials.

South Korea's hesitation to join the ship interception regime underscored Seoul's reluctance to anger Pyongyang and complicated efforts to resolve the standoff over the North's nuclear program now that the communist regime has agreed to return to nuclear disarmament talks.

Seoul has joined the U.S.-led initiative, aimed largely at stopping North Korean weapons traffic at sea, only as an observer out of concern that its stopping and searching North Korean ships could lead to armed clashes.

Monitoring North Korean shipping would be much more difficult without South Korea, because countries in the initiative can only conduct searches within the territorial waters of participating countries. Ships on the high seas have right of free passage under international law.

The South insists it could inspect North Korean ships under an inter-Korean agreement but it has never done so despite allowing dozens of the communist country's vessels to transit its waters.

The United States played down South Korea's rejection of the attempts to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying nuclear supplies, saying Monday the decision would not harm international efforts to confront the North's nuclear weapons program.

"I'm not going to sit here and second-guess the South Koreans. They're valued allies," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "They have taken some steps that they'd never taken before with regard to North Korea. And obviously they're serious partners in the six-party talks."

The two Koreas are still technically at war as the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a truce, not a peace treaty. But their relations have warmed since the first, and only, summit of their leaders in 2000.

Bush Hopes To Reassert U.S. Leadership During Asia Trip (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - A politically wounded President Bush heads to Asia on Tuesday to reassert American leadership in a region grappling with the rise of China and the threat of a nuclear-armed North Korea.

Foreign policy issues will top the agenda during Bush's swing through Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia, but domestic politics have added a new dimension to the trip. His return to the world stage comes a week after voters handed control of Congress to Democrats in an election that was widely viewed as a rebuke to Bush.

Former White House adviser Mike Green said Asian leaders will be looking for signs of weakness in the American president.

"The Asian leaders will be looking at President Bush's body language," said Green, now an Asia specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "They know he has two years left, but they're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback."

Perceptions about Bush's clout could come into play as he tries to bolster a somewhat shaky international coalition that's working to stifle North Korea's nuclear ambitions. Russia, China, South Korea and Japan share Bush's desire to keep nuclear weapons out of the Korean peninsula, but they don't always agree with his tactics.

Bush will get a chance to shore up support for his approach during a 21-nation summit in Vietnam this weekend.

A show of solidarity against North Korea at the annual Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, commonly known as APEC, could help persuade the reclusive regime in Pyongyang to give up its nuclear ambitions in exchange for economic benefits.

North Korea has agreed to resume six-way talks over its nuclear program with its Asian neighbors and the United States, but no date has been set. North Korea's Oct. 9 test of a nuclear device underscored the futility of previous negotiations.

Bush will meet briefly with Russian President Vladimir Putin, a key player in the standoff with North Korea, on his way to Asia. Bush and his wife, Laura, will spend about 45 minutes with Putin and his wife, Ludmila, during a refueling stop in Moscow.

The president's first Asia stop is Singapore, an international trading center with strong ties to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0093990

He'll arrive in Vietnam on Friday facing a schedule packed with meetings and social events. In addition to attending APEC forums and dinners, Bush will hold a series of one-on-one meetings in Hanoi with leaders from Australia, Vietnam, South Korea, China and Japan. He'll also get together again with Putin.

China's fast economic growth and its place as the world's fourth-largest economy give it increasing importance in the Asia-Pacific region.

"In many respects, the larger story line that's playing out at APEC is China's rise," said Kurt Campbell, the director of international studies at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "What China has accomplished over a shorter period of time is much more dramatic than even America's entry into global politics."

Bush will stop in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, on his return trip to Washington, via Hawaii, next week.

Bush's visit to Vietnam, the centerpiece of his Asian tour, is rife with symbolism and historical baggage.

The APEC meeting is a coming-out party for a communist nation that's reaping the fruits of capitalism after a devastating war with the United States.

Like China, Vietnam has embraced free-market principles while clinging to authoritarian one-party rule. Vietnam's economy grew by 8.4 percent last year, a rate exceeded only by China.

"A lot has changed. They've joined the world," said Frederick Brown, a former diplomat and an Asia expert at the Nitze School of Advanced International Studies at the Johns Hopkins University.

As a measure of how much things have changed, Bush's trip will include a stop at Vietnam's stock market in Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon. At times it's hard to remember that North Vietnam won a conflict that was billed at the time as a key battle in the global struggle between communism and capitalism.

"We'll accomplish more with books and ideas than we ever could with bombs," said Clifford Schultz, a business professor at Arizona State University who also teaches marketing classes in Ho Chi Minh City. "Well over half the population is under 25. They want their blue jeans. They want their iPods. They want their Internet cafes."

But the war that claimed more than 58,000 American lives and about 2 million Vietnamese casualties cannot be forgotten.

Bush will get a briefing Saturday on efforts to find the remains of American military personnel. The remains of more than 800 American war dead have been returned in recent years, but about 1,800 remain unaccounted for.

Southeast Asia Trip To Test Bush's Stature (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

President Bush leaves tonight for a week-long visit to Southeast Asia that may offer an early indication of how the political "thumping" he took a week ago will affect his standing on the world stage.

Bush leaves Washington for a series of summits and an economic conference in Vietnam one week after elections in which Democrats won control of both houses of Congress, in what was widely interpreted as an expression of voter unhappiness over the Iraq war.

But just as Iraq poses a long-term challenge for the U.S. policymakers, so, too, do the forces shaping Southeast Asia, a region of booming economies that has its own festering pockets of terrorism. The area also is important to solving another major item on the U.S. foreign policy agenda: the long-standing problem of North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Bush's visit to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia is intended to focus heavily on trade issues, global health concerns such as AIDS and avian flu, as well as the North Korea question. But just as important may be how Bush is perceived by the other leaders at the meeting in the aftermath of his recent political setback.

Our "Asian friends will be watching initially President Bush and his team in terms of his body language, his statements to see whether he will be weakened or committed to going forward with a broad and purposeful agenda in Asia as a whole," said Kurt Campbell, a senior vice president at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

One thing Asian leaders will be watching for is whether Bush can still deliver on trade-liberalization legislation, given his weakened political state and the populist opposition to many free-trade agreements, according to some analysts.

The Bush administration is pressing Congress to pass a bill granting Vietnam permanent normal trade relations before the president arrives in Hanoi on Friday, a step that is needed for U.S. firms to take advantage of the low tariffs that nation will enact as a newly minted member of the World Trade Organization.

Vietnam, which boasts the fastest-growing economy in Asia, is also one of the world's fastest-growing markets for U.S. goods.

DOJ_NMG_0093991

But the House failed to pass the legislation last night. The vote of 228 to 161 in favor of the bill fell short of the two-thirds majority required by a procedure that limited debate.

Republicans planned to bring up the measure again tomorrow under normal procedures, requiring only a majority for passage, House aides said. The Senate is expected to take up the issue later in the week.

Passing the legislation ahead of the meeting "would be useful for President Bush," said Grant Aldonas, a former undersecretary of commerce for international trade in the Bush administration. "It would be useful, certainly, for the United States to ensure that our trading partners in Asia know that we're prepared to be at the table -- both Congress and the president -- and contributing to an aggressive trade policy."

Yesterday, the United States removed Vietnam from its list of nations that do not allow religious freedom, citing what it called Vietnam's greater tolerance for religious expression.

While trade will take center stage during his trip, Bush also is expected to use the opportunity to meet with partners in an effort to continue pressing North Korea to give up -- or at least limit -- its nuclear weapons program. North Korea agreed to return to six-party nuclear-disarmament talks late last month, just weeks after it conducted its first test of a nuclear device. As a result of that test, the United Nations swiftly imposed sanctions on goods flowing in and out of North Korea.

"It's . . . not always helpful, to answer the question, you know, can we live with or not live with a nuclear North Korea?" said Michael Green, former senior director for Asia at the National Security Council under Bush. "What does that mean? Does it mean we're going to attack North Korea because of the nuclear weapons program? I think the answer is no. Does it mean we go on with business as usual? Of course not."

While the U.N. sanctions have clearly exacted a toll on North Korea, Bush is expected to use the visit and a meeting with South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun to pressure him to do more to enforce the U.N. sanctions. Yesterday, South Korea said it will not take part in a U.S.-led plan to intercept shipments of weapons of mass destruction that may have involved the South Korean military stopping North Korean ships.

"The Republic of Korea is doing virtually nothing to impose a cost on the north," Green said. "That will be a difficult discussion."

The first stop on the president's trip will be Singapore, the booming city-state where on Thursday he is scheduled to give the major speech of his trip on the cooperation between the United States and Asia to combat poverty, disease and terrorism. On Friday, he will become the second U.S. president to visit Vietnam since the fall of Saigon when he travels to Hanoi.

In Vietnam, Bush will take part in a series of meetings with other world leaders and visit a program working to learn the fate of soldiers still missing in action from the Vietnam War. He also will take part in meetings of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, an organization that includes 21 nations that together account for half the world's trade and 57 percent of the global economic output.

Later, the president will travel to Ho Chi Minh City. There the president will tour a medical institute that focuses on AIDS and avian flu research, before taking part in events showcasing Vietnam's fast-growing economy.

On Monday, he will travel to Indonesia, the world's largest majority-Muslim nation, where he is scheduled to visit an educational program and hold a news conference with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, before going to Hawaii. Next Tuesday, he will have breakfast with U.S. troops in Honolulu before returning to Washington.

US Congress Rejects Vietnam Trade Deal (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, November 14, 2006

The US Congress rejected a deal to normalise trade relations with Vietnam in a setback for President George W. Bush ahead of a visit to Hanoi to discuss economic issues at the annual summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

The trade pact was defeated when it lost the support of dozens of Republicans and Democrats after being rushed through a special “lame-duck” session of the House of Representatives before the transfer of power to the incoming majority following last week’s mid-term elections.

The defeat underlines the difficulties facing the Bush administration and congressional leaders in forging a working cross-party majority on trade bills in the wake of election victories last week for economic populists with a deep suspicion of free trade, in a Democratic sweep of congress.

The pact was the final step in normalising relations between the former adversaries and was to clear the way for Vietnam to become the 150th member of the World Trade Organisation with US support after more than 10 years of negotiations.

Supporters of the pact on Monday night said they expected the bill to be revived and passed by a simple majority vote as early as Wednesday after failing to secure the two-thirds needed to pass the bill without a debate.

DOJ_NMG_0093992

The defeat of the first major piece of legislation brought forward since the election by the Bush administration was seen as a setback for the White House, which made clear the president's desire to arrive at the summit with the deal in hand.

Virginia Foote, of the US Vietnam Trade Council, said: "I think this is an embarrassment on the eve of Bush's trip to Vietnam. This legislation was mishandled, but we expect the bill to move again and pass in a couple of days as it has strong bipartisan support."

Ms Foote cited the opposition of Republicans as the decisive factor in bringing down the bill in a 228-161 vote in favour, noting that the support from Democrats represented a high-watermark compared to recent trade legislation.

A spokesperson for the US Chamber of Commerce said: "We're shocked and dumbfounded. This sends the wrong signal about the future of the US trade agenda."

The chamber blamed the influence of unions, which are seeking tougher labour standards in trade deals and helped Democrats get elected in key battleground states on protectionist platforms.

A lobbyist for the chamber said a last-minute letter on Monday from the AFL-CIO had swung opposition to the deal.

Thea Lee, policy director of the AFL-CIO, played down the impact of the letter, but said: "People are sensing there is an uneasiness about the current trade policy. As of a few days ago there is a new balance of power in Washington, and people are still trying to work out where it lies."

A Setback For Vietnam Trade Bill (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — In an embarrassing legislative setback for the administration, the House of Representatives defeated a measure late Monday that the president had sought to normalize trade relations with Vietnam, four days before Mr. Bush was scheduled to leave for his first visit to that country.

The setback may be only temporary, however.

The legislation embodies approval by Congress of what is known as "permanent normal trade relations" with Vietnam, which would make it easier for that country to join the World Trade Organization and would allow American companies to share in the benefits of the open market.

The legislation received a majority vote but fell short of the two-thirds needed for passage under special rules that speeded its consideration in the House. The vote came on the first day of the lame-duck session in which the outgoing House, still controlled by a Republican majority, met to pass crucial bills by the end of this year.

The legislation received 228 votes in favor and 161 against, but it needed 32 more votes to pass on Monday. House Republican leaders said they would bring the legislation back in the next couple of days under normal procedures, which require only a majority, or 218 votes, for passage.

Though perhaps symbolic, the defeat in the House was an embarrassment not only for Mr. Bush but also for the departing Republican leaders, who had earlier in the day expressed confidence that they had the two-thirds needed for the bill to pass in the House.

Republican leaders expect the bill to pass the Senate later this week, despite the misgivings from some lawmakers.

The White House still hopes for the bill's approval in the next couple of days so that President Bush can cite its passage as a milestone in relations with Vietnam while attending the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation summit meeting in Hanoi.

The loss, however temporary, was also a portent that trade bills could face tougher odds in the lame-duck session and in January, when Democrats take control of both the House and Senate. Many Democrats who won election last week pledged to try to block trade bills they viewed as threatening American jobs.

It is not clear whether the preliminary defeat was spurred by anti-trade sentiment or lingering sentiment against Vietnam, which many conservatives still regard as an enemy three decades after the end of a war in which tens of thousands of Americans died.

Trade bills for Peru, other Andean nations and a larger body of poor countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America are also on the schedule for the lame-duck Congressional session, and it is not clear whether the defeat of the Vietnam bill would damp the chances for these bills.

There was no immediate comment on the defeat from the Bush administration.

Susan C. Schwab, the chief United States trade negotiator, flew to Vietnam on Monday for what had been planned as a set of meetings to celebrate a step forward for a country that was a bitter enemy of the United States a generation ago.

Ms. Schwab had called on Congress to approve the measure to "integrate this economically vibrant country into the global community of trading nations" and "open up exciting new trade and investment opportunities" for American companies.

The Bush administration has argued that despite the past bitterness with Vietnam, and a Vietnamese economy that is still heavily influenced by the government, the best strategy to open it up to private investment from the West is to have Vietnam become a member of the World Trade Organization, which oversees trade rules. Trade negotiators last week approved Vietnam's entry into the W.T.O.

The legislation is necessary because a cold-war-era measure known as the Jackson-Vanik law requires an annual review of Vietnam's political and economic practices and an annual granting of trade preferences, and that law must be rescinded under W.T.O. rules.

The administration argues that giving Vietnam "normal" trade preferences is the best way of getting it to adhere to the rule of law in trade relations, including provisions that allow the United States to pursue its rights through the organization.

Belonging to the trade organization also obliges Vietnam to end curbs on imports, eliminate certain subsidies and act to outlaw piracy of American software, videos and other copyrighted items.

Even under the law, however, the United States still has the right to designate Vietnam a "nonmarket economy" — that is, a state-controlled economy that continues to operate under Communist principles. But the Bush administration sought the trade bill as a means to get Vietnam to change.

U.S. Trade Deals In Colombia, Peru Are Put To The Test (WSJ)

By Bob Davis

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The election of a Democratic-controlled Congress more skeptical about the value of free trade is forcing Colombia and Peru to decide whether they need to make additional concessions on labor issues to win congressional approval of trade deals they have negotiated with the U.S.

The two South American nations have negotiated deals with the U.S. that liberalize trade in a host of areas, including industrial tariffs, textiles, and apparel and service industries. Peru already has ratified the pact; Colombia plans to sign its agreement next week and ratify it afterward. Congress isn't likely to take up either measure until next year, after the Democrats take control.

Democrats have long complained that the South American agreements -- as well as other deals signed by the Bush administration -- skimp on protections of labor rights. That has presented Colombia and Peru with a dilemma: Should they make concessions beyond what the White House has sought -- which is sure to be controversial at home -- or face possible rejection of the deals by Congress.

Yesterday, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe said he didn't plan to accept changes in the deal. "I consider that the provisions we have included to protect workers in the agreement are clear provisions" and didn't need to be augmented, he said, after a day of lobbying on Capitol Hill. "More than the provisions, we have the political will to protect our workers."

Earlier in the day, Hernando de Soto, a Peruvian economist appointed as special trade envoy, took a more conciliatory stance. He said his country had a "game plan" to present to the U.S. that "should put to rest the concerns many Democrats have concerning labor and other matters," according to [a news service]. But he wasn't more specific.

The trade deals generally require countries to enforce their labor standards, but don't mandate the level of protection or whether countries must include such specific protections as the right to organize or to bargain collectively. The Bush administration argues that the pacts boost trade protection for workers, and do so in a way that avoids confrontations. Many Democrats want additional assurances labor provisions are ultimately enforceable by trade sanctions.

Election Alters Trade Climate (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

As Democrats prepare to take control of Congress, incoming leaders are planning to insert labor and environmental protections into pending trade treaties and to demand that the Bush administration adopt similar measures in future pacts it negotiates, congressional aides and government officials said yesterday.

The Democrats plan to insert restrictive provisions into two pending trade deals with Peru and Colombia, measures that would limit duty-free access to the U.S. market for goods made in those countries if factories are found to use child labor or deny workers the right to organize unions.

Republicans have historically opposed restrictive provisions in treaties as against the interests of U.S. business and consumers. President Bush has already signed the Peru accord and is expected to sign the Colombia treaty this month.

DOJ_NMG_0093994

Democrats plan to take a similar approach to deals still being negotiated by the United States trade representative with South Korea, Malaysia and Panama, Capitol Hill aides said.

The new atmosphere surrounding trade issues was underscored last night as members of the House -- breaking with Democratic and Republican leaders -- voted to reject a normal trade relationship with Vietnam, following that country's accession to the World Trade Organization last week.

At the center of the new trade dynamic is the fate of the president's so-called fast-track trade authority -- the administration's existing power to call for a simple up-or-down congressional vote on trade pacts without opening them for amendments. The administration's authority is set to expire at the end of June. Democratic leaders say they are inclined to renew it but only if labor and environmental provisions are included.

Yesterday, Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat in line to chair the Finance Committee, said any law reauthorizing the president's fast-track authority would have to "strengthen labor and environmental provisions in some way to win broader Democratic support."

The shift on trade policy is a reaction to more than a dozen years of efforts by the Bush and Clinton administrations to boost trade by opening foreign markets to U.S. goods while allowing greater access to imports from China, Latin America and elsewhere.

The U.S. mood mirrors a world trend, as people on every shore grapple with the challenges of globalization. In Eastern Europe, former communists are returning to power, riding electoral discontent over the loss of jobs. South Korean farmers are protesting the prospect of imported U.S. rice if a free-trade deal is struck. From Ohio to Montana, incoming Democrats made trade an issue in the campaign, accusing Republicans of selling out American workers to corporate interests, and vowing to oppose further trade liberalization.

"For 20 years, we've been told, 'Don't worry, there's going to be a more sophisticated economy, an economy based on knowledge and information,' " said Auggie Tantillo, executive director of the American Manufacturing Trade Action Coalition, which represents U.S. factories, including textile mills in Southern states that have been ravaged by competition from China. "Manufacturing? Well, we can supposedly let that go, because we're going to get something better. Well, we've been waiting, and now we're making less money, and workers are told they have to give up health benefits and pensions and wondering, 'How am I going to make it?' "

Such feelings played a role in the voter anger that remade Congress in last week's elections, he said. "It's going to be heavy lifting for the administration to convince Democrats in the House and Senate to give this president the hand to go out and pursue his trade agenda," Tantillo said.

Business leaders took that message from the startling vote in the House last night, which rejected what had seemed a virtual certainty -- the approval of normal trade relations with Vietnam. The vote needed a two-thirds majority, but it failed 228-161, with Democrats voting it down 94-90.

"It sends a very bad signal to the business community," said Nicole Venable, director of international trade and global competitiveness at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "This bill should have been a no-brainer."

Analysts have noted that expanding trade has historically been a bipartisan effort. A dozen years ago, President Clinton, a Democrat, relied largely on Republican support in Congress to gain passage of the North American Free Trade Agreement. Trade proponents said that growing commerce has created new markets for U.S. businesses abroad, while stocking shelves at home with low-priced goods.

"Globalized sourcing has brought enormous benefits to the American consumer," said Hallock Northcott, president of the American Association of Exporters and Importers.

For now, both sides in Washington are speaking the language of bipartisanship, a dynamic that is expected to hold for at least a while as some relatively uncontroversial trade issues come before Congress.

Administration officials hope to gain congressional authority soon to renew a set of reduced tariffs for Andean countries, a form of aid in the U.S. campaign to discourage their production of narcotics. Congress must also take up renewal of reduced duties for the world's poorest countries, while extending parts of a preferential trade accord with African nations.

After that, the rhetoric of cooperation could be tested, as the Bush administration seeks approval for free-trade agreements it has already struck with Peru and Colombia. A U.S. government official who spoke on condition that he not be named because he lacks authorization said the administration was "not looking to reopen negotiations" on those treaties. But a Democratic congressional aide involved in trade issues said the leadership would negotiate with the U.S. trade representative to ensure that labor protections are written into the treaties, along with beefed-up enforcement mechanisms. "We want to tighten that up," the aide said.

The details now rest with Baucus and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who is expected to oversee the House Ways and Means Committee. While both presumptive chairman have pledged to engage the administration on trade, they are cognizant that at least some of the groundswell of support for their party was the result of disenchantment over U.S. job losses, including jobs moving overseas.

The fate of the president's fast-track authority may be a litmus test. Eight years ago, a Republican Congress did not renew Clinton's ability to negotiate trade pacts, with leaders in the House reluctant to hand the Democratic president a key victory ahead of the 2000 election. Democrats may make a similar calculation this time.

The administration is expected to make a final push to strike a deal with the European Union and developing nations on the now-stalled global tariff reduction talks known as the Doha round before Bush's existing fast-track authority expires.

That would kick the issue to the Democrats and perhaps test their cohesion, pitting some of the newcomers who are skeptical about trade against those worried about alienating business.

"The Democrats have rhetorically painted themselves into a corner," said Gary C. Hufbauer, a trade expert at the Peterson Institute for International Economics, in Washington. "The leadership doesn't want to be painted as obstructionist on trade."

Election Pushes Globalization To Forefront (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — To hear some Democrats tell it, the United States is engaged in a costly, ill-advised foreign adventure that is long overdue for a change of course.

Not the war in Iraq. Globalization.

Several members of the Democratic Congress that takes office in January say the Bush administration's unquestioning celebration of free trade is bleeding the middle class and endangering the American Dream. Democrats such as Sen.-elect Sherrod Brown of Ohio want a tougher approach to future trade deals. Others, including veterans of the Clinton administration who back trade, say the solution is to craft new policies that take the sting out of job losses caused by foreign competition.

The new congressional lineup raises the prospect of the most significant globalization debate since the 1992 presidential campaign's bitter exchanges over the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). Some already expect the issue to play a prominent role in the run-up to the 2008 election.

“There is a real debate on whether to go further and continue reducing trade barriers and opening markets and if so, at what pace and how,” says Fred Bergsten, director of the Peterson Institute for International Economics.

In offices on Capitol Hill and in downtown think tanks, Democratic politicians and trade specialists suddenly find their opinions matter in a way they haven't for a dozen years. At the Hamilton Project, the brainchild of Robert Rubin, the former Treasury secretary, economists are mulling new social insurance programs they argue will promote economic growth by soothing public fears of potential financial harm. One idea: reworking unemployment insurance to target aid to those who are out of work the longest.

Despite the political upheaval in Washington and the rising popular angst, the U.S. economy is now so deeply intertwined with other nations that it may be too late to turn back, say mainstream economists. Unlike two decades ago when trade with Japan triggered enormous public unease, U.S. manufacturers are heavily reliant upon imported components for their assembly lines and can't risk an interruption of global commerce.

“Our economy is becoming much more integrated with China,” says trade historian Douglas Irwin of Dartmouth College. “It's not ‘them' exporting to ‘us.' It's U.S. multinationals' factories there exporting to us.”

Worries over trade-related job losses, of course, aren't new. In the 1980s, union workers, angry over surging Japanese imports, smashed Toyotas in factory parking lots in Detroit. In 1993, Ross Perot warned Americans a “giant sucking sound” would result from NAFTA sending millions of good jobs to Mexico.

Anti-globalization protestors rampaged through Seattle during a World Trade Organization summit seven years ago. And during the 2004 presidential election, outsourcing of jobs to India ignited intense controversy.

But today's public anxieties are both broader and more intense. In exit polls last week, 40% of voters said they expect the next generation of Americans to have a lower standard of living vs. 30% who said they expect life to improve.

That pessimism may be linked to deep dissatisfaction over the way globalization is working. In a 2005 Program on International Policy Attitudes poll, only 16% of respondents backed the current U.S. approach; 56% said they favor expanded trade but only if much more is done to help affected U.S. workers. Almost one-quarter of those surveyed said they opposed further trade liberalization because the costs would outweigh the benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0093996

Democratic candidates used trade as a key issue in 100 congressional districts, according to the left-leaning Public Citizen. Among them: Jim Webb, whose Senate victory in Virginia gave the Democrats control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years. The former Marine and one-time Reagan administration official made "economic fairness" a central element of his campaign and called for overhauling trade laws "so that free trade becomes fair trade."

For two decades, it has been an article of faith, under Democrats and Republicans alike, that gains from free trade far exceeded losses. "Globalization" became the label given to the elimination of barriers to the free movement of goods and capital, but not people, across national borders.

Fueled by the collapse of communism almost two decades ago and the continuing revolution in information technology and telecommunications, that process has delivered enormous benefits for the USA. On an annual basis, globalization boosts the U.S. economy by $1 trillion, or roughly $10,000 per household, according to the Peterson Institute. Those broad gains dwarf $54 billion in costs to the families that suffer trade-related job losses. But the gains are dispersed throughout the economy in the form of less expensive clothing, cars and phone calls while the costs are concentrated in the heartbreak of an estimated 225,000 individual job losses.

Rising waves of public unease are being driven by the relentless march of globalization as well as broader economic maladies. In the 1990s, trade-related job losses were confined to comparatively low-wage, low-skill factory jobs. Globalization enthusiasts argued that the USA would prosper by building a knowledge economy filled with well-paid, white-collar positions.

But in recent years, even those jobs have begun drifting to developing countries such as India and China. From 1999 to 2005, the USA lost 139,510 computer-programming jobs, more than one out of every four such positions in the country, according to Catherine Mann, a Peterson Institute economist. There were also small declines in the ranks of electrical engineers and database administrators. All three of these job categories are well-paid: Programmers average $67,400 annually.

At the same time, middle-class families face heightened financial risks. Incomes are more volatile, even as the economy prospers. About half of all families suffer a drop in income over any two-year period, and those who fall today fall further than in the past, according to Jacob Hacker, author of The Great Risk Shift.

In the early 1970s, the typical family that stumbled lost 27% of its annual income. But over the last decade, as globalization moved into high gear, the income loss averaged around 40%. For a family in 2004 earning the median income of $43,200, that would mean a crippling decline of $17,280.

The risk of suffering a 50% drop in family income has more than doubled since the early 1970s, according to Hacker, a political science professor at Yale University. That may be because, even amid a growing economy, the typical spell of unemployment has grown longer. In the 1970s, workers who lost their jobs typically were unemployed for 6.3 weeks, says economist Howard Rosen. Today, those handed pink slips endure on average an additional two weeks of enforced idleness before finding new work.

These real-life financial strains coupled with a steady parade of headlines about mushrooming U.S. trade deficits badly eroded public support for globalization. Earlier this year, Congress forced a foreign company, Dubai Ports World, to sell its stake in operations at six U.S. ports. Negotiations on a new global trade agreement ran aground this summer. And amid a $200 billion trade deficit with China, the U.S. continues to criticize Beijing over a currency policy that some in Congress say costs millions of U.S. jobs.

Those who profit from global financial integration recognize the political headwinds they're confronting, including the risk of a drift toward protectionism. In June, even as U.S. exports were hitting another record, the National Foreign Trade Council board, whose members include Boeing, General Motors, ExxonMobil and Wal-Mart, discussed the gathering storm.

"We agreed the message that globalization is a good thing has fallen flat and no longer resonates. … Not enough people believe it anymore," says Bill Reinsch, the council's president.

In August, Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke warned that "further progress in global economic integration should not be taken for granted" and suggested additional measures are needed to spread globalization's benefits.

The same month, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson acknowledged the pain caused by trade but rejected limiting cross-border commerce. Instead, he called for "thinking more creatively" about ways to help those who lose out.

In a subsequent interview, President Bush told USA TODAY that affected workers should take courses at local community colleges.

Now, it's the Democrats' turn to weigh in. On the left, lawmakers such as Brown seek a wholesale overhaul of the U.S. approach to trade negotiations, including renegotiating NAFTA and trade ties with China. Brown wants any new trade accords to include protections for labor, the environment and food safety. And he suggested that the administration's hopes of renewing the president's negotiating authority for new trade deals, which expires next summer, could hinge on winning approval for a "new direction" on trade policy.

DOJ_NMG_0093997

"We don't know exactly what the new road is, but we're going to hit the brakes on this road," says Lori Wallach, director of Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch.

Meanwhile, self-described centrists at the Hamilton Project, based at the Brookings Institution, back concepts such as wage insurance to partially compensate workers who take lower-paying jobs after being rendered jobless by foreign competition. Peter Orszag, project director, says new social insurance schemes "could be growth enhancing" if they prevent a protectionist backlash that would crimp cross-border trade.

Existing worker protections are widely regarded as inadequate. Even after a major expansion four years ago, the Labor Department's trade adjustment assistance program helps only about 50,000 people each year and is derided by many as "burial insurance," says Howard Rosen, a former Democratic senate staffer deeply involved in writing the original trade adjustment legislation.

Adding urgency to the debate is the prospect of today's deflating housing bubble causing the economy to slow. Current worries over the costs of global integration arose at a time when soaring real estate values held the economy aloft and helped keep unemployment near rock bottom. Indeed, even as it led to rising inequality and middle-class insecurity, globalization enabled the U.S. to finance a consumption boom by borrowing massive amounts of money from China, says Jeffrey Frieden, author of Global Capitalism.

That can't go on forever.

"There is a broad sense of unease in the land with the pattern of international economic integration, which has been mitigated by the fact that the country has experienced a consumption boom for the past 10 years or so," says Frieden. "What if that starts not being the case?"

Commerce Secretary Tries Personal Persuasion In China (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

BEIJING, Tuesday, Nov. 14 (AP) — Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez urged Beijing on Tuesday to toughen a crackdown on pirated goods and other copyright infringements, saying failure to do so could fuel an American backlash against trade with China.

Despite Chinese progress in protecting intellectual property rights, Mr. Gutierrez said American Customs agents seized more counterfeit goods from China than all other countries combined.

To turn the tide, he said China needs to attack the criminal gangs that are behind the manufacture and trade of most pirated goods. He also called on Beijing to amend laws to make it easier to allow criminal prosecution of infringements against intellectual property, or I.P., and to step up cooperation with international law enforcement.

"Another victim of widespread I.P. theft in China is American support for expanding our trade relationship," Mr. Gutierrez told Chinese and American business executives. "Those who espouse protectionism, those who would like to see protectionist policies put in place as a legitimate economic policy have a loud voice."

The United States' trade deficit with China is worsening, projected to grow 12 percent to $228 billion this year. Mr. Gutierrez, on his fourth trip to China in 18 months, said he would return to Beijing next month with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to talk about a wide array of economic issues.

Widespread theft of intellectual property, as well as protectionist policies and unclear regulations, have long been seen as hampering foreign companies' access to the Chinese market.

To correct the imbalances and curb piracy, Mr. Gutierrez said China must open its markets more widely, especially to American entertainment companies.

Limits on the number of foreign movies allowed into China has contributed to a market for pirated copies, with digital video discs of Hollywood blockbusters selling for $1 in many Chinese cities.

U.S., Chinese Discuss Piracy, Trade Barriers (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

BEIJING -- U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez began a trip to Beijing on Monday to help American entrepreneurs clinch deals and to discuss barriers that have contributed to a soaring and politically touchy Chinese trade surplus.

Highlighting his efforts to increase U.S. exports, Mr. Gutierrez on Monday watched Motorola Inc. sign a contract to supply $1.6 billion worth of mobile phones to a Chinese distributor. He also presided at a ceremony by the home-entertainment division of News Corp.'s Twentieth Century Fox studio announcing a plan to distribute moderately priced DVDs in the piracy-plagued China market.

DOJ_NMG_0093998

Around the signings, Mr. Gutierrez held talks with senior Chinese trade officials that he said broadly covered access to the China market, persisting product piracy and unclear government regulations.

Also highlighting efforts by U.S. businesses to expand their presence in China, International Business Machines Corp. may be joining Citigroup Inc. in its bid to take a majority stake in China's Guangdong Development Bank, a person familiar with the deal said Monday. (See related article2.)

Americans are worried about record trade imbalances with China -- projected to rise 12% to $228 billion this year. Pressure on the Bush administration over the deficit is expected to increase following the opposition Democratic Party's recapture of Congress in elections last week.

Trying to seize the initiative, Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi told Mr. Gutierrez: "We welcome the exports of your country. The Chinese market is completely opened to the outside world." Mr. Wu reiterated a long-standing Chinese complaint that American export controls prohibited the transfer of high-technology products, thereby keeping some U.S. goods out of China.

Mr. Gutierrez, who brought along a delegation of 25 American businesses, from heavy equipment makers to architecture firms, stressed that Washington sought more open markets, not protectionism. "Ultimately what counts is results. Both sides are increasing the amount of business they do with each other," he told reporters. He said that American exports this year totaled about $50 billion in products and services and were up 34% this year to date.

Concerns, however, continued over Chinese regulations limiting the retail business of U.S. and other foreign banks and the widespread copying of U.S. goods and other infringements of intellectual property, Mr. Gutierrez said.

"The United States and China will continue to fight piracy. This is a priority for both governments," Mr. Gutierrez said at a signing ceremony for the Fox deal. "We will both work as hard as we have to stamp out piracy."

Deals like the Fox arrangement are part of an effort by American entertainment companies to offer Chinese consumers inexpensive but legal CDs and DVDs as an alternative to cheap pirated ones widely available in China. Such pirated products, Mr. Gutierrez said, are costing American companies "hundreds of millions of dollars" in sales.

Under the deal, Twentieth Century Fox Home Entertainment will begin distributing DVDs through Chinese video distributor Zoke Culture Group, the companies said.

Also signed Monday was the Motorola contract to supply 12 million mobile handsets to Shenzhen Telling Telecom Development Co., executives from both companies said.

A subsidiary of U.S.-based Han's Technologies Inc. also signed an agreement to build and operate seven water supply plants and 13 wastewater treatments plants to the Chinese county of Xiangshan. Terms weren't disclosed.

Lebanese Cabinet Approves U.N. Tribunal (AP)

By Zeina Karam

AP, November 14, 2006

A weakened Lebanese government Monday approved a U.N. plan for an international tribunal for suspects in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri — despite the resignation of six ministers and the objections of the president.

The vote was a victory for Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, who is facing a challenge from Hezbollah, which has threatened mass protests unless the group and its Shiite Muslim allies gain effective veto power in the Cabinet. All 18 ministers remaining in the Cabinet voted for the U.N. plan, which begins the process of prosecuting Hariri's alleged killers in a court with international legitimacy.

The draft document now returns to the Security Council for endorsement, but its final approval by the weakened government was far from certain.

"Our aim is to achieve justice and only justice," Saniora said after the three-hour Cabinet meeting.

Hariri was killed with 22 others in a suicide truck bombing in February 2005. The assassination sparked huge protests against Syria, which was widely seen as culpable. Syria denied involvement, but was forced to withdraw its troops from Lebanon, ending a 29-year presence. Subsequent elections produced an anti-Syrian majority in parliament and in the Cabinet.

However, some opposition figures said the Cabinet's approval was illegal because none of the five Shiite ministers who resigned Saturday was present.

Lahoud said Sunday that Saniora's government was no longer legitimate because the constitution states that "all sects should be justly represented in the Cabinet." The constitution recognizes 18 religion-based communities and most of them are represented in a full Cabinet by at least one minister. Half the ministers have to be Christian and half Muslim.

Lahoud added that all decisions taken by the Cabinet, including Monday's, were "null and void" and had no constitutional value.

DOJ_NMG_0093999

Michel Aoun, the leader of a Christian faction allied with Hezbollah, concurred, saying: "The government has lost its legitimacy and its decision today to approve the draft document ... is meaningless."

Environment Minister Yaacoub Sarraf, a Christian minister allied with the president, resigned shortly before the Cabinet meeting, citing similar objections.

"I don't see myself belonging to any constitutional authority in which an entire sect is absent," Sarraf wrote in his letter of resignation.

Saniora refused to accept Sarraf's resignation, as he had refused to accept those of the Hezbollah and Shiite Amal ministers on Saturday.

The prime minister insisted the Cabinet's move was legal, and his Information Minister Ghazi Aridi extended a hand to opponents, saying the government was willing discuss their grievances.

"We have no choice but dialogue to agree on all the issues," Aridi said.

Saniora still has the necessary two-thirds of the 24-member Cabinet in order to hold meetings and make decisions, but he will find it difficult to govern as passing legislation depends on forging alliances among the many factions in parliament.

The U.N. proposals seek to create a "tribunal with an international character," but Lahoud has criticized the presence of foreign judges and said he would not pass an earlier draft.

Once the Security Council has endorsed the final draft, it must be approved by Lebanon's Cabinet again, signed by the president and approved by parliament.

The anti-Syrian camp in Lebanon has charged that Syria is behind the opposition to the tribunal because it seeks to avoid the prosecution of the Syrians implicated in Hariri's killing by a U.N. inquiry. Hezbollah officials have denied they are opposed to a U.N. tribunal and Aoun called the accusation "a lie."

Al-Qaida Threatens To Topple Lebanon Govt. (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

Al-Qaida has purportedly issued a statement threatening to topple Lebanon's "corrupt" Western-backed government, according to a London-based Arabic newspaper Monday.

The Al-Hayat newspaper reported that al-Qaida issued the statement from the Palestinian refugee camp of Nahr el-Bared in northern Lebanon.

"The organization has arrived in Lebanon and we will work on destroying this corrupt government that receives orders from the American administration," Al-Hayat said, quoting the statement.

Although it was impossible to verify the authenticity of the message, Information Minister Ghazi Aridi cast doubt on its veracity Monday.

"There is nothing that proves that this statement was issued by al-Qaida," he told reporters Monday following a cabinet meeting in which the government approved a U.N. draft setting up an international tribunal to try suspects in the 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Aridi suggested the statement could be the work of local or regional groups that were opposed to the international tribunal in an attempt to intimidate the ministers ahead of the vote on Monday.

Al-Hayat did not say how it obtained the message, and Palestinian factions denied any such statement was issued from the camp. Following a meeting by representatives of various Palestinian factions in Nahr el-Bared camp, they issued a statement saying there was "absolutely no presence" for al-Qaida in Palestinian camps in northern Lebanon.

Although al-Qaida has rarely carried out attacks in Lebanon, it is believed to have sympathizers among extremist factions in Palestinian refugee camps.

Lebanon's Interior Minister Ahmed Fatfat has warned in recent months that al-Qaida was attempting to establish itself in Lebanon.

In December, al-Qaida in Iraq claimed responsibility for a rocket attack into northern Israel apparently carried out by a radical Palestinian group, and Fatfat has said Lebanese authorities had broken up four al-Qaida cells this year.

Defenses On Subs To Be Reviewed (WT)

By Bill Gertz,

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094000

Navy officials confirmed yesterday that an aircraft carrier battle group failed to detect a Chinese submarine that surfaced within weapons range of the USS Kitty Hawk. Anti-submarine defenses for the carrier battle group will be reviewed as a result, they said.

"It was not detected," said one Navy official of the encounter with a Chinese diesel-powered attack submarine. "And we're concerned about that, obviously."

The Chinese Song-class attack submarine surfaced near the carrier in deep waters off Okinawa on Oct. 26. It was armed with wake-homing torpedos and anti-ship cruise missiles.

The officials said it was unusual for the submarine to be operating in deep ocean waters, but the incident was not like the April 2001 collision of a U.S. EP-3 surveillance aircraft and Chinese F-8 jet that ruptured military ties.

"We were operating in international waters, and they were operating in international waters," the official said. "From that standpoint, nobody was endangering anybody. Nobody felt threatened."

However, other defense officials said the submarine surfacing was a provocative action by the Chinese military, which has placed a high priority on practicing anti-aircraft-carrier operations against U.S. carriers and warships in preparation for a possible future conflict over Taiwan.

The carrier was not engaged in anti-submarine warfare exercises at the time and thus did not have active patrols for submarines, the Navy official said. As a result, submarine defenses for the carrier and its accompanying warships will be reviewed, he said.

The submarine was spotted by carrier-based aircraft conducting routine surveillance.

The submarine encounter also took U.S. intelligence agencies by surprise because of years of analyses that continue to portray a benign China, said a defense official.

"Our China analysts appeared to be stunned that China would shadow a U.S. carrier as far away as Okinawa," the defense official said.

The Japan-based Kitty Hawk and associated warships are the only Asia-based battle group and would be the first to respond to a crisis concerning Taiwan, which China has threatened with force in the past.

The encounter also was unusual because Chinese submarines normally do not operate in deep waters, both officials said.

"From our standpoint, ... it shows that they continue to develop blue-water capabilities," the Navy official said.

Pentagon and military officials initially declined to discuss anything about the submarine incident, claiming details were classified. Some details were then disclosed after The Washington Times reported the encounter in yesterday's editions.

Disclosure of the submarine encounter comes as the U.S. Pacific Fleet commander, Adm. Gary Roughead, is visiting China for meetings with Chinese military officials.

A Pacific Fleet spokesman said Adm. Roughead could not be reached yesterday on whether he planned to raise the submarine encounter during talks with the Chinese.

Adm. Roughead told reporters in Beijing yesterday that he hopes to better understand the intentions behind China's naval buildup during his weeklong visit.

"When asked if the PLA navy is a threat, I've been on the record as saying no," the four-star admiral said, referring to Chinese forces, the People's Liberation Army. "But I really would like to know what the intent is in some of the developments that I see in the PLA navy."

Adm. Roughead is in China as the U.S. and Chinese militaries conduct a joint search-and-rescue operation exercise.

The visit is part of an ambitious program being promoted by the commander of U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. William J. Fallon, to develop closer ties with the Chinese military.

The program has been plagued by a lack of reciprocity on the part of China's military, which continues to refuse U.S. military visitors to key military facilities or to observe military exercise. By contrast, the U.S. military has given Chinese military visitors access to sensitive U.S. facilities and military exercises.

Also, China is continuing to block U.S. military officials from visiting a secret underground command center in Beijing known as the Western Hills.

Adm. Roughead is scheduled to meet Chinese navy commander Vice Admiral Wu Shengli and the commander of the South China Sea Fleet. Those talks could shed light on China's aggressive naval buildup.

"Clearly, the growth in the capacity and capability of the navy since I've first been exposed to it in the '90s, the ability to go into the blue water is very, very clear," he said. "I look forward to having discussions about what the vision is and perhaps what some of the operating doctrine might be."

William Tripplett, a former Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff specialist on China, said the failure to track the submarine was alarming.

DOJ_NMG_0094001

"China's tracking of the Kitty Hawk, undetected by U.S. Navy anti-submarine warfare assets, is a shocking development," he said.

Commander: China Sub Stalked U.S. Carrier (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

A Chinese submarine came close to the USS Kitty Hawk carrier group in the Pacific Ocean last month, a top U.S. naval commander said Tuesday.

The aircraft carrier and supporting ships were conducting war games at the time but were not engaged in anti-submarine exercises, Adm. William Fallon, the commander of U.S. Pacific Command, told reporters.

But they had been, he said, "and if this Chinese sub came in the middle of this, then it could have escalated into something that could have been very unforeseen."

Fallon, who is in Kuala Lumpur for a 23-nation Chief of Defense Forces meeting, gave no other details.

He was commenting on a report on the Washington Times' Web site Tuesday that said a Chinese submarine "stalked" the Kitty Hawk and surfaced within torpedo firing range.

Poisoned Arrows Vs. Machine Guns (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

KOUKOU, Chad

Around this remote market town are janjaweed, the Sudanese-sponsored Arab militias that hunt down black Africans and shoot or rape them. The janjaweed are armed with AK-47s, grenade launchers and heavy machine guns mounted on pickup trucks.

Here in Koukou, the Africans are waiting for the attackers — with bows and arrows.

The international community has shamefully abandoned the people of eastern Chad, allowing the Darfur genocide to spread relentlessly. Incredibly, this year some 15,000 Chadians have sought security by fleeing into Darfur.

So the people in little Chadian towns like Koukou are left to themselves, and they have organized a self-defense force out of the town's 2,000 people. They have 12 hunting rifles, and every man has bows and arrows. Many also carry spears or swords.

It is an astonishing sight in the 21st century: Almost every male you meet here over the age of 12 carries a homemade bow and a quiver of arrows, just in case they come across marauders with machine guns. It is as crazy as it is courageous.

"I will try to defend myself with this bow and arrow," said Muhammad Hamid, a 40-year-old farmer walking down the path by the town. "If I die, that's O.K., but I will try to fight."

Mr. Muhammad gave me a demonstration of his archery and it was, frankly, pitiful. He could fire the arrow only about 50 feet. Another villager sent the arrow only 40 feet.

Yet the villagers are fighting for the lives of their loved ones, and that counts for something. They also apply traditional poison to the arrowheads, and they say that if it reaches the bloodstream it is deadly. In a destroyed village southwest of here, I saw a janjaweed horse that had been killed by a defender's arrow.

The local peasants certainly do better than I do. When I ran into a band of janjaweed yesterday in a burned-out village near here, I fled. The peasants of Koukou stand their ground.

Indeed, the archers of Koukou managed to turn back an attack by the janjaweed over two days in May. One janjaweed fighter they killed carried a Sudanese military identity card — one more indication that Sudan is behind these attacks.

"God gave us help to win," said Muhammad Ibrahim, the chief of the locality, explaining the janjaweed retreat in May. But after a string of attacks on 20 villages in the area over the last 10 days, he now expects another assault on Koukou by the janjaweed.

The townspeople have talked about pulling up stakes and moving en masse, but they have nowhere to go.

The courage of ordinary citizens here offers a pointed contrast to the fecklessness everywhere else. France, the former colonial power here, has troops in both Chad and the Central African Republic — which it seems ready to use primarily to evacuate Europeans as order collapses. (During the Rwandan genocide, France left its local staff to be butchered but took care to evacuate the embassy dog.)

As for the U.S., President Bush has found the courage to do little more than demand that the U.N. do something. Frankly, we should be embarrassed that the mightiest superpower in the history of the world can't summon the gumption of Chadian peasants with bows and arrows.

DOJ_NMG_0094002

Already, the U.N. and the major powers have allowed hundreds of thousands of people to be killed in Darfur. Now they seem equally ready to allow the genocide to spread to a far larger area and cause the collapse of Chad and the Central African Republic.

Local Chadians in this region, from the sultan to the homeless people now sleeping under trees, regularly plead for U.N. peacekeepers, or any international intervention.

Here's a suggestion: How about a joint U.S. and French operation to fly sorties, at the invitation of the Chadian government, from the French air base in Abéché, Chad, to strafe janjaweed raiding parties? Most of the janjaweed destroying eastern Chad seem to be Sudanese, guided by some Chadian Arabs who know this territory, and many appear to be in it for the pay and the spoils. Such mercenaries may find it less of an adventure if they risk being gunned down themselves.

In this semidesert land, large bands of janjaweed can be spotted relatively easily. And there is no sovereignty objection in assisting Chad in securing its own territory.

The people in Koukou and other towns here, with their bows and arrows, have the guts to stand up to genocide. I wish we did.

U.N. Pledges $77M For Darfur Forces (AP-Y)

By Les Neuhaus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

The United Nations said Monday it has pledged about $77 million in personnel and equipment to help the overwhelmed African Union force in Darfur as Sudan blocks the world body from sending its own peacekeepers to the war-torn region.

The package includes military and police advisers, communications equipment and tools like night-vision goggles, said Hedi Annabi, the U.N. assistant secretary general for peacekeeping operations. It will be given to the African Union as soon as possible.

The aid has been offered because of Sudan's refusal to allow a U.N. peacekeeping force in Darfur, Annabi told reporters.

"That (willingness) is not there today (for a United Nations peacekeeping force), so in the meantime we are looking at ways in which we can move forward by reinforcing (the African Union Mission in Sudan) to enable it to go on with its tasks effectively," Annabi said.

The U.N. Department of Peacekeeping Operations in New York said the Sudanese government initially agreed to allow the United Nations to provide the AU troops with a support package worth about $22 million. Annabi was able to secure the government's agreement to allow the rest of the $77 million aid package to go through in the last few days.

Annabi, who recently visited Sudan, said he will soon start discussions on another support package for the AU force, but he did not say how much that would be worth.

Annabi spoke after a meeting of African Union, U.N. and Sudanese officials to discuss the deteriorating situation in Darfur with the AU's mandate due to expire on Dec. 31.

The U.N. Security Council voted in August to send more than 20,000 peacekeepers to Darfur to replace the ill-equipped and underfunded African Union force, but Sudan has rejected this.

The African Union currently has 7,000 troops in the violence-plagued region to monitor a shaky cease-fire signed earlier this year by the government and one rebel faction.

The announcement came as the U.N. reported nearly 40 civilian deaths in the last few days in attacks in Darfur by Arab militiamen — some of whom were backed by Sudanese military vehicles.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and the African Union also have invited representatives from the five permanent members of the Security Council, several African countries, the League of Arab States and the European Union to discuss the deteriorating situation in Darfur, U.N. spokesman Stephane Dujarric said.

Dujarric said Annan would attend the meeting Thursday in Ethiopia, as would representatives from Sudan's government.

The African Union's peace and security commissioner Said Djinnit said the organization's peacekeeping mission needed even more donor support. Some pledged millions a few months ago, but little has been received, he said.

"This is a matter of urgency," he said. "This ad hoc way of funding the mission is unsustainable."

The African Union force has been unable to curb violence in Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced since the conflict began in February 2003, when ethnic African tribesmen took up arms against the Arab-led government in Khartoum.

U.N. investigators and rights groups have blamed the worst atrocities on the janjaweed, a pro-government militia that is widely accused of killing villagers and destroying their homes. The government denies supporting the militia.

Sinn Fein-Unionist Pact Lagging (WT)

By Anthony Healy

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

DUBLIN -- A deal between Sinn Fein and the Democratic Unionist Party is falling behind schedule, but it still offers hope for a permanent solution to the "troubles" in Northern Ireland.

The St. Andrew's Agreement, concluded last month in Scotland, provides for a power-sharing home-rule government in Belfast and has wide support from both the pro-Irish Catholics, represented by Sinn Fein, and the pro-British Protestants, represented by the DUP.

The Unionists, however, are refusing to go forward without a firm commitment from Sinn Fein to support and respect the Police Service of Northern Ireland -- a bitter pill for the party to swallow after decades of distrust during struggles between the police and Sinn Fein's allies in the Irish Republican Army.

Sinn Fein is to hold a special party conference to decide the issue, the final hurdle to the restoration of the home-rule government established at Stormont in 1999 and suspended by Prime Minister Tony Blair in 2002. A source close to Sinn Fein said that the most likely date for the conference would be in January.

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams indicated during a fundraising event in New York last week that his party would seek some assurances in exchange for the concession. "We are determined to ensure that all elements in policing are accountable. That is the focus of our negotiations with the British government at this time," he said.

Mr. Adam's comments came just days after a human rights group headed by Notre Dame Law School professor Doug Cassel concluded that Northern Ireland police and the British Army were involved in the slayings of 74 Catholics between 1972 and 1977. Mr. Cassel called on the British government to apologize to the families of the victims.

The DUP, for its part, says Sinn Fein's delay in stating its support for the police and the courts has had "clear, adverse implications for the timetable laid out in the St. Andrew's Agreement."

Both parties had been expected to endorse the agreement by last weekend and to make a firm commitment to power sharing -- along with their nominations for the posts of first minister and deputy first minister -- by Nov. 24.

It now appears that the Nov. 24 deadline will not be met, but if Sinn Fein needs more time it will certainly get it. As one Irish politician stated, "The prize is too big."

If the policing issue can be settled, it is expected that elections to the new executive will take place in March.

US Grants Mali 461 Million Dollars For Airport, Irrigation Expansion (AFP)

AFP, November 14, 2006

The United States signed a 461 million dollar aid "compact" with Mali to finance a giant irrigation project and expand the international airport in the poverty-stricken African nation.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the grant from the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) was a reward for good governance and a commitment to democracy by the government of Malian President Amadou Toumani Toure.

"The Millennium Challenge Corporation rewards those countries which have demonstrated their commitment to ruling justly," Rice said at a ceremony at the State Department attended by Toure and other senior US and Malian officials.

The bulk of the five-year assistance package will provide 235 million dollars to finance a massive irrigation and modernization program in Mali's Alatona region designed to increase food production and improve land tenure security in an area now dominated by subsistence agriculture, officials said.

Another 90 million dollars will be used to expand the freight and passenger capacity of Bamako international airport, the economic lifeline of the land-locked North African country.

Some 94 million dollars were earmarked for the development of an industrial park near the airport while the remainder of the funds will be spent on management of the projects.

The three projects were developed jointly by US and Malian authorities in what Toure hailed as "a new vision of development assistance".

"These projects are an enormous source of hope for our nation," Toure said, adding that the US-financed programs will boost agricultural production, open Mali to world markets and strengthen its industrial base.

Mali, one of the world's poorest countries with annual per capita income of 380 dollars, is the 10th nation to benefit from grants by the Millennium Challenge Corporation, which was launched by President George W. Bush in 2004 with the stated aim of promoting good governance, economic freedom and growth.

DOJ_NMG_0094004

Other recipients are Armenia, Benin, Cape Verde, Georgia, Ghana, Honduras, Madagascar, Nicaragua and Vanuatu.

In all the MCC has signed aid agreements totalling 2.5 billion dollars.

Ambassador John Danilovich, chief executive of the MCC, said the aid program signed Monday "promises to unleash growth in the business and agriculture sectors that will help replace poverty with prosperity for tens of thousands of Malians."

The US and Mali also will collaborate in another way this week, as the US military will start training the army in Mali in anti-terrorism techniques and in peace-keeping operations, the Malian military said.

"The training will take place starting Wednesday or Thursday in (the northern cities of) Timbuktu and in Gao," said Colonel Abdoulaye Coulibaly, spokesman for the Malian army.

Between 300 and 350 Malian soldiers will undergo training for "several weeks," he added.

The desert north of Mali, vast and difficult to monitor, is an important point of passage for traffickers, especially of weapons, and for terrorist groups active in the Sahara, such as the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, an Algerian group having allegiances to Al-Qaeda.

Giant Neighbors Russia, China See Fault Lines Start To Appear (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

AYATSKOYE, Russia -- When Vladimir Shiryaev bought Ayatskoye, a near-bankrupt farm in the Urals, in 2000, he wondered how he would ever get the harvest in. Most of the local labor force was either too old or too drunk to work.

So he sought rescue from a group of Chinese laborers, led by a woman from Inner Mongolia named Meng Dani. He leased them about 50 acres, and within a few months they were growing tomatoes and cabbages on land that had stood untilled for years.

Mr. Shiryaev is delighted with his hard-working new tenants. "They've got a really serious operation going here," he says. "I really hope they can inspire the locals to work harder." Regional officials are so impressed they're now planning to turn millions of acres of long-uncultivated fields over to Chinese peasants like Ms. Meng.

But among many natives here in Russia's heartland, the idea has proved controversial. "Those farmers are a landing force," says Igor Vyaginsky, a crew-cut local activist from the Movement Against Illegal Immigration with a penchant for military terminology. "They'll establish a bridgehead and then spread out. We could end up losing our territory."

The dispute over Ayatskoye is typical of the tension at the heart of the Russia-China relationship. Russia is finding it hard to cope with the emergence of a new global power right on its doorstep, and many Russians fear being overwhelmed by their dynamic and more-populous neighbor. But on the ground, especially in Russia's sparsely populated countryside, Chinese labor is helping to stave off economic ruin.

To the outside world, Russia and China appear to be cozying up like never before. In October 2004, Moscow ceded territory to its southern neighbor to resolve a longstanding border conflict that had sparked a war in the late 1960s. The following year the two carried out their first-ever joint military exercise. China buys about $1 billion worth of Russian weapons every year, making it the Russian arms industry's biggest customer. Altogether, the two countries' trade was valued at $29 billion last year, an increase of 37% over 2004.

Meanwhile, as China scours the world for energy to power its booming economy, it's increasingly looking to Russia's bountiful reserves of oil and gas. Last week, the Kremlin's oil company, state-controlled OAO Rosneft, pledged to nearly double crude exports to China and said it was teaming up with China National Petroleum Corp. to build an oil refinery and operate gas stations in China.

But China's efforts to strengthen its economic ties with Russia have run into repeated roadblocks. Only one of Beijing's state energy companies has so far succeeded in gaining a stake in a Russian oil field, and only when it agreed to relinquish a controlling stake to Rosneft. Despite years of trying, Beijing has so far failed to secure access to a planned pipeline carrying Siberian crude to the Pacific. Russia, concerned about becoming too dependent on one customer, has refused to commit to building a spur that would link the pipeline to northern China, instead hinting that it will rely on rail shipments -- which are much costlier and less reliable.

Even when the Chinese try to invest in less-sensitive sectors than energy, the relationship can be fractious. In St. Petersburg, Russia's second-largest city, local politicians have campaigned to block a $1.3 billion real-estate development by a conglomerate of five Chinese state-owned companies. The concern: that the 553.5-acre project, which would include housing, schools, hospitals, recreation and retail, would become a "Chinatown"-style enclave for illegal immigrants.

Array of Obstacles

DOJ_NMG_0094005

In Blagoveshchensk, a city on the Russian-Chinese border, efforts to build trade have fallen flat. Eleven years after Moscow signed a deal to build a bridge across the Amur River, a vast array of bureaucratic obstacles is still preventing construction -- despite pleas from Beijing to speed things up.

Behind the ambivalence is a fear that once the floodgates are opened, Russia could be swamped by Chinese immigrants. The surrounding tensions over linguistic, cultural and economic differences echo those along the U.S.-Mexico border, where states have to deal with a constant flow of legal and illegal immigrants seeking opportunity. In Russia the concern is heightened by the stark contrast between China's enormous population and Russia's steep demographic decline.

The differences are most palpable in Russia's Far East, a vast region bordering on China that has more than a third of Russia's territory but just 5% of its population -- seven million people. Across the border are China's three northeastern provinces -- Heilongjian, Jilin and Liaoning -- with a combined population of more than 100 million.

Inevitably, tens of thousands of Chinese migrants are already crossing over to fill the void, some of them settling down and acquiring Russian citizenship. According to the official count, there are about 250,000 Chinese living in Russia. Some Russian academics say they could become the predominant ethnic group in the Far East and eastern Siberia by the year 2025.

Visiting Blagoveshchensk in 2000, President Vladimir Putin warned that if the authorities failed to develop the region, "even the indigenous Russian population will mainly be speaking Japanese, Korean and Chinese in a few decades."

Yet in the countryside and Russia's provincial capitals, the Chinese are often seen quite differently -- as a potential lifeline for an economy desperately in need of extra hands.

One such capital is Yekaterinburg, a big industrial center about 50 miles south of Ayatskoye. Agriculture in the surrounding region has long been in crisis: The rural population collapsed in the 1990s as newly privatized collective farms went bust and men drifted away to find jobs on city construction sites and the oil rigs of Siberia.

Now, says the regional agriculture minister, Sergei Chemezov, one in four farms is bankrupt and more than 10% of arable land -- about 400,000 acres -- is uncultivated. The Yekaterinburg region now has to import 20% of its grain.

"When you fly over China, you can see every inch is farmed," Mr. Chemezov said in an interview in his office, which is decorated with miniature sheaves of corn and a huge stuffed owl. "Then you cross the border and on the Russian side it's just vast emptiness. Terribly sad!"

He sees the solution in imported Chinese labor. Last summer, Mr. Chemezov announced plans to grant millions of acres of land on 49-year leases to any Chinese workers willing to farm it. He has no takers yet, but the Chinese have already installed an agricultural attache at their consulate in Yekaterinburg to help bring Chinese labor to local farms.

The inspiration, says Mr. Chemezov, came from Ayatskoye.

Mr. Shiryaev, the farm's 53-year-old owner, was born in Ayatskoye, when it was a big Soviet collective farm. He recalls a childhood playing soccer, driving tractors and making hay in the sunshine. Communist subsidies for rural areas delivered abundant machinery and fertilizer, free school meals, and teachers from Moscow and St. Petersburg.

The idyll collapsed in 1992, when the farm was privatized and the subsidies evaporated. Ayatskoye's new managers sold off tractors for parts. Peasants slaughtered their cows for food. With no money to buy fuel for planting or harvesting, most of the farm's 10,000 acres of arable land fell out of use. Wages weren't paid, and most of the male population left. "The only people left there now are old women and drunkards," says Mr. Shiryaev.

He moved to Yekaterinburg, where he trained in law, worked as a judge, and established a flourishing legal practice. In 2000, Ayatskoye's managers turned to him in desperation. The farm was virtually bankrupt, they said. Mr. Shiryaev, whose elderly mother still lives there, paid about $25,000 for a controlling stake and set about trying to turn things around.

Finding anyone to run Ayatskoye was hard. He went through four managers in six years. But the lack of manpower was the biggest problem. Of 32 workers, only 15 regularly turned up for work. Many of the rest went off on drunken binges that could last a whole week, he says. Getting the harvest in safely was a heroic achievement. Mr. Shiryaev said he has lent Ayatskoye $100,000 a year since taking it over. Most of the money remains unpaid.

Finding a Solution

Mr. Shiryaev finally found a solution last March. It came from Tagansky Ryad, a huge clothing market in Yekaterinburg that is the hub of the city's Chinatown. There, some 30,000 Chinese traders live and work, many out of primitive metal shipping containers, eating at the Peking Cafe and gambling at the neon-lit Shanghai Casino.

He was approached by Meng Dani, who was at the time selling cheap Chinese coats in Tagansky Ryad. She and some of her fellow traders wanted to branch out into agriculture, knowing they could sell their produce in the market. Mr. Shiryaev says he was immediately interested, because he "knew how hard Chinese people work." So he offered to let them rent 50 acres of land for a nominal fee. They agreed and shortly afterward, 14 of them moved to Ayatskoye.

It was a hard year. The summer was cold and the harvest smaller than they bargained for. None of the workers had any agricultural training and they made a string of missteps, such as trying to grow eggplants -- unsuitable for the harsh Urals climate.

But before long they were growing tomatoes, cabbages and beetroot on the plot and selling it at the local market. Villagers came over to buy their tomatoes. "They were really good, really juicy," says Tatyana Byzova, a technician at the local school. "I don't understand how they managed to grow them without greenhouses."

They plowed their profits back into the farm, buying a second-hand tractor. Mr. Shiryaev gave them wood to build a house to replace their makeshift shacks. Next year he has promised to lease them another 50 acres, and in 2008 another 50.

Mr. Shiryaev hoped their zeal would inspire the locals. So far, it hasn't. "Our people are not prepared to work with their bare hands, with hoes and shovels, 12 to 14 hours a day the way they do," he says. Most prefer, he said, "to find release in the daily festival of vodka."

Some of the locals object to that characterization. "We're not all lazy here," says Lyubov Rubtsova, a worker in the village clubhouse. "I'd also work hard if I was paid a decent wage."

The Chinese workers' reputation has spread. Area farms and poultry factories, all with their own labor shortage, call almost daily, asking Meng Dani and her team to help out loading trucks and driving tractors. Ms. Meng -- whom the Russians call Tanya -- usually says they're too busy with their own work.

On a sunny day in October, Mr. Shiryaev drove in his silver Toyota Land Cruiser to see the new tenants, who live at the end of an unpaved, potholed road on the fringes of the village, beyond the garbage dump. The men -- all from Jilin in northeastern China -- were welding scrap metal into stoves for greenhouses that the farm recently added, while Ms. Meng stacked Chinese cabbage on the back of a truck.

It had been a frustrating day. She spent most of it trying to find a driver to take her produce to market. "The Russians drink a lot," said Ms. Meng, 33 years old. "They don't want to work." Relations with locals were mostly cordial, she said, although "their cows keep coming over and eating our cabbages."

Mr. Shiryaev chatted with "Tanya" about her plans for the spring. The ranks of new greenhouses spread out to the horizon, alternating with neat rows of cabbages. Mr. Shiryaev looked beyond the patch of land of the Chinese farm, toward long-abandoned fields that are gradually being reclaimed by nature: Weeds, wild fir and pine now stand where wheat once grew. "That land will probably never be farmed again," he sighed.

Mr. Shiryaev got back into his Land Cruiser and drove off to see his mother, Tatyana, a 75-year-old pensioner. Ms. Shiryaeva, who lives in a crumbling workers' apartment block from the 1970s with no indoor plumbing, served a meal of pickled cucumbers, tomatoes and mushrooms and bowls of Siberian dumplings.

After a couple of shots of vodka, she vented her opinion on the Chinese workers her son has brought to Ayatskoye. "They'll make themselves at home and then start lording it over us," she said. "We'll be under their thumb."

Ms. Shiryaeva, a stout, toothless woman in a flower-patterned dress, was also suspicious of the newcomers' farming methods. "They use too much fertilizer," she said. "How else can they get their tomatoes that red?"

Mr. Shiryaev, too, is mindful of the risks of bringing Chinese people to this faraway spot with its villages gradually emptying out of Russians. "If they begin to dominate, this place won't be Russia anymore," he said.

Back in the Chinese colony, Ms. Meng sat in her chilly hut, decorated only with a map of Russia -- in Chinese. To her, Russia is a vast country with a lot of empty territory: If no one else is farming it, why shouldn't she? "I feel so sorry for the land," she said. "There's so much of it, and so little of it is used." Back in her hometown, Hailar, in Inner Mongolia, there's "little land, a lot of people, and no work."

Al-Jazeera Aims For No 'accent' In English (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, November 14, 2006

Al-Jazeera, the Arab news network the Bush administration says is a tool of al-Qaeda, will launch Wednesday its English version, which will be available in 70 million households worldwide.

Al-Jazeera International will broadcast from Doha, Qatar, and from bureaus in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia; London; and Washington, D.C. Cable and satellite distribution deals are expected to be announced today.

Programs will include talk and feature shows and several daily newscasts featuring live reports from the four regions with "different cultural views of the day's events," says Will Stebbins, AJI's Washington bureau chief.

"There's an appetite for international news that doesn't come from a specific national perspective," he says. "We're not going to have any accent."

DOJ_NMG_0094007

Dave Marash, a former ABC Nightline correspondent who'll co-anchor a daily newscast, says Al-Jazeera got a black eye from the Bush administration for airing Osama bin Laden videotapes and live reports from Fallujah, Iraq.

Al-Jazeera reported news in both cases, he says, and its journalistic "aspirations, tactics and techniques" are like those of any mainstream news outlet. "No holds barred, political ideology, party affiliation. When people actually see the product, I think a lot of that (criticism) is going to go away."

The White House issued a tepid welcome. "A free press has the responsibility to report news responsibly and accurately, and we work with all outlets that do so," spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

In the USA, most cable firms have refused to give AJI channel space, which means, for now, AJI will primarily be available at English.aljazeera.net.

That will limit Al-Jazeera's reach, says Tom Rosenstiel of the Project for Excellence in Journalism. The Web "is the technology of the future, but it remains to be seen what kind of impact that can have as a platform for a largely TV-driven product."

Mr. Putin's Legacy (NYT)

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

The Russian Constitution limits a president to two terms, which would mean a natural conclusion to Vladimir Putin's presidency in 2008, and so far, Mr. Putin says he will abide by the legal limit. But there are growing calls — spontaneous or orchestrated by the Kremlin — to change the Constitution.

Given his sway over the Russian Parliament, Mr. Putin would have no trouble warping the Constitution. It would be a tragic mistake. History will judge him by how well he helps Russia move from its totalitarian past to a democratic future. His record is not encouraging.

Mr. Putin likes to boast about Russia's economy, which will grow — thanks to high oil prices — at 6.6 percent this year. Russia has paid off almost all of its Soviet debt, and life is improving. All of this has made Mr. Putin very popular with Russians. But many of them seem unconcerned about their declining freedoms. The government has muscled out independent news media and jailed political rivals, and never stops trying to muffle groups that do not follow the Kremlin line.

At his latest three-hour town meeting, Mr. Putin was lionized. Arkady Kokayev, a truck driver, phoned in to ask, "What will happen to us and this country after you leave?" Mr. Putin assured him that all would be well, and that while he would respect the Constitution, he would still "influence the life in our country" after leaving office.

That is an admirable pledge. We hope for the sake of Russia's democracy that he will keep it.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US: Immigrants May Be Held Indefinitely (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0094011

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

Immigrants arrested in the United States may be held indefinitely on suspicion of terrorism and may not challenge their imprisonment in civilian courts, the Bush administration said Monday, opening a new legal front in the fight over the rights of detainees.

In court documents filed with the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., the Justice Department said a new anti-terrorism law being used to hold detainees in Guantanamo Bay also applies to foreigners captured and held in the United States.

Ali Saleh Kahlah Al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar, was arrested in 2001 while studying in the United States. He has been labeled an "enemy combatant," a designation that, under a law signed last month, strips foreigners of the right to challenge their detention in federal courts.

That law is being used to argue the Guantanamo Bay cases, but Al-Marri represents the first detainee inside the United States to come under the new law. Aliens normally have the right to contest their imprisonment, such as when they are arrested on immigration violations or for other crimes.

"It's pretty stunning that any alien living in the United States can be denied this right," said Jonathan Hafetz, an attorney for Al-Marri. "It means any non-citizen, and there are millions of them, can be whisked off at night and be put in detention."

The new law says that enemy combatants will be tried before military commissions, not a civilian judge or jury, and establishes different rules of evidence in the cases. It also prohibits detainees from challenging their detention in civilian court.

In a separate court filing in Washington on Monday, the Justice Department defended that law as constitutional and necessary.

Government attorneys said foreign fighters arrested as part of an overseas military action have no constitutional rights and are being afforded more legal rights than ever.

In its short filing in the Al-Marri case, however, the Justice Department doesn't mention that Al-Marri is being held at a military prison in South Carolina — a fact that his attorneys say affords him the same rights as anyone else being held in the United States.

The Justice Department noted only that the new law applies to all enemy combatants "regardless of the location of the detention."

The Bush administration maintains that al-Marri is an al-Qaida sleeper agent. The Defense Department ordered a review of Al-Marri's status as an enemy combatant be conducted if, as requested, the case is thrown out of court.

Justice Department Wants Guantanamo Cases Dismissed (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, November 14, 2006

MIAMI - The Bush administration Monday defended a new law that strips enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay of recourse to traditional civilian court challenge, setting the stage for a U.S. Supreme Court showdown.

In a brief, the Justice Department argued at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit that the U.S. district courts must close the files of several hundred habeas corpus petitions because the new Military Commissions Act eliminated their jurisdiction.

Attorneys for many of the 440 or so captives, some approaching five years held without charge at the remote U.S. Navy base in Cuba, argue the law is at odds with a fundamental, constitutional right to file a writ of habeas corpus - their right to challenge their detention before a civilian judge.

Once the three-court appeals panel rules, both sides anticipate an overarching constitutional challenge of the new federal law to go before the Supreme Court, which earlier backed certain detainee rights in a series of rulings.

The brief signed by Solicitor General Paul Clement argues that Congress "unambiguously" stripped the U.S. district court of that right in the new legislation, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17.

"Because there can be no question that Congress has eliminated district court jurisdiction," Clement writes, "petitioners are left to argue that the Act is unconstitutional. These arguments are without merit."

Rather than have traditional review, he adds, Congress gave the circuit appeals court - the same venue deciding the constitutionality of the law - the power to review an enemy combatant's classification.

In that review, a captive cannot argue that he is being held illegally and indefinitely, but can challenge his designation as enemy combatant.

Moreover, the U.S. government added, the Pentagon has established its own annual review process at Guantanamo, a parole-like board of military officers, where any captive can argue why he should be set free.

DOJ_NMG_0094012

For about two years now, defense attorneys for the men have sought case-by-case independent reviews, arguing that the military requires civilian oversight.

Federal judges, however, have been reluctant to intrude.

In one instance, U.S. District Judge James Robertson found that two Uighur Muslims of Chinese citizenship were unlawfully held in indefinite detention at the Guantanamo facility, but said he did not know how he could offer relief.

Some time afterward, the Pentagon arranged to airlift them and three other Uigurs to faraway Albania for resettlement.

U.S. policy prevented their repatriation, for fear they would be subjected to religious persecution, as Muslims, in their communist-ruled country.

The showdown over the Military Commissions Act is currently being played out in a pair of cases named for two of the current detainees at Guantanamo - Fawzi al-Odeh, a Kuwaiti, and Lakhdar Boumediene, an Algerian - who had separately filed suits in the lower court over their right to habeas corpus.

Envoy: Islamic Extremists Seek Weapons (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, November 14, 2006

Islamic extremists, including members of al-Qaida, have tried to acquire chemical or radiological weapons to use in attacks against Britain and other Western targets, a senior British diplomat said Monday.

The warning followed an acknowledgment last week by Britain's domestic spy chief, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, that authorities are tracking almost 30 terrorist plots involving 1,600 people.

Britain's Foreign Office has evidence of efforts by the terror groups to purchase chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear materials for use in attacks, the diplomat said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of his work.

Dhiren Barot, the British Muslim convert who was sentenced to life in prison last week for plotting to attack U.S. financial landmarks and London hotels, had drawn up plans to build and detonate a so-called dirty bomb, which combines radioactive materials with conventional explosives, prosecutors said.

"We know the aspiration is there, we know the efforts to get the materials are there, we know the efforts to get the technology are there," the senior diplomat said.

The diplomat acknowledged that an attack with chemical or radiological weapons would most likely be mounted with crude technology and cause mass panic rather than mass casualties.

Britain's Foreign Office is concerned over the potential access terrorists could have to substances with legitimate uses that could also be used to create weapons and biological agents like smallpox or anthrax, the official said.

Manningham-Buller, head of the British domestic spy agency MI5, said last week that her agency is monitoring 200 cells actively engaged in plotting or aiding attacks in Britain and abroad.

She said agents had foiled five major plots since the July 2005 transit bomb attacks in London, which killed 52 commuters and the four bombers.

The Foreign Office official said hundreds of British Muslims were making terrorism-related trips between Britain and Pakistan each year.

Britons with family ties to Pakistan and Pakistani nationals who have no previous links to Britain were moving easily between the two countries to plan and raise funds for plots, the official said.

Though the majority of the hundreds traveling on terrorism-related trips relay messages, raise funds or pass on information and practical skills — dozens also attend terrorist training camps in Pakistan, the diplomat said.

Three of the July bombers visited Pakistan before the London attacks, but Pakistani officials have consistently denied claims the plot was directed from inside its borders.

CIA Acknowledges 2 Interrogation Memos (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

After years of denials, the CIA has formally acknowledged the existence of two classified documents governing aggressive interrogation and detention policies for terrorism suspects, according to the American Civil Liberties Union.

But CIA lawyers say the documents -- memos from President Bush and the Justice Department -- are still so sensitive that no portion can be released to the public.

The disclosures by the CIA general counsel's office came in a letter Friday to attorneys for the ACLU. The group had filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in New York two years ago under the Freedom of Information Act, seeking records related to U.S. interrogation and detention policies.

DOJ_NMG_0094013

The lawsuit has resulted in the release of more than 100,000 pages of documents, including some that revealed internal debates over the policies governing prisoners held at the military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Many other records have not been released and, in some cases, their existence has been revealed only in media reports.

Friday's letter from John L. McPherson, the CIA's associate general counsel, lists two documents that pertain to the ACLU's records request.

The ACLU describes the first as a "directive" signed by Bush governing CIA interrogation methods or allowing the agency to set up detention facilities outside the United States. McPherson describes it as a "memorandum." In September, Bush confirmed the existence of secret CIA prisons and transferred 14 remaining terrorism suspects from them to Guantanamo Bay.

The second document is an August 2002 legal memo from the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel to the CIA general counsel. The ACLU describes it as "specifying interrogation methods that the CIA may use against top al-Qaeda members." (This document is separate from another widely publicized Justice memo, also issued in August 2002, that narrowed the definition of torture. The Justice Department has since rescinded the latter.)

The ACLU relied on media reports to identify and describe the two documents, but the CIA and other agencies had not previously confirmed their existence. McPherson wrote that neither document can be released to the public for reasons of security and attorney-client privilege.

"The documents are withheld in their entirety because there is no meaningful non-exempt information that can be reasonably segregated from the exempt information," McPherson wrote. A spokesman for the CIA declined to comment yesterday.

Amrit Singh, one of the ACLU's attorneys on the case, said the disclosures may make it easier for the group to argue in favor of releasing the documents.

"For more than three years, they've refused to even confirm or deny the existence of these records," Singh said, referring to the group's initial document request in October 2003. "The fact that they're now choosing to do so confirms that their position was unjustified from the start. . . . Now we can begin to actually litigate the release of these documents."

Levin Vows To Probe 'abuse' Of Renditions (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, November 14, 2006

Carl Levin, the incoming chairman of the Senate armed services committee, on Monday pledged to scrutinise the Central Intelligence Agency renditions programme.

The Bush administration this year revealed that the US had transferred 14 high-value al-Qaeda suspects from secret CIA prisons to Guantánamo Bay. But officials have been unwilling to discuss the fate of dozens of other detainees who were rounded up around the world for interrogation.

While Congress has enacted legislation aimed at preventing abuses of detainees, there has been relatively little public scrutiny of the renditions system itself.

Asked whether he would investigate the renditions programme, including the secret prisons and missing detainees, Mr Levin replied: "Yes. Yes, yes and yes."

"I'm not comfortable with the system," he said. "I think that there's been some significant abuses which have not made us more secure but have made us less secure and have also, perhaps, cost us some real allies, as well as not producing useful information. So I think the system needs a thorough review."

In addition to examining US policy on Iraq, Mr Levin said it was important to reassess the situation in Afghanistan, including asking whether the US's allies in Nato were hampered by restrictive rules of engagement.. "We need to review the progress being made in Afghanistan, including whether our Nato allies are asserting too many limits on the use of their forces."

The Pentagon has long complained that European Nato members are hampered in Afghanistan by restrictions on rules of engagement with Taliban and other hostile forces. Poland recently announced its intention to send a caveat-free contingent of 1,000 soldiers. European countries are coming under greater pressure in the lead up to the Nato Riga summit this month.

The US has been pressing its Nato allies to do more to tackle the insurgency in the south of Afghanistan, as have the UK, Canada and the Netherlands, the countries taking the lead in Nato's operations in the south.

Asked about the nomination of Robert Gates, the former CIA director, to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary, Mr Levin said he wanted to examine allegations by George Schultz, former secretary of state, that Mr Gates had manipulated intelligence at the CIA to suit policy goals.

"We had enough manipulating intelligence, shaping intelligence in order to give the policymakers what they wanted to hear," said Mr Levin. "And we've got to make sure that if in fact there's any truth to what secretary Shultz said that Mr Gates did, that that is not going to happen again."

Justice Department Argues For Tougher Sentence For Ressam (SEATIMES)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, November 14, 2006

The judge who sentenced Ahmed Ressam to 22 years in prison should be ordered to impose a stiffer sentence on the man who planned to blow up holiday travelers at Los Angeles International Airport, a Justice Department lawyer argued Monday.

U.S. Attorney John McKay, in the unusual appeal, said U.S. District Judge John Coughenour had abused his discretion, failed to justify the sentence and misused Ressam's sentencing to criticize U.S. policy about having terrorism suspects held indefinitely or tried before secretive military tribunals.

"These are reversible errors," McKay told a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals convened in Seattle. If the sentence stands, Ressam "will be released in 15 years, leaving him, if he chooses, to rejoin his al-Qaida comrades when he is 54 years old," McKay said.

Ressam's attorney, Federal Public Defender Thomas Hillier, when questioned by Judge Pamela Ann Rymer, agreed that Coughenour needs to justify the length of the 22-year sentence to comply with case law and sentencing guidelines.

"We can't tell why he picked that number," Rymer said.

It will be many months before the case is decided. The U.S. Supreme Court last week agreed to hear two cases, about sentencing discretion, that may affect the circuit court's decision.

Ressam was arrested Dec. 14, 1999, in Port Angeles as he drove off a ferry from Victoria, B.C., in a rental car packed with explosives. The Algerian refugee later admitted he had been recruited by al-Qaida and trained at Osama bin Laden's terrorism camps in Afghanistan.

He was convicted in April 2001 of nine federal felonies, including conspiracy to commit an act of international terrorism. A month later, he began to cooperate with law enforcement.

Ressam identified at least 130 members of terrorism cells, testified in two terrorism trials and cooperated with the governments of Canada, England, France, Germany and Italy.

At one point, both prosecutors and the defense said that Ressam's sentence should be considerably lighter because of his help, and agreed to a 27-year sentence. However, Ressam's cooperation faltered in 2003 and ended by 2005. His lawyers and a government psychiatrist concluded that years in solitary confinement and repeated interrogations caused him to suffer a mental breakdown.

Last year, prosecutors argued for a 35-year sentence, saying it accounted for his cooperation but also for his failing to live up to his agreement.

Prosecutors said they had to dismiss indictments against two alleged terrorists whose cases were built on Ressam's testimony: Abu Doha, a British citizen reported to be an al-Qaida recruiter, and Samir Ait Mohamed, a Canadian who allegedly had planned to detonate a gas truck in a Jewish neighborhood in Montreal.

Defense attorneys argued for a 12 ½-year sentence, saying Ressam's information had been nearly invaluable.

When he sentenced Ressam, Coughenour ripped the Bush administration for holding suspected terrorists without trial or trying them before secret tribunals.

"I would like to convey the message that our system works," Coughenour said of the Ressam case. "We did not need to use a secret military tribunal or detain the defendant indefinitely as an enemy combatant, or deny him the right to counsel."

The judge's remarks and the 22-year sentence infuriated some prosecutors and law-enforcement officials.

At Monday's hearing, McKay argued that the appellate court should send a message back to Coughenour: that his statements were out of line.

Ressam's lawyers also asked the appeals court to reverse one of Ressam's five explosives-related convictions. That conviction, for possessing explosives while committing another felony, resulted in a mandatory 10-year sentence.

Ex-N.Y. Times Journalist Tells Of Visiting Interrogation Center (NSDY/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 14, 2006

CHICAGO -- Former New York Times journalist Judith Miller testified Monday that she saw no evidence that a grocer charged with providing money and recruits to Palestinian terrorists had been tortured when she secretly witnessed his interrogation by the Israelis in 1993.

"He was boasting. He was jaunty. There was no reason to believe that he had been subjected to that kind of treatment," Miller, who was the Times' Cairo bureau chief at the time, testified for the prosecution at Muhammad Salah's trial.

DOJ_NMG_0094015

Salah, 53, and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, are charged in a federal racketeering indictment with providing money and fresh recruits to Hamas in its campaign to topple the Israeli government.

The two men say they merely tried to help impoverished Palestinians suffering under the Israeli army's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. They deny that they are Hamas members or support terrorism.

Salah was arrested in Israel in 1993 and served 4 1/2 years in Israeli prisons before his release and return to Chicago.

He claims that he was deprived of sleep, hooded and forced to sit in a tiny chair with his hands cuffed behind his back before he made a series of statements to agents of the Israeli security agency Shin Bet.

Shin Bet interrogators using aliases and testifying before a courtroom cleared of spectators have said that Salah's statements were voluntary.

Miller served 85 days in jail for civil contempt after refusing to testify before a federal grand jury in Washington's CIA leak investigation. She resigned from the Times in 2005 amid questions about whether she was insufficiently skeptical in her reporting about the possibility that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

Miller testified that she flew to Israel in 1993 after reading about Salah's arrest and contacted aides to Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, whom she described as a longtime friend.

Through Rabin and Shin Bet chief Yakov Perry, she was invited to visit the West Bank interrogation center in Ramallah provided that she would not reveal in any article she wrote that she had been there and seen Salah questioned.

She said she agreed to that condition after checking with an editor. On cross-examination, she was asked which editor had approved the visit.

"I don't recall. We had a lot of editors, sir," she said.

She also said that she could not remember whether she was allowed to use a tape recorder while watching the interrogation session on television from an adjacent room. She continued to say she could not remember after being reminded of a 1998 radio interview in which she said she had used a tape recorder.

Miller said she was taken to the interrogation center because the Israelis wanted her to write about Salah. He allegedly had already confessed that money to finance Hamas was coming out of the United States, and Israeli officials wanted to draw Americans' attention to that.

She said she was initially skeptical and believed that Salah might have been tortured into making such statements. She said she was willing to write a story only after seeing him under Israeli interrogation.

Defense attorneys repeatedly tried to portray her as biased in favor of Israel.

"Have you ever been used as a Mossad asset?" asked Salah attorney Michael Deutsch, referring to the Israeli intelligence service.

Miller said no.

Ex-NY Times Reporter Testifies At Terror Funding Trial (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, November 14, 2006

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified Monday that a Bridgeview man accused of helping to fund Hamas showed no signs of being mistreated during an interview with an Israeli agent she witnessed in 1993, even quibbling during the session about how his coffee had been prepared.

Lawyers for Muhammad Salah have argued that Salah was tortured into making a confession while being held by Israeli agents. But Miller told a federal jury in the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse that when she saw Salah, he was relaxed and "jaunty."

Miller, who was allowed to watch the interview on a video monitor in a separate room, said she stared at Salah for several minutes. "I was looking at him closely because I had been concerned that he might have been tortured."

Miller's appearance Monday was a rare example of a high-profile journalist testifying at a federal criminal trial. Lawyers for Salah and co-defendant, Abdelhaleem Ashqar, questioned her credibility given the controversies surrounding her reporting on the war in Iraq, among other things.

They asked about her reporting on supposed weapons of mass destruction in Iraq before the war and her decision not to answer a subpoena in the CIA leak case involving the identity of operative Valerie Plame.

Miller, a former Middle East correspondent and Cairo bureau chief of The New York Times, said she was only allowed to see Salah after making arrangements with ranking Israeli officials she knew, including Yitzhak Rabin, then Israel's prime minister.

Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch, asked Miller whether her job was to cultivate special access through high government officials, and whether she would then print the stories they wanted to see. As an example, he pointed to her stories in 2003 that said there were definitely weapons of mass destruction found in Iraq, which has since been disproven.

"I don't think I used the word 'definitely,'" said Miller, who denied she had made any deals to slant her writing on Salah.

DOJ_NMG_0094016

Deutsch asked whether it is true that Miller is no longer at The New York Times because she had reported information fed to her by U.S. government officials in the run-up to the Iraq war.

"No, sir, that is not why I left The New York Times," said Miller, who left the paper a year ago after 28 years.

Defense lawyers also asked about the 85 days Miller spent in jail last year, which she said she chose to serve in order to protect a confidential source involved in the Plame case. She eventually did appear before a grand jury after her source—vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who has since been indicted on charges of obstruction of justice—gave her clearance.

"You wouldn't be just protecting your sources here, would you?" asked Ashqar's attorney, William Moffitt.

"Every source that was important to the Salah story was disclosed" either in her articles or in a 1996 book she wrote about the Middle East, Miller said.

Deutsch asked Miller if U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald—who also led the Plame investigation—made an agreement with Miller that if she testified for the government in the Salah case, he would not indict her for perjury in the Plame matter.

"He did not," Miller answered.

Lawyers on both sides of the case spent much of Miller's time on the stand asking her how she came to see Salah in Israeli custody on Feb. 11, 1993, and what she observed.

She said she watched an Israeli agent known as "Nadav" begin talking to Salah, who seemed very calm. At one point she heard Salah discuss the coffee he had been given.

"He complained that he usually took it this way, and Nadav had forgotten to bring something," she said. Nadav began to ask about Salah's Hamas activities, and Salah seemed to speak freely about his involvement, she said.

"I was struck by the fact that he seemed very comfortable talking about it," she said. He was boasting and jaunty, Miller said. "He was almost goading [Nadav] about how Hamas was getting the better of the Israelis. "He said, 'You shut Hamas down three or four times a year, and every time we regroup,'" she said.

"'You're actually teaching us how to do our jobs better,'" Miller said Salah told the agent

The defense lawyers asked whether her access to Salah could have been engineered to influence the U.S. into taking seriously Israeli claims that Hamas had operations inside America. Miller said she did not believe she was the target of a propaganda effort, though she said she agreed governments do try to use newspapers.

"It is my experience that everyone tries to spin," she said.

Musician Waived Rights After Terror Arrest, FBI Agent Says In NY (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 14, 2006

NEW YORK -- An FBI agent testified Monday that a jazz musician and martial arts expert looked as though "he'd been caught with his hand in the cookie jar" when he heard his voice on government audio tapes in a terrorism case.

U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska used the testimony by the agent, Brian Murphy, as a basis to reject defense arguments that Tarik Shah never waived his rights before making statements and briefly cooperating with the government after his May 2005 arrest.

"Mr. Shah knowingly and voluntarily waived his rights," the judge said after a two-hour hearing.

Shah and three others _ a Florida doctor, a Washington, D.C., cab driver and a Brooklyn bookstore owner _ are scheduled to stand trial in late spring on charges that they offered their skills to help terrorist organizations. All have pleaded not guilty.

Shah was accused of providing material support to terrorists by conspiring in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan.

Murphy said he played audio tapes of Shah and others discussing their plans after Shah asked him why he was being arrested. The agent said Shah looked down and sat back in his chair.

"He looked like he'd been caught with his hand in the cookie jar," Murphy said. "He said, `What do you want with me?'"

Shah's lawyer, Josh Dratel, said statements and other evidence obtained after his arrest should be suppressed because he never signed a waiver of his rights, including the right to remain silent and to speak with an attorney.

Murphy, though, testified that Shah waived his rights orally and followed up the words with actions, including going to Baltimore, where FBI agents had arranged for him to have a taped telephone conversation with another target of the investigation.

Murphy said Shah was completely relaxed and skillful at eliciting information, delivering on a promise he had made before he went into a Baltimore hotel room to help the government.

"I will do it my way. Don't worry. You'll be impressed with the results," Murphy recalled Shah telling him.

Later, Shah met with prosecutors to offer information in a bid to cooperate further, prosecutors say.

Prosecutors Deny Padilla Torture Claims (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

MIAMI — Federal prosecutors on Monday denied claims by suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla that he was tortured during his 3 1/2 years in military custody as an enemy combatant.

In papers filed in federal court, prosecutors said Padilla provided no evidence to back up his claims and urged that the case against him not be dismissed based on his allegations. They insisted that Padilla was treated humanely while in a Navy brig in South Carolina.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security," the government said in its filing. "His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner."

That included halal food, some outdoor exercise and medical attention when necessary. Prosecutors said Padilla never made any abuse claims while in military custody.

"Padilla's allegations of torture have no merit whatsoever," prosecutors said.

Padilla's lawyers last month asked a federal judge to dismiss the terror support charges against him based on their allegations that he suffered from "outrageous government conduct" while in military custody for more than 1,300 days. They claimed Padilla's interrogators threatened to execute him, and forced him to wear a hood and stand in stress positions for long periods of time.

Padilla's attorneys also said he believed he may have been given LSD or PCP as a "truth serum," and that he was forced to endure extreme heat and cold, bright lights or total darkness, noxious fumes and sleep deprivation.

Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush in June 2002, shortly after he was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. U.S. authorities initially claimed he was on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a U.S. city.

He was transferred to civilian custody in January to face federal terrorism support charges along with two others in Miami. Trial on those charges, which do not mention the "dirty bomb" allegations, is scheduled to begin Jan. 22.

U.S.Lawyers Deny Padilla Was Tortured (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors are denying an alleged Al Qaeda operative's claims that he was tortured during the more than three years he spent in a Navy brig.

"The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture, allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence," lawyers pursuing a criminal terrorism case against Padilla wrote in papers filed in federal court in Miami yesterday.

The prosecution did not address directly one of Padilla's most inflammatory claims, namely that a military team forcibly drugged him with "a sort of truth serum," possibly LSD or PCP.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security. His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner, including Halal (Muslim acceptable) food, clothing, sleep, and daily medical assessment and treatment when necessary," prosecutors wrote. "While in the brig, Padilla never reported any abusive treatment to the staff or medical personnel."

Padilla's defense team has asked a judge to throw out the case on the grounds of outrageous government conduct. Defense attorneys asserted that the Brooklyn native was threatened with execution and with being cut and having alcohol poured onto his wounds.

Prosecutors argued that even if Padilla was abused by the military, such abuse would not have an impact on the criminal case because the military and the prosecution teams are distinct.

A jailhouse convert to Islam, Padilla was arrested in Chicago in 2002 on a material witness warrant related to suspicions that he was plotting an attack involving a radioactive bomb. President Bush later designated Padilla as an enemy combatant and ordered him held without charge by the military. One federal appeals court rejected the unusual tactic, but another upheld it. Padilla was indicted last year on charges that prosecutors said were not related to the alleged dirty bomb plot.

In their new filing, prosecutors suggested that Padilla pursue a civil suit for damages if he believes he was tortured by the military.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

California Man Accused Of Mailing Threatening Letters To US Politicians, Celebrities (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A man was arrested and accused of mailing threatening letters laced with white powder to Congresswoman Nancy Pelosi, TV talk show host David Letterman and other high-profile figures, the FBI announced.

FBI agents took Chad Conrad Castagana, 39, into custody Saturday on charges of conveying false information and sending threats via the U.S. mail, the bureau said in a statement Sunday.

Castagana, of Los Angeles, was being held in a federal detention center pending an initial court appearance Monday, when prosecutors were expected to file charges.

Castagana could not be reached for comment; there was no phone listing for him and it was unclear whether he had retained a lawyer.

Authorities claim he mailed threatening letters to House speaker-in-waiting Pelosi, Letterman, New York Senator Charles Schumer, Jon Stewart of Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" and MSNBC host Keith Olbermann.

Some letters included phrases like "Death to Demagogues" and pictures of victims of the 2004 Asian tsunami, authorities said.

While the FBI is still trying to identify the white powder, preliminary tests revealed it does not pose a biological hazard.

The letters were sent with fictitious return addresses over the past three months to addresses in New York, New Jersey and San Francisco, officials said.

Authorities said they watched Castagana, who is unemployed, walk from his home to a public mailbox Thursday and deposit several letters. One was allegedly addressed to someone previously targeted and contained the white powder, the FBI said.

Anthrax Hoaxer Arrested (RC)

By John Mcardle And Paul Kane

Roll Call, November 14, 2006

The Justice Department on Monday began formally prosecuting the alleged perpetrator of a wave of threatening letters with suspicious, but ultimately harmless, powders that were sent to likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and a host of liberal-leaning media figures.

Chad Castagana, 39, appeared in a Los Angeles federal district court to face charges of sending threats via U.S. Mail after federal investigators linked him to 17 letters sent over a roughly two-month span that contained threatening statements and various amounts of baking soda, Ajax, laundry detergent and other white powders that could have been mistaken for anthrax.

Though none of the letters was sent to Capitol Hill, the incident once again has put a focus on Congressional mail screening procedures five years after letters containing anthrax were sent to two Senate offices, leading to the deaths of five people and temporarily shutting down the Capitol complex.

Castagana was arrested Saturday at his home in San Fernando Valley, Calif., and subsequently admitted to FBI investigators that he mailed the threatening letters to Pelosi's district office, Schumer's state office, and the homes and workplaces of Comedy Central star Jon Stewart, MSNBC anchorman Keith Olbermann, late-night talk show host David Letterman and Viacom Inc. President Sumner Redstone, according to court filings released Monday.

"Castagana described himself as a compulsive voter who votes Republican, and said that he sent the letters to specific individuals because he did not like their liberal politics," an FBI affidavit states.

Despite the timing of Castagana's letters coming near the anniversary of the Hill anthrax attacks, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said investigators have "no inkling whatsoever that it is related in any way, shape or form" to the October 2001 attacks.

Castagana's arrest comes as at least one more separate case of threatening hoax letters sent to former President Bill Clinton and Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) remains unsolved. On Oct. 23, in a previously unreported incident, Biden's office in Wilmington, Del., received a suspicious letter that had a powdery substance in it and a threatening letter, shuttering the incoming Senate Foreign Relations chairman's hometown office for hours as authorities investigated.

Wilmington Police confirmed that they responded to the call, along with a team from the local FBI office, and, after determining the substance was not dangerous, turned the case over to the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0094019

Four days later, on Oct. 27, Clinton's Harlem office housing his foundation was hit with a letter containing a white powdery substance and a letter that U.S. Secret Service officials described to The Associated Press as a "rambling diatribe."

The former president's office was closed down for several hours as hazardous materials response teams in yellow suits roamed about the office before giving an all-clear sign, according to sources familiar with the incident.

Biden and Clinton were not in their local offices when the suspicious packages were opened by junior staffers, aides said.

Authorities involved in the Castagana case said the Biden and Clinton letters were not part of their investigation, and a source familiar with those letters indicated that investigators' initial suspicions are that the Biden-Clinton letters are connected.

An aide at the Clinton Foundation referred all comment to the Secret Service office in New York, which is leading that investigation but did not return calls seeking comment.

The Castagana investigation is being handled by the Justice Department's Joint Terrorism Task Force, which currently includes a representative of the Capitol Police Department.

Castagana's hoax letters began just after Labor Day with the first batch of letters focusing on Stewart and Olbermann. The offices of Pelosi and Schumer were targeted with letters that came almost two weeks ago, just days before the midterm elections that presumably have thrust Pelosi into the Speakership and given Schumer, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, more prominence because of the Democratic takeover of the Senate.

A spokeswoman for Pelosi's office referred all questions regarding the case to the Capitol Police, and a spokesman for Schumer could not be reached for comment.

Alan Hoffman, Biden's chief of staff, said he has altered his office's policy dealing with mail that is sent to the two offices the Senator maintains in Delaware. Hoffman is now having all mail sent to his state offices first sent through irradiation procedures before coming into his staff's hands, a process that will delay mail delivery from constituents days or even weeks, but one Biden considers worth the wait given the most recent scare. "In retrospect, I wish I had done it sooner," Hoffman said.

Since the anthrax attacks on Capitol Hill five years ago, all mail sent to any Congressional office in the Capitol complex is routed through an irradiation process off-campus and then sent to Capitol Hill.

But Members of the House and Senate operate on an office-by-office policy in terms of handling mail sent to their state and district offices, with many opting to avoid the delays and skip the irradiation for letters and packages headed to those offices.

"There are mail screening procedures in place both on Capitol Hill and in district offices, but the committee is always looking for ways to improve the safety measures for both members and their staff particularly in light of this most recent incident," said House Administration Committee spokeswoman Salley Collins.

Senate Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Pickle was equally tight-lipped about mail screening procedures on the Senate side.

"The Senate has a very robust and aggressive mail screening process and we offer a screening service to state offices, but we do not talk about those protocols. We're always reviewing our processes and procedure," Pickle said.

The quick apprehension of Castagana came two months after the first threatening letter was meant to be sent to comedian Stewart — it actually went to a different Jon Stewart living on Manhattan's Upper West Side — standing in stark contrast to the now five-years-and-counting probe into the 2001 anthrax attacks.

As part of what was dubbed the "Amerithrax" investigation, thousands of FBI agents spanned the globe searching for the perpetrator or perpetrators of the attacks that left five people dead and dozens injured.

While FBI officials say the investigation is active and making progress, they have been at loggerheads with Congress over the probe and for almost three years have refused to brief any Member on the investigation because of alleged leaks from briefings on the Hill in 2003.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Warns Against Pullout (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush cautioned Monday against holding talks with Syria and Iran and beginning a withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, two key proposals gaining support at home and abroad.

But the president said he was open to "new ideas" on his administration's approach to Iraq after meeting with members of the Iraq Study Group, a panel weighing U.S. options there.

Bush's warnings against talks with Syria and Iran came as British Prime Minister Tony Blair called for a Middle East strategy that could involve a "new partnership" with Iran. The Iraq Study Group is also considering whether greater U.S. involvement with Iraq's neighbors could aid the American effort.

DOJ_NMG_0094020

Bush discussed Iran at a White House meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and told reporters afterward that any dealings were contingent on Tehran halting its uranium enrichment program.

"If the Iranians want to have a dialogue with us, we have shown them a way forward, and that is for them to verifiably suspend their enrichment activities," Bush said.

He cautioned against proposals for gradual or phased troop reductions in Iraq, which are gaining steam among Democrats, saying that no military option would work unless it recognized "conditions on the ground."

The developments came as the administration strained to chart a new direction for Iraq in response to a growing antiwar sentiment. Last week's midterm election, which analysts said showed a deep dissatisfaction with White House policies on the war, has increased the pressure.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice delayed a long-planned trip to Vietnam so she could meet at the White House with the Iraq Study Group. She also held planning sessions on the war with top-level State Department officials.

In Iraq, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, paid an unannounced visit to Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to press him on setting a timetable to take control of the nation's security.

Maliki, in turn, asked for greater authority to deploy Iraqi troops as he saw fit, said an Iraqi official who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions.

Abizaid and other top military commanders were among those being summoned to meet with members of Congress this week to answer questions on conditions in Iraq, where civil strife in Baghdad has continued despite a U.S.-led crackdown.

The Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), spent the day at the White House to begin a final round of interviews and meetings aimed at forging a new approach to Iraq.

The stakes are enormous. Administration and congressional officials are hoping the 10-member panel will come up with a plan that Republicans and Democrats can support. Iraq is riven by sectarian violence nearly four years after the U.S.-led invasion toppled Saddam Hussein.

Bush and panel members exchanged questions about Iraq during a closed session that lasted more than an hour. The president later described the meeting as a "general conversation about the situation there."

Bush emphasized his misgivings about talks with Syria and Iran after meeting with Olmert.

He and Olmert said Iran aimed to develop nuclear weapons, even though Tehran insisted its nuclear program was intended only for energy purposes. Bush said if Iran failed to suspend nuclear enrichment, world powers should take steps to economically isolate Tehran.

Olmert said Iran was "not just a threat for Israel but for the whole world."

However, Israel would not oppose U.S.-Iranian negotiations, a senior Israeli official said after the Bush-Olmert meeting. Although Israel had "no objection to talking," said the senior official, speaking on condition of anonymity, it would want the U.S. to use any diplomatic opening to emphasize the nuclear question.

Bush expressed skepticism about proposals for gradual troop withdrawals in Iraq despite new efforts by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who is expected to become the next chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Levin said he thought his proposal could gain a bipartisan majority in the Senate.

Giving Iraqi leaders a firm date for a U.S. drawdown would pressure the Shiite Muslim majority to make concessions to the Sunni Arab minority, Levin said. If they did not make concessions, Levin said, he expected the country's chaos would worsen.

There are "a number of Republicans who want us to change course and to do so in a way which will send a message to the Iraqis that this is their responsibility and we cannot save them from themselves," Levin said.

Members of the Iraq Study Group spent most of the day at the White House talking to administration officials, including Rice, Vice President Dick Cheney, national security advisor Stephen Hadley, National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte, CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace.

Today, the group is to meet senior members of the Clinton administration, including former Secretary of State Warren Christopher, former national security advisor Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, former United Nations Ambassador Richard C. Holbrooke and possibly former President Clinton.

The panel also is scheduled to speak to Blair.

Although Bush is holding firm against some of the leading proposals for changes in Iraq, his choice of words has suggested an evolution in his goals.

The president has often declared that the U.S. aim in Iraq is to establish a democracy in the heart of the Middle East that could serve as an example to nearby countries. On Monday, Bush said his definition of success in Iraq was "a government which can sustain, govern and defend itself, and will serve as an ally in this war on terror."

He did not mention democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0094021

In Iraq, U.S. military commanders have grown more emphatic about prodding the Maliki government, which they consider disorganized and unwilling to disarm militias.

Abizaid's meeting with Maliki was the third unannounced visit by a top U.S. official since the end of October. Abizaid's visit followed ones by Hadley and Negroponte.

Blair, while calling for engagement with Iran, also underlined the need to enlist moderate Arabs throughout the Middle East by demonstrating a commitment to resolving conflicts in the Palestinian territories and in Lebanon.

"Just as it is, in significant part, forces outside Iraq that are trying to create mayhem inside Iraq, so we have to have a strategy that pins them back, not only in Iraq but outside of it too," Blair said in a speech intended to clarify how America's strongest ally in Iraq viewed the next round of strategy to end the conflict.

In a briefing with reporters, Blair's official spokesman said British officials thought Syria and Iran should be given "a strategic choice" about cooperating on Iraq and elsewhere in the region.

The key, Blair said, is talking to Iran from a position of strength, once the "pressure points" Tehran is using elsewhere in the Middle East "to thwart us" are relieved.

"Offer Iran a clear strategic choice: They help the Middle East peace process, not hinder it; they stop supporting terrorism in Lebanon or Iraq; and they abide by, not flout, their international obligations. In that case, a new partnership is possible. Or alternatively they face the consequences of not doing so: isolation," Blair said.

The war in Iraq has claimed the lives of 125 British troops, and as early as 2004, Britain's army commanders expressed an interest in drawing down by at least a third the 8,000 troops deployed by the nation.

But London has been waiting for the U.S. to move first and has been hamstrung by the deteriorating security situation that has impeded the withdrawal of American forces.

Blair, who has faced strong criticism at home for appearing to follow Washington's lead too closely, made it clear that Britain intended to remain a strong ally of the U.S.

"Our partnership with America and our membership of the European Union are precisely suited to Britain," he said. "For that reason, it would be insane, in my judgment — yes, I would put it as strongly as that — for us to give up either relationship."

Bush Meets With Panel On Iraq, But Not On Policy (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The bipartisan Iraq Study Group spent Monday at the White House meeting with President Bush and his top advisers as the panel winds down its search for consensus on what to do next in Iraq.

Bush said he looks forward to recommendations from the group, which is headed by Republican former secretary of State James Baker and Democratic former congressman Lee Hamilton. The commission began its work last spring under the direction of Congress. It has gained political capital since voters upset with the war gave Democrats a majority in Congress last week.

The panel won't release its findings until later this month or early next month, but group members have hinted — and outside experts have predicted — that the recommendations are likely to involve pressuring the Iraqi government to make political compromises to enhance security, altering the priorities of U.S. troops and engaging in talks with Iraq's neighbors Iran and Syria.

“There are no good options, so the question becomes, what are the best of the bad ones?” says William Cohen, a former senator, R-Maine, who served as Defense secretary during President Clinton's second term.

Cohen, who is not a member of the group, and others lay out likely elements of the recommendations:

·Pushing Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to crack down on sectarian militias, increase political participation by minority Sunni Arabs and distribute Iraq's oil revenue fairly. “That's the agenda on the political side: How do we engage more effectively with the Iraqi government to move forward on the internal issues of reconciliation and national unity?” says Michele Flournoy, a military scholar at the non-partisan Center for Strategic and International Studies.

·Shifting more U.S. troops to training and advising Iraqi security forces. Some Democrats have called for U.S. forces to be brought home starting in the next several months. “As long as the Iraqis believe we're there in some open-ended way, we're taking the pressure off of them to make some very difficult decisions,” says Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

·Negotiating with neighboring Iran and Syria, which have influence with factions in Iraq, to curb violence. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who is scheduled to talk with the commission via satellite today, has called for such talks. Bush repeated his insistence on preconditions: that Syria stop interfering in Lebanon and end its support for extremist groups, and that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, which the United Nations Security Council considers a step toward a nuclear weapon.

Cohen predicts that the recommendations also will include appealing to U.S. allies for more troops and funding.

DOJ_NMG_0094022

Bush said Monday's meetings were to exchange information, not to discuss policy recommendations. He said he is open to suggestions from the commission as well as a review underway by top officials at the Pentagon. “I believe it is very important, though, for people making suggestions to recognize that the best military options depend upon the conditions on the ground,” he said.

That means no troop withdrawals until Iraq is stable, White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters at his daily briefing. “The ultimate goal still has to be an Iraq that can sustain, govern and defend itself,” he said.

The president has nominated former CIA director Robert Gates, a member of the commission until last week, to replace Donald Rumsfeld as Defense secretary. That means Gates will be familiar with the panel's recommendations and puts more pressure on Bush to endorse the Iraq Study Group's report, Cohen says. “I don't see any way the president could reject it.”

Huge Task Before Iraq Study Group (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

For the bipartisan panel of luminaries known as the Iraq Study Group, the most important thing now may be hammering out a framework for peace in Washington, not drawing up new lists of options for US policy toward Iraq.

After all, despite all the Washington talk about cooperation since last week's elections, profound differences about the way forward remain between many Democrats and Republicans, as well as among them. Yet all sides say they are willing to listen to one another, and look for common ground.

Enter the Iraq panel, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic congressmen Lee Hamilton. Timing - plus the nature of its members - may have thrust the group into a central role in perhaps the most important policy debate now facing the nation.

"Maybe an outside group can craft a policy that both sides can accept, though they don't want to have responsibility for drafting it," says William Martel, an associate professor of security studies at the Fletcher School at Tufts University in Medford, Mass.

The 10-member Iraq Study Group was created by Congress last spring. At the time the move generated little notice, apart from a flurry of activity among Washington think tank experts eager to serve as advisers to the panel.

Now its final report, expected before the end of the year, is something Washington is eagerly anticipating.

On Monday group members met with White House officials, including President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. They were to interview British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Tuesday via videoconference.

As to Mr. Bush's appearance before the group, presidential spokesman Tony Snow characterized it as a conversation in which both sides shared views. "This is not a deposition," Mr. Snow said.

Bush himself said he was not sure what the Iraq Study Group's report would say but that he looked forward to seeing it. "I'm not going to prejudge" the group's work, said Bush.

The full Iraq Study Group is set to meet the week after Thanksgiving to begin the contentious process of drawing up final recommendations. Messrs. Baker and Hamilton did not want to produce any lists before the election that could have been leaked for political gain.

Bush's nominee to replace Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, former Director of Intelligence Robert Gates, was a panel member. Last Friday, Baker and Hamilton announced that Gates had resigned from the group and been replaced by former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger. The panel remains split between five Democrats and five Republicans.

Given its nature, the Iraq Study Group seems unlikely to produce a report calling either for a continuation of current policy or an immediate and rapid drawdown of US forces in Iraq.

In appearances promoting a recent book, Baker, for his part, has been somewhat critical of the administration's slowness to react to Iraq's intensifying violence.

When he was secretary of State, Baker was open to talking even with US adversaries, to the point where he endured hours-long harangues from the late Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad. As commission co-chairman, Baker has already met with Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the US.

It is possible the Iraq Study Group may urge some sort of regional roundtable meeting on Iraq's future that includes Iran and Syria - a recommendation the White House has previously opposed.

Former Ambassador to the UN Richard Holbrooke, a Democrat, recently said that a regional conference similar to the one he used to craft an end to the Bosnian war in 1995 might be useful.

DOJ_NMG_0094023

"This war is being waged on the ground by ferocious forces which aren't necessarily going to be much interested in what regional and international players say," Mr. Holbrooke, who is not an Iraq Study Group member, said in a Council on Foreign Relations analysis. "Still, I think it's worth trying."

Of course, given the presence of Baker and other old-hand Republicans on the panel, it is also unlikely that the study group will urge any sort of timetable for a troop pullout - even a vague one. That's something Democrats might find hard to accept.

As to possible middle-ground solutions, the panel has reportedly been weighing an option called "Stability First," which emphasizes withdrawing US resources from much of the country to focus all efforts on Baghdad stability; and an option called "Redeploy and Contain," which would involve withdrawing most US forces to surrounding nations, where they would serve as a mobile reserve for Iraqi national forces.

Hamilton has said it is possible his group won't be able to come to consensus at all. As a party, Democrats remain split over the degree to which Iraq might still be saved, as well as over the nature of any troop withdrawal deadlines.

Not that the GOP, as a whole party, is now a unified front. Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona has said what's needed now is, in fact, an increase in US force levels in Iraq, at least for a time.

As to the dialogue between the parties, while key Senate Democrats have vowed to push for a resolution that would call for troop withdrawals in a matter of months, a withdrawal timetable appears to remain an anathema to the White House.

"I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out," said Bush's chief of staff, Joshua Bolten, in a weekend broadcast interview.

At work since April, the bipartisan panel is expected to suggest changes in US policy in Iraq by year's end. Its members are:

· James Baker III, former secretary of State (George H.W. Bush), co-chairman
· Lee Hamilton, former congressman (D) of Indiana, co-chairman
· Lawrence Eagleburger, former secretary of State (George H.W. Bush)
· Vernon Jordan, attorney, presidential adviser (Clinton)
· Edwin Meese, former US attorney general (Reagan)
· Sandra Day O'Connor, former Supreme Court justice
· Leon Panetta, former White House chief of staff (Clinton)
· William Perry, former secretary of Defense (Clinton)
· Chuck Robb, former governor of Virginia (D)
· Alan Simpson, former senator (R) of Wyoming

Bush Trades Ideas On Iraq With Panel (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum And Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 14, 2006

President Bush traded ideas on Iraq with a bipartisan commission Monday and promised to work with the incoming Democratic majority toward "common objectives." At the same time, he renewed his opposition to any timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops.

As Bush met with the Iraq Study Group, the Democrat in line to lead the Senate Armed Services Committee, Carl Levin of Michigan, said the administration didn't see that "we're getting deeper and deeper into a hole."

Levin and other Democrats called for some troops to come home right away, suggesting that would pressure the Iraqi government into assuming more responsibility.

Bush in turn had stern words for the Democrats, less than a week after they won control of both chambers of Congress in midterm elections in which the Iraq war figured prominently.

Asked about proposals by Levin and others for a phased troop reduction, Bush said, "I believe it is very important ... for people making suggestions to recognize that the best military options depend upon the conditions on the ground."

While Democrats agree that troops should leave Iraq sooner rather than later, they remain divided on the specifics. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a contender to become the next majority leader, supports an immediate withdrawal of all troops, whereas Levin and others favor a slower phased withdrawal and have been reluctant to suggest a firm timetable.

Whereas Murtha and some others contend violence in Iraq will continue so long as U.S. troops are present, Levin and others warn that any withdrawal of troops must be done slowly to avoid a collapse in security.

Baker's panel has been briefed on the Democrats' proposals and is considering a range of options. In addition to considering whether there should be any timetable to pull out troops, the panel is studying many other options, including whether to solicit Iran and Syria to help stop the fighting.

The president met for more than an hour with a 10-member panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton. He was joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley.

The panel then stayed around for a longer session that included other members of the president's national security team, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Baker and Hamilton later put out a joint statement. "We were pleased to meet with senior administration officials today and look forward to our consultations with some top Democrats tomorrow. We are working expeditiously to complete our report and recommendations," the statement said.

Bush discussed the meeting with reporters during a picture-taking session in the Oval Office with visiting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"I was impressed by the questions they asked. They want us to succeed in Iraq, just like I want us to succeed. So we had a really good discussion," Bush said.

As to newly empowered Democrats, he said, "What's interesting is they're beginning to understand that with victory comes responsibility, and I'm looking forward to working with the Democrats to achieve common objectives."

White House spokesman Tony Snow described the meeting with the Iraq panel as a "general conversation about the situation there," rather than a preview of what the group will recommend. "This was not proposal-shopping by the Iraq Study Group," Snow said.

The members asked questions of Bush, and he of them, Snow said, "but there was care taken not to sort of try to prejudge, or also to get a jump on what they are going to do."

Lawmakers barely had begun their postelection session Monday when debate broke out over the war in Iraq and over Democratic proposals to start bringing home U.S. troops.

Levin said in a news conference that the military had done what it could and it was up to Iraq's politicians to find consensus. "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves," he said.

In addition, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada went to the Senate floor to lend support for a change in Iraq policy.

But Republicans shot back, saying they would oppose any timetable because it could cause Iraq to collapse into chaos.

Opponents of Levin's proposal — at least for now — include Sen. John Warner, R-Va., outgoing chairman of the Armed Services Committee. He says Congress must wait until the Baker-Hamilton panel releases its recommendations.

Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, two GOP members of the Armed Services Committee, said they would oppose an arbitrary withdrawal of troops. Collins and Graham have both criticized the Bush administration for its handling of the war.

Graham recently said Iraq was on the verge of chaos and demanded accountability, but on Monday he stood firm on his position that more troops, not fewer troops, are needed to settle the violence there.

Opposing views could deadlock Congress on the matter. While Republicans have the majority until the new session begins in January, they do so by a slim margin. And when Democrats take over, they too will have a razor-thin majority — far short of the 60 votes needed to cut off delaying tactics.

Meanwhile, Democratic leaders are lining up behind legislation that would extend an investigative office that unearthed millions of dollars in waste and fraud associated with the rebuilding of Iraq. Republican Collins and Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin introduced legislation that would allow the office to continue through October 2008.

Under current law, it will expire in October 2007.

Collins and Feingold offered the measure as an amendment to a military construction and veterans' spending bill that the Senate will debate Tuesday. Collins said she will press for the legislation to be taken up separately as well to improve its chances.

Rep. Ike Skelton, the incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee, introduced a similar bill Monday that would be likely to keep the inspector general's office in business through 2009 by asking it to investigate another $1.7 billion in Iraq funding.

Even before the Iraq Study Group's work is finished, the panel's report is widely seen as an opportunity to give the campaign-weary Democratic and Republican parties a chance at consensus — or at least a framework for agreement.

Also on Monday, Gen. John Abizaid, head of the U.S. Central Command, met with the Iraqi prime minister to "reaffirm President Bush's commitment" to success in Iraq, the government said.

DOJ_NMG_0094025

Baker, who served as the first President Bush's secretary of state, has said the report's recommendations are likely to fall somewhere between the troop withdrawal strategy that Republicans like to say Democrats favor and the stay-the-course policy until recently used by Bush and widely ridiculed by Democrats.

Proposed Iraq Pullout Lacking Specifics (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 14, 2006

The White House yesterday rejected Democrats' proposals for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq as lacking specifics or "meat on the bones," as President Bush met with the Iraq Study Group, which is seeking to advise the administration on ways to realign Iraq policy.

Democrats have claimed a mandate after last week's elections to force a change in Iraq policy, and key Senate Democrats yesterday called for the first troops to be withdrawn within six months as a signal to Iraqis that the United States is not their "security blanket."

"That's the message that came through so clearly and powerfully last Tuesday from the American people. Most Democrats share the view that we should pressure the White House to commence the phased redeployment of U.S. troops from Iraq in four to six months," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, who is in line to become the next chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

His call was echoed by Sen. Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, who is likely to become the Senate majority leader when Democrats assume control next year. Meanwhile, House Democrats' leader, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, has made Iraq the central issue in the race for House Democrats' No. 2 position by endorsing Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, based on his opposition to the war.

Faced with the election results and emboldened Democrats, Mr. Bush is trying to keep control of the debate while still being open to suggestions from the soon-to-be new majority party on Capitol Hill.

"What's interesting is, is that they're beginning to understand that with victory comes responsibilities. And I'm looking forward to working with the Democrats to achieve common objectives," the president told reporters after a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said that Democrats have not settled on a proposal and that Mr. Levin's idea isn't even fleshed out enough to respond.

"Democrats now have to put meat on the bones," he said.

The White House has turned to the Iraq Study Group, boosting the congressionally mandated panel's profile in the past week both in a postelection press conference and again with a day full of meetings between the group's members and administration officials.

Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten met yesterday with the group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana for 75 minutes yesterday.

The group spent the day at the White House, also meeting with the secretaries of defense and state, the national intelligence and CIA directors, top generals and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Today, its members will meet with Democrats such as former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger, former Assistant Secretary of State Richard C. Holbrooke and former Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

Expectations for the group are growing, and those on both sides of the political divide say it could be a chance for the White House to achieve a face-saving way forward in Iraq.

The group said it wants to have a report by the end of the year.

But Mr. Snow said the study group is just one of the voices Mr. Bush will listen to, and said Mr. Bush is responsible for making final decisions. He also cautioned against putting too much weight on the group's meetings yesterday with administration officials, saying that it was an exchange of information about what is going on in Iraq and that the group was not pitching suggestions.

"There seems to be this notion that somehow this is like a board game, where you just sort of neatly sweep all the pieces off, and then it's all done," he said.

Still, Mr. Bush's tone has already changed to the point where he is now drawing fewer lines and sounding more welcoming to outside ideas.

Asked yesterday whether he would accept recommendations from the group that included timetables, Mr. Bush did not rule it out, instead saying he will not "prejudge" the report. At a press conference last week, he announced the resignation of Defense

Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and nominated Robert M. Gates, who until Friday was a member of the study group, as a replacement.

Mr. Levin said the change in attitude was apparent.

"I didn't hear anything about cutting and running," he said. "I didn't hear anything about if you are proposing that we begin a phased redeployment in four to six months, that somehow or other that will help the terrorists."

A Committee's Platform (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

Now that the campaign is over, the campaign has begun. And as it was in the 2006 midterm elections, Topic No. 1 for the opening stage of the 2008 presidential campaign is the war in Iraq. The Senate Armed Services Committee is holding a hearing tomorrow on Iraq and Afghanistan. The committee's members include the widely perceived front-runners in both parties, Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John McCain of Arizona.

The committee's Democratic ranks also include Senators Evan Bayh of Indiana, who is almost certain to run for president, and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, probably the strongest advocate of the war in his party. This committee provided Mrs. Clinton the forum this summer in which she excoriated Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld for "incompetence in executing the war."

Bush Says He's Open To Change In Iraq, But ... (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — President Bush spent more than an hour on Monday with the independent panel examining strategic options for Iraq, and cautioned afterward that while he was open to new ideas, it was important for "people making suggestions to recognize that the best military options depend upon conditions on the ground."

The president's brief remarks seemed aimed at Democrats, who are demanding a phased withdrawal of troops from Iraq, beginning in a matter of months. Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted any timetable, and his comments on Monday offered the first hint of how he might respond.

Addressing reporters in the Oval Office, Mr. Bush shed little light on the substance of his hour-and-15-minute session with members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, the former congressman. The president said that they had "a good discussion," and that he was "looking forward to interesting ideas."

Mr. Bush is under intense pressure to change course in Iraq, from Democrats and from some Republicans. One leading Republican, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said in an interview on Monday that the election results were a clear cry for a new Iraq strategy.

"The American people have spoken with regard to their deep concern about the loss of life, the loss of limb, the enormity of the expenditures, the credibility of our country," Mr. Warner said.

But Mr. Warner, who created a stir among Republicans this fall when he said the situation in Iraq was "drifting sideways," appealed to his colleagues not to rush to conclusions before a report by the commission, which is expected in December.

Other Republicans also weighed in. Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a leading member of the Armed Services Committee, said in a statement that he would "adamantly oppose" any effort to set a deadline for withdrawal, calling it "equivalent to surrendering in the central battlefront in the war on terror."

Democrats, for their part, continued their offensive, saying the American people had given them a mandate. In a news conference on Capitol Hill, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, who will be the next Armed Services chairman, accused the administration of "ignoring obvious reality on the ground in Iraq, that we're getting deeper and deeper into a hole that we should stop digging."

The debate will soon move to the Armed Services panel. Among the senators on that committee are leading contenders in the nascent 2008 presidential campaign, Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain, who has been talking about increasing rather than decreasing the numbers of troops in Iraq.

On Wednesday, the committee will hear testimony from Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top military commander in the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0094027

Iraq policy will also no doubt play a role in the confirmation hearings next month for Robert M. Gates, the former C.I.A. director, who is the president's choice to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense. Mr. Gates was a member of the Iraq Study Group but stepped down when his new appointment was announced.

Senator Warner said he invited Gen. Peter Pace, who as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is conducting his own review of Iraq policy, to appear before the committee.

The Iraq Study Group, formed at the request of Congress, is in Washington this week for a last round of interviews before making its final recommendations. Vice President Dick Cheney attended the Oval Office session on Monday, and the group met with other members of the Bush foreign policy team.

In his comments, Mr. Bush appeared to be walking a fine line — declaring that he was open to new tactics in Iraq, but seeming to foreclose some options.

Before their meeting at the White House, some commission members said they sensed that the White House and the commission members were, in the words of one, "feeling each other out, trying to sense where this is going."

Mr. Baker has made no secret of his belief that the Bush administration must talk to its enemies, Syria and Iran included. In a speech on Monday, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain said the West should be open to Iran and Syria — but only if they take a cooperative stance.

Mr. Bush did not budge on those points. Asked about Syria, he said, "We do have an embassy there in Syria," without mentioning that contacts with the Syrian government have been limited. The president then laid out preconditions for talks with the Syrian government. Nor did Mr. Bush give any ground on Iran, instead reiterating his long-held stance that the Iranian government must suspend the enrichment of uranium before Washington will join talks.

Many officials inside and outside the administration are looking for signs that Mr. Bush will modify his views, especially now that he has nominated Mr. Gates, who led a committee of the Council on Foreign Relations calling for more engagement with Iran. But Bush aides say talking to Syria or Iran is simply not enough.

"Talking isn't a strategy," Mr. Hadley, the national security adviser, said in an interview last month. "The issue is how can we condition the environment so that Iran and Syria will make a 180-degree turn."

Expectations are high both inside and outside the administration that the Baker-Hamilton group will provide a face-saving way forward for Mr. Bush. But one leading Republican, Representative Duncan Hunter, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said lawmakers should not delude themselves by thinking there would be easy answers.

"No matter what the commission recommends, the day after the recommendations come out, you're going to have American troops in Iraq continuing to train and stand up the Iraqi forces," Mr. Hunter said. "You have to do that. There's no shortcut to that. There's no silver bullet and there's no easy way to do it."

In Call For More Troops, McCain Places His Bet On Iraq (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — Senator John McCain is accustomed to staking out a lonely piece of ground, but on Iraq he is virtually an army of one. Nearly alone among major political figures in calling for an increase in American forces in Iraq, Mr. McCain is either taking a principled stand or a huge political gamble. Or both.

A majority of Americans now say they think invading Iraq was a mistake and would like to see the withdrawal of at least some of the nearly 150,000 troops there, polls say. Only one in seven Americans agrees with Mr. McCain that the United States should send more soldiers and marines. Even President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, who assert that victory is the only acceptable outcome of the war, have not dared publicly to advocate additional deployments.

Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, has all but announced his intention to run for president, and his position on Iraq could be a major complication for him, particularly if violence there continues to grow and American casualties mount.

Mr. McCain contends that the war in Iraq is worth fighting and is worth winning. He has said consistently from the start of the conflict that the only way to prevail is to send enough soldiers to do the job. His current proposal is to send 20,000 additional troops in hopes of bringing Baghdad and the restive western provinces under control.

The alternative, he said, is humiliation for the United States and disaster for Iraq.

"We're paying a price for the failure of our policy in the past," Mr. McCain said Sunday on "Meet the Press" on NBC, "and the question, then, before the American people is, are we ready to quit? And I believe the consequences of failure are chaos in the region, which will spread."

Mr. McCain said that the fate of the Iraqi venture would be decided in the next six months or so and that signaling the intention to depart, regardless of facts on the ground, only guaranteed defeat. But he also said he was willing to reach a different conclusion if the generals in charge of the American military operation or if the members of the commission led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, came up with a workable alternative.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of United States forces in Iraq, and top intelligence officials will go before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Wednesday to face questioning about the war for the first time since last week's election, which many viewed as a referendum on Iraq. The Baker study group is expected to report its preliminary findings and recommendations next month.

Leslie H. Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said Mr. McCain had painted such a dire picture of the consequences of defeat that he almost had to advocate a more forceful effort to win. If Mr. McCain were to join the chorus of those agitating for a fast or slow withdrawal, he could alienate a large swath of voters he needs to win the Republican presidential nomination, Mr. Gelb added.

"He's making the bet — and it's not a crazy bet — that the country doesn't want to lose," he said. "The public realizes we can't afford to win and probably can't win, but it doesn't want to lose. And the Republicans probably won't nominate anyone who's prepared to accept that now."

Other analysts said Mr. McCain was risking his reputation as a realist and someone who knows when to fold a losing hand by sticking obstinately to his current position.

"He would just repeat the mistake of Vietnam," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution, the liberal-leaning research group in Washington. "If McCain refuses to acknowledge that some wars can become simply unwinnable, he may be exposing a weakness in his thinking that ultimately deprives him of the presidency."

Last week's election robbed Mr. McCain of a prize he had sought for many years, the chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee. If Republicans had retained control of the Senate, he was in line to assume the gavel and the ability to call witnesses and set the terms of the Iraq debate in the Senate, at least in part. But the defeat of Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, tipped the balance of power to Democrats, putting Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, an early opponent of the war, in position to assume the post in January.

Mr. McCain can still play his gadfly role from the minority, and some welcome his voice.

"God bless him, he's about the only serious person in this whole debate," said Joshua Muravchik, resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, the conservative research organization in Washington. "Even a supporter of the war like myself would have to acknowledge that we're in a mess, so the question is what to do about it. And McCain is saying we ought to do what we should have done in the first place, which was send enough troops to do the job. That seems counterintuitive because the whole momentum of emotions in the country at this point is to get out of there."

Father Knows Best? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

As president of Texas A&M University, Bob Gates abolished admissions preferences for the children and grandchildren of alumni, reportedly saying it was "unworthy of a great university." Funny, then, that he should be returning to Washington on the strength of his reputation as daddy's boy.

"Daddy," of course, is former President George H. W. Bush, for whom Mr. Gates served as deputy national security adviser and director of Central Intelligence. Today, the elder Mr. Bush is being celebrated as a foreign-policy sage whose adroit stewardship of the world stands in flattering contrast with current management. Mr. Gates, along with Bush 41 hands James Baker and Larry Eagleburger of the Iraq Study Group, are now supposed to play the part of the posse come to the rescue of the wayward son. Newsweek even commissioned a poll that found that "67% favor Bush Senior's internationalist approach to foreign policy over his son's more unilateral course."

Curiously, a similar percentage of Americans voted for someone other than Mr. Bush during his 1992 re-election bid. So it's worth reprising just what his "internationalist approach" achieved, and where it failed. The senior Mr. Bush is justly remembered as the architect of the broad coalition that evicted Saddam Hussein from Kuwait -- and of the Coalition of One that took down Manuel Noriega of Panama. Bush 41 also deserves great credit for engineering the North American Free Trade Agreement and supporting German reunification when it was opposed by the likes of Margaret Thatcher.

But consider four other shorthands for the Bush 41 record. One is "1-202-456-1414," the number for the White House switchboard. As secretary of state, Mr. Baker read it aloud in congressional testimony in 1990, ostensibly for the benefit of Israelis once they got "serious about peace." A year later, and for much the same reason, the Bush administration threatened to withhold $10 billion in commercial loan guarantees, which Israel needed to cope with the influx of some one million Russian Jews -- fully a fifth of its population.

For its efforts, the Bush administration brought Arabs and Israelis together for the Madrid Peace Conference, which set the groundwork for the Oslo Accords. These were touted as historic achievements, but for Israel it meant more terrorism, culminating in the second intifada, and for the Palestinians it meant repression in the person of Yasser Arafat and mass radicalization in the movement of Hamas. Worse, Mr. Baker fostered the fatal perception that the failure of Arabs and Jews to make peace was the root of the region's problems, not a symptom of them, and that the obstacle to peace was intransigent Israel, not militant Islam. Bob Gates later gave voice to that perception when he wrote, in a 1998 New York Times op-ed, that the road to Mideast peace must "not kowtow to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's obstructionism."

Or take "Lawrence of Serbia," the moniker Mr. Eagleburger earned for his initial indulgence, as the State Department's point man on Yugoslav affairs during the early 1990s while the country was coming apart, of Serbia's Slobodan Milosevic. Mr. Eagleburger, who had longstanding business ties in Belgrade, spent the early period of the war largely ignoring Mr. Milosevic's depredations on his neighbors, including paramilitary slaughters in Vukovar and concentration camps in Omarska. "There was a kind of preference for stability and an attachment to the old Yugoslavia over our interests in human rights," Patrick Glynn of the American Enterprise Institute told Newsday in 1992, adding the administration had "been standing by, waiting while the final solution is played out."

Which brings us to "Chicken Kiev," Mr. Bush's spectacularly misconceived August 1991 speech in what was shortly to become the capital of independent Ukraine. Mr. Bush's reluctance to acknowledge -- and better manage -- the breakup of Yugoslavia was partly a function of his reluctance to acknowledge the impending breakup of the Soviet Union and the fall from grace of his friend Mikhail Gorbachev. The U.S. was the 39th country to re-establish diplomatic ties with Lithuania, after Iceland and Mongolia had already paved the way. Once Mr. Gorbachev was gone, Mr. Bush was equally reluctant to help the new Russia get on its feet, prompting Richard Nixon to complain about the administration's "pathetically inadequate response in light of the opportunities we face in the crisis in the former Soviet Union."

But surely no Bush 41 failure was as great -- or as consequential -- as his apparently flip suggestion, following "victory" in the Gulf War, that the "Iraqi people . . . take matters into their own hands and force Saddam Hussein, the dictator, to step down." Tens of thousands of Shiites and Kurds took him seriously, and tens of thousands paid with their lives as Saddam quelled the revolt while the Bush administration stood by, lest it exceed its U.N. mandate.

None of this is to say that Mr. Gates is merely an avatar of Bush the Father, much as his nomination is being played that way in the media, or that he hasn't learned from past mistakes. But critics of the current administration and the "disaster" visited on Iraq by neoconservative ideologues might usefully reflect on the previous disasters visited by the non-ideologues on Iraqis, Croats and Bosnians, among others sacrificed in the name of prudence. A decade from now, they just might find themselves ruing the day Bush 43 abandoned his idealism -- and the people that idealism has liberated or inspired -- in the service of "realism," suffused by panic.

Get Jim In Here, Pronto! (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

If I told you that there was something in Washington called the Baker commission but didn't tell you what it was about, you still could probably name many of its members. If you are of a certain age, you might wonder, "Jim or Howard?" And you might have a quibble or two.

Where is Dick Holbrooke? Does Sandra Day O'Connor's new availability mean that Madeleine Albright is out of luck from now on? Are they sure that Larry Eagleburger is still alive? But Vernon Jordan is there, along with Ed Meese and Alan Simpson and Lee Hamilton. This is one torch that has not been passed to a new generation, although former Virginia senator and presidential son-in-law Charles Robb (age 67) is a fresh face in the pool of Washington Wise Men. Welcome, Chuck.

The Baker commission -- that's James Baker, of course -- was appointed by Congress to look into the situation in Iraq. It is expected to report early next month, and it is duly bouncing around and staffing up and holding hearings and all the things that prestigious commissions do.

Ordinarily a commission such as this has two possible purposes: action or inaction. Sometimes a problem is referred to a prestigious commission so that the commission can recommend doing things that everybody knows must be done but that nobody has the nerve to propose -- at least nobody who has to run for office. The commission can ram this policy down the politicians' allegedly unwilling throats. If it is bipartisan -- and what fun is a commission that isn't bipartisan? -- the commission also protects both parties against a stab in the back by the other. This is how Social Security was reformed and saved the last time, when the chairman of the commission was Alan Greenspan, and undoubtedly this is how it will be reformed and saved again. Hey, Greenspan's available again. Come to think of it, why isn't he on this one? He is no expert on Iraq -- but neither is Leon Panetta, another recent initiate into the Pantheon.

Welcome, Leon.

On the other hand, sometimes a problem is referred to a commission simply to get it off the table. Action is widely perceived as necessary, and the creation of a commission can be made to look like action.

So which is the Baker commission? It's got elements of both. Part of the idea, certainly, was to get the politicians over the hump of the election and give them something to say in the meantime. ("We desperately need new ideas and fresh thinking about Iraq and, indeed, the entire Middle East. I look forward to the recommendations of the Baker commission and urge them to interpret their mandate widely and boldly.") And part of the idea is to legitimize some impalatable solution. But the Baker commission may be nearly unique in that there is no obvious solution waiting to be imposed. People actually hope that it will come up with something that no one has thought of.

Good luck. The chance that this group of aging white men, plus Vernon Jordan and Sandra Day O'Connor, will come up with something original is not enormous. It's a nutty and not very attractive idea to turn an urgent issue of war and peace over to a commission. Commissions have usually been trotted out for long-run social problems: immigration, debt, health care. Going to war is something that ought to be decided by the people we elect. Congress, in recent decades, has virtually abandoned its duty under the Constitution to make the decisions about when American soldiers are sent to kill and die.

Presidents have foolishly claimed that authority. And now, inevitably, we have a president who is stuck with a war that he insisted on and a citizenry that has no interest in it.

If we had wanted our country to be run by James Baker, we had our chance. He was interested in running for president in 1996 but discovered that his interest in a James Baker presidency was not widely shared. Although he has held a variety of government posts, from undersecretary of commerce under Gerald Ford to secretary of state under Bush the Elder, and has all the trappings of enormous consequence and wisdom, such as a Presidential Medal of Freedom and his own James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University, Baker is essentially a political operative. His place in history is Florida 2000, where he secured the presidency for George W. Bush. Reporters were awed by his brilliance and ruthlessness. History may be less admiring of his willingness to make inconsistent arguments and to lie with a straight face.

Being a Washington Wise Man does not require much wisdom. Baker has a "conviction," said a Baker colleague quoted in The Post on Sunday, "that Iraq is the central foreign policy issue confronting the United States." Wow. Now there's an insight. Actually, it is a nice small insight into the Baker mentality that he apparently can imagine a war that is killing large numbers of young Americans every month but that is not our central foreign policy issue. Baker also believes that "the only way to address that issue successfully is to first build a bipartisan consensus." Now, that is a conviction you can sink your teeth into. People like Baker always favor a bipartisan consensus.

They don't really believe in politics, which is to say they don't really believe in democracy.

Gunmen Seize 100 At Iraq Ministry (BBC)

BBC News, November 14, 2006

Gunmen in military-style uniforms have kidnapped more than 100 men from a research institute belonging to Iraq's higher education ministry.

A ministry spokeswoman said the gunmen arrived in new pick-up vehicles and stormed the ministry's Research Directorate in central Baghdad.

They ordered women into one room and seized the men, including employees, guards and visitors to the building.

Academics and researchers have been frequent targets of violence in Iraq.

Correspondents say many Iraqis believe mass kidnappings like this latest incident are committed by members of the Shia Muslim-dominated security forces or take place with their collusion.

The head of the parliamentary education committee, Alaa Makki, said the abductees had been both Shias and Sunnis.

Mr Makki interrupted a televised parliamentary session with the news and urged the prime minister and interior and defence ministers to respond rapidly to what he called a "national catastrophe".

Eyewitnesses say the gunmen closed off roads around the institute in Karrada district and took away their captives in handcuffs.

The higher education minister is a member of main Sunni Arab political bloc in Iraq - where most ministries are fiefdoms of the various sectarian groups.

U.S. Presses For Security Timeline (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times/AP, November 14, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The U.S. Central Command chief confronted Iraq's prime minister yesterday over how Iraqi forces would halt raging violence and signaled a possible prelude to shifts in American policy on engaging Iran and Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0094031

The meeting came as sectarian attacks killed at least 91 persons throughout Iraq, 46 of them showing signs of torture. The U.S. military announced the deaths of four additional American soldiers. So far this month, 34 American service members have been killed or have died in Iraq.

Gen. John Abizaid, commander of all U.S. forces in the Middle East, sternly warned Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he must disband Shi'ite militias and give the United States proof they were disarmed, according to senior Iraqi government officials with knowledge of what the two men discussed.

Beyond that, Gen. Abizaid asked the Iraqi leader to give the U.S. military a firm timetable for when Iraq's security forces could take full control of the country, the officials said on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the talks.

Mr. al-Maliki has been pressing Washington to move more quickly to hand security affairs over to his army, asserting it could crush violence in the country within six months. Gen. Abizaid apparently called Mr. al-Maliki's bluff by asking the prime minister to give a detailed explanation of how he would do that. The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, recently said it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraqi security forces were ready to control the whole country with some U.S. backup.

The United States did not respond to requests for comment on yesterday's meeting.

But a brief statement by the Iraqi government said Gen. Abizaid told Mr. al-Maliki he had come to "reaffirm President Bush's commitment" to success in this country. It also said the two discussed the impact of "neighboring countries on the security situation in Iraq," a clear reference to Iran and Syria.

The reference to Iraq's neighbors coincided with a call by British Prime Minister Tony Blair for Iran and Syria to help stem bloodshed in Iraq and to join efforts to stabilize the Middle East.

The Syrian ambassador to Washington affirmed a readiness to work with the United States.

"We in Syria believe that engagement with the United States on Iraq can help a lot, because we believe that we need to stabilize the situation in Iraq and support the political process there," Imad Moustapha told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Gen. Abizaid was the third top U.S. official to visit Iraq since Oct. 30, and the meeting comes a day after Mr. al-Maliki promised to shake up his government in a bid to end the sectarian slaughter.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley was first to visit, followed five days later by U.S. National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte.

Before Gen. Abizaid pushed the same theme, Mr. Negroponte also demanded Mr. al-Maliki disband militias by year's end -- but was met with a flat rejection. Mr. al-Maliki told Mr. Negroponte such a move would be political suicide. Mr. al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, relies heavily on two major Shi'ite political groups that run the heavily armed militias.

U.S. General Confronts Iraqi Leader On Security (WP/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 13 -- The U.S. Central Command chief confronted Iraq's prime minister on Monday over how Iraqi forces would halt raging violence and signaled a possible prelude to shifts in American policy on engaging Iran and Syria.

The meeting came as sectarian attacks killed at least 90 people throughout Iraq, 46 of them showing signs of torture. The U.S. military announced the deaths of four additional American soldiers.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, sternly warned Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he must disband Shiite militias and give the United States proof that they were disarmed, according to senior Iraqi government officials with knowledge of what the two men discussed.

One of the militias, the Mahdi Army, is loyal to anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. On Monday night, U.S. forces raided the homes of some Sadr followers, and U.S. jets fired rockets on Shula, their northwest Baghdad neighborhood, residents said. Police said five residents were killed, although a senior Sadr aide put the death toll at nine. The U.S. military said it had no comment.

In their meeting, Abizaid also asked the Iraqi leader to give the U.S. military a firm timetable for when Iraq's security forces could take full control of the country, according to the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the talks.

Maliki has been pressing the United States to move more quickly to hand security affairs over to his army, claiming it could crush violence in the country within six months.

On Monday, Abizaid asked the prime minister to give a detailed explanation of how he would do that. The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., recently said it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraqi security forces were ready to control the whole country with some U.S. backup.

U.S. officials did not respond to requests for comment on Monday's meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0094032

Also on Monday, police said a bomb detonated on a bus in the northeast Baghdad neighborhood of Shaab shortly after noon, killing 20 people. Sunni insurgents have frequently targeted Shiite bus passengers in sectarian reprisal killings.

Hours earlier, Mohammed al-Ban, a cameraman for Iraq's independent al-Sharqiya satellite television network, was gunned down in the northern city of Mosul. His wife was wounded, police said.

Iraqi Premier And U.S. General Discuss Syria And Iran (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 13 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq met here on Monday with Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, as Iraqi political leaders prepared new candidates for about 10 cabinet posts, lawmakers said.

In the third visit by a senior American official in recent weeks, General Abizaid and Mr. Maliki discussed the "influence of the neighboring countries on the security situation," according to a statement from the prime minister's office.

The reference was to Syria and Iran, which the Bush administration has accused of providing financing and weapons to militias in Iraq. But as the administration begins a broad reassessment of its Iraq policy, some — including Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, the closest ally of America — are proposing opening talks with the two governments.

At least 79 Iraqis were killed or found dead across Iraq on Monday, Iraqi officials said, including 10 commuters on a minibus who were killed when another passenger blew himself up, a photographer and two bodyguards for Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite. The military announced the deaths of four American soldiers, in Baghdad and Salahuddin Province.

Iraqi political leaders pressed ahead with a planned cabinet shuffle, presenting Mr. Maliki with candidates for the ministry posts that he wants changed.

Mr. Maliki has not said publicly which ministers he plans to replace, but he has been under pressure from the Bush administration to make progress toward stabilizing Iraq. The cabinet moves appeared aimed, at least in part, at demonstrating that he was making an effort.

Some officials say, though, that the problems among Iraqi leaders run far deeper than a rearrangement, even a sweeping one, can fix. Shiites and Sunnis are barely able to tolerate one another, and the tense relations make progress on improvements all but impossible.

It is a problem that the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress in the United States will immediately face.

"No matter how many new ministers, they are still going to have the same institutional problems," said one American official in Iraq, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not have permission to discuss the subject publicly. American policy is about to change, and the shift will emphasize effectiveness over sectarian balance, the official said. "Instead of having a rainbow coalition, they will have people who can get stuff done," the official said. "I think the U.S. will take a more hands-off approach."

Mr. Maliki has not said publicly which ministers he wants to replace, but lawmakers said Monday that he had indicated they might include the ministers of health, electricity and oil. Sunnis have accused the Health Ministry — controlled by the powerful Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr — of sectarian bias. They also contend that it has sheltered Shiite militias that have carried out killings.

The security ministries — Interior and Defense — did not appear to be part of the shuffle.

"Most of his problems are with the Sadrists," said Jalal al-Din al-Sagheer, a Shiite lawmaker from a rival party. There were also hints that two Sunni ministers and a Kurdish one would be replaced, Mr. Sagheer said by telephone on Monday.

But Adnan Dulaimi, a member of the largest Sunni bloc, said the replacements were distributed across sects and ethnicities. Ten of 36 cabinet posts were affected, he said.

Under the current rules, pressed on the majority Shiites by American officials early this year, Mr. Maliki cannot take sects or ethnicities out of the government altogether, and the blocs, groupings made up of political parties, will retain their allotment of ministries.

But Mr. Maliki can choose from among political parties within the blocs, which could mean that entire parties might be left out.

"He's not going to reallocate the ministries to the same parties," said Maysoon al-Damaluji, a secular lawmaker. The process, she said, could take several months.

Baha al-Aaraji, a member in Mr. Sadr's bloc, the largest in Parliament, said it presented Mr. Maliki with 18 résumés, three candidates for each of its six ministries — transport, health, civil society, tourism, agriculture and a subministry for provincial affairs. In public remarks over the past few days, Mr. Maliki has tried to press his fractious coalition to work together better. In a speech to governors of Iraqi provinces on Monday, he struck a nonsectarian tone.

DOJ_NMG_0094033

Regarding taking action against militia members, he warned the governors not to “look at his background or who he represents, or what sect or group or party he is from.”

The American military said Monday that on Sunday it captured four Iraqis suspected of killings, kidnappings and bomb attacks in a Sunni militant stronghold south of Baghdad. In a raid in Baghdad, it killed eight people and detained 41 Iraqis suspected of ties to Al Qaeda.

Iraqi authorities reported that the American military raided homes of supporters of Mr. Sadr in the northern Baghdad neighborhood of Shuala, The Associated Press reported. Helicopters and jets were called in and gun battles were heard by residents nearby.

Sunni Needs Not Met, General Says (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook,

USA Today, November 14, 2006

RAWAH, Iraq — The Shiite-dominated central government is starving Iraqi security forces in the Sunni heartland of the resources needed to fight the insurgency, according to American officers.

In Anbar province, a Sunni region west of Baghdad, many police officers haven't been paid for three months. "It's difficult to ask a man to risk his life if you can't even pay him," said Marine Brig. Gen. Robert Neller, deputy commanding general of Multinational Force West.

Winning over Sunnis is critical to achieving a political solution to the violence in Iraq. Retribution killings between the two Muslim sects have been growing this year. The dispute in Anbar highlights a growing fear among Sunnis that the government isn't sincere about helping them.

"That's why people in Anbar think the government in Baghdad doesn't want them to succeed," Neller said. "Sometimes I wonder if the government in Baghdad wants them to succeed."

Anbar is among the most dangerous areas of Iraq. Of 104 American troop deaths in October, at least 40 were in Anbar.

There are about 33,000 American troops in Anbar, spread across 53,000 square miles. The population is 1.2 million, about 80% of which are Sunnis.

In September, Marine Maj. Gen. Rick Zilmer, the commander of troops in the region, said he had enough forces to complete his primary mission of training Iraqi forces but not enough to defeat the insurgency.

That job will depend largely on the abilities of Iraqi forces. There are about 7,000 Iraqi police officers and 13,000 Iraqi army soldiers in the province.

Haider al-Ibadi, an adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said corruption in Anbar has prevented the government from paying officers more quickly. Some Iraqi officials in Anbar have submitted fake names of officers and fraudulently pocketed the money, he said.

Neller said U.S. and Iraqi army forces are making progress in recruiting police despite the difficulties.

On a visit to the village of Rawah on the Euphrates River, a police officer asked Neller for American forces to provide local police with more protection.

"Let's be honest with each other," Neller told the officer. "There are not enough Marines, Iraqi army or police to cover all this ground. And I can't tell you there will be more Marines coming."

Bishops Call For 'Responsible Transition' In Iraq (BSUN)

By Liz F. Kay

The Baltimore Sun, November 14, 2006

The president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops called Monday for dialogue and action on a responsible transition in Iraq, a statement quickly affirmed by the national group's members at their fall meeting.

"The statement offers a constructive contribution at a critical time," Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., told the 250 prelates gathered at the Baltimore Marriott Waterfront.

"Our nation's military forces should remain in Iraq only as long as their presence contributes to a responsible transition. Our nation should look for effective ways to end their deployment at the earliest opportunity consistent with this goal," the statement reads.

The observance of Veterans Day this weekend reminds the bishops and most Americans of the issue of Iraq, said Bishop Thomas G. Wenski, the bishop of Orlando and chair of the conference's international policy committee, at a news conference Monday.

"We don't want to ally ourselves with the extremes of the divisive debate that has taken place until now, the extremes between 'stay the course' and 'cut and run,'" he said.

DOJ_NMG_0094034

Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore said in an interview that "it's essential that we lift up the moral component of the situation in Iraq. We have to extract as much of the morality issue as we can."

The Iraq statement, which builds on a response issued in January, was a last-minute addition to the agenda for the fall meeting.

"The bishops read the exit polls and saw that the voters felt the biggest moral issue facing the country was Iraq, and so they felt they needed to say something about it," said the Rev. Thomas J. Reese, the former editor of America magazine, who attended the conference Monday.

John Carr, the conference's secretariat for social development and world peace, said some bishops had asked whether the national group would address the Iraq war at their fall meeting.

The bishops' conference has issued 18 statements and letters on the war, said Carr and Wenski.

"The work has been ongoing, but the decision that the bishops could not meet without addressing Iraq came in the last 10 days," Carr said.

The bishops also voted unanimously Monday to spend $335,000 of $1 million reserved last year to support a study into the causes and context of sexual abuse by clergy.

Researchers at John Jay College of Criminal Justice at the City University of New York will conduct the analysis and raise the remainder of the money for the project, which is expected to cost between $2 million and $3 million.

Voice of the Faithful, a group of Catholic laity calling for church reform, issued a statement Monday calling for full funding of the study if necessary.

"We would hope at least some bishops would encourage the USCCB to guarantee the funding of the entire study in the event John Jay College is not able to raise all of the remaining funds necessary," according to the news release.

In other business, the bishops considered the text of documents for the laity about the church's teaching on contraception and preparation for the Eucharist and guidance for bishops about ministry for "persons with a homosexual inclination."

The bishops are expected to vote on those documents Tuesday.

U.S. Bishops Call For 'responsible' Iraq Withdrawal (USAT)

By Cathy Lynn Grossman

USA Today, November 14, 2006

BALTIMORE — The nation's Roman Catholic bishops, on record for years opposing the Iraq war, approved a statement Monday saying U.S. troops should remain in Iraq "only as long as their presence contributes to a responsible transition."

The statement was a last- minute addition to the agenda for nearly 300 bishops gathered at the annual fall meeting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. Also on the agenda: controversial documents on Communion, ministering to homosexuals and contraception. Drafted at the request of several bishops, it began with "prayerful concern" for military personnel, their families and suffering Iraqis and calls for an end to "divisive rhetoric."

It says, "Our nation should look for effective ways to end (troops') deployment at the earliest opportunity" consistent with contributing to a responsible transition.

The statement, issued in the name of conference president Bishop William Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., reiterated bishops' "grave moral concerns" about the war and condemned torture. It calls for human rights and religious freedom for Sunni, Shia and Christian communities in Iraq.

"This is still a conservative statement. The key word is 'contribute,' " says the Rev. Thomas Reese, a fellow at the Woodstock Theological Center at Georgetown University. "The bishops can't answer this question. That's a military and political answer, but this statement points to the crux of the matter: Does American involvement contribute to improving the situation?"

Bishops will vote today on several documents that reflect their efforts to communicate core Catholic doctrine. These include:

·A document on Communion spelling out who is "worthy" to receive the Eucharist and telling believers not to seek Communion if they knowingly violate church teachings. Anyone — gay or straight — who is having sex outside marriage and married couples who are using artificial contraception should refrain, bishops say.

Rather than expecting priests to play cops over Communion, this document is directed to all the faithful "to help people form their conscience," said Bishop Arthur Serratelli of Paterson, N.J. "Moral law applies to all."

·Pastoral guidelines for bishops ministering to "persons with a homosexual inclination." It repeats the church's stance that homosexuals should be welcomed and treated with respect but should not have positions of ministry or leadership unless they are chaste.

It takes no stance on whether homosexuality is inborn or a matter of choice and says no one is morally obligated to seek therapy. The church condemns gay sexual behavior as a sin.

DOJ_NMG_0094035

"The focus of the document is getting individuals to live a virtuous Catholic life," Serratelli said Monday. "The tenor is to be more welcoming than condemning."

Groups representing gay Catholics complained the bishops drafted the guidelines without consulting homosexual Catholics and said it will likely alienate them even further. DignityUSA called for gay Catholics to be able to participate in "all sacraments and roles of ministry, leadership and service."

·The bishops considered a Q&A text on the theology of marriage and procreation designed "for the first time with engaged and married couples in mind," said Baltimore Archbishop William Keeler. An accompanying report notes Catholics use artificial contraception, condemned by the church, as much as the general population.

Also, bishops approved spending $335,000 for the first year of a study into causes and context of clergy sexual abuse of minors.

U.S. Catholic Bishops Call For 'Honest Dialogue' On Iraq (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

BALTIMORE, Nov. 13 -- The president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops said Monday that the United States should keep its troops in Iraq only as long as they are contributing to a "responsible transition" to Iraqi rule.

Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., noted that both the U.S. bishops and top Vatican officials sharply questioned the decision to invade Iraq in 2003. As a result of the invasion, he said, the United States now has "additional moral responsibilities" to help Iraqis secure and rebuild their country.

In a four-page statement authorized by the entire body of bishops but issued in his name alone, Skylstad called for Americans to move beyond the "shrill and shallow" preelection rhetoric that "reduces the options to 'cut and run' versus 'stay the course.' " He said the nation needs an "honest dialogue" that acknowledges past mistakes, recognizes positive developments and seeks agreement on concrete steps.

The statement came as the Bush administration and the soon-to-be Democratic-controlled Congress reexamine U.S. policy in Iraq, and as the bishops primarily are focused on internal church matters, including deep cuts in their budgets and staffs.

Their agenda for three days of meetings in Baltimore this week includes statements reaffirming church teachings on contraception, Holy Communion and homosexuality. But it originally did not contain any discussion of Iraq, leading some bishops to wonder aloud whether they were avoiding the most important moral issue facing the country.

In an opening address, Archbishop Pietro Sambi, the new Vatican ambassador to the United States, said there has been a "loss of credibility in the church" because of the actions of a "small but very damaging number of its ministers and its faithful."

By a unanimous voice vote, the bishops approved spending $335,000 for research of the "causes and context" of the clergy sex abuse scandal in the church. The study will be conducted by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, which previously researched the scope of the problem and concluded that nearly 5,000 U.S. priests and deacons have molested more than 12,500 minors since 1950.

Pakistan Link Seen In Afghan Suicide Attacks (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Nov. 13 — Afghan and NATO security forces have recently rounded up several men like Hafiz Daoud Shah, a 21-year-old unemployed Afghan refugee who says he drove across the border to Afghanistan in September in a taxi with three other would-be suicide bombers.

Every case, Afghan security officials say, is similar to that of Mr. Shah, who repeated his story in a rare jailhouse interview with a reporter in Kabul, the Afghan capital. The trail of organizing, financing and recruiting the bombers who have carried out a rising number of suicide attacks in Afghanistan traces back to Pakistan, they say.

"Every single bomber or I.E.D. in one way or another is linked to Pakistan," a senior Afghan intelligence official said, referring to improvised explosive devices like roadside bombs. "Their reasons are to keep Afghanistan destabilized, to make us fail, and to keep us fragmented." He would speak on the subject only if not identified.

A senior United States military official based in Afghanistan agreed for the most part. "The strong belief is that recruiting, training and provision of technical equipment for I.E.D.'s in the main takes place outside Afghanistan," he said. By I.E.D.'s he meant suicide bombers as well. He, too, did not want his name used because he knew his remarks were likely to offend Pakistani leaders.

The charge is in fact one of the most contentious that Afghan and American officials have leveled at the Pakistani leadership, which frequently denies the infiltration problem and insists that the roots of the Taliban insurgency lie in Afghanistan.

The dispute continues to divide Afghan and Pakistani leaders, even as the Bush administration tries to push them toward greater cooperation in fighting the Taliban, whose ranks have swelled to as many as 10,000 fighters this year.

A year ago, roadside bombs and suicide attacks were rare occurrences in Afghanistan. But they have grown more frequent and more deadly. There have been more than 90 suicide attacks in Afghanistan this year. In September and October, nearly 100 people were killed in such attacks.

Afghan security forces say that in the same period, they captured 17 suspected bombers, two of them would-be suicide bombers; NATO forces say they caught 10 people planning suicide bomb attacks in recent weeks.

Last week, for the first time, a Pakistani intelligence official acknowledged that suicide bombers were being trained in Bajaur, a small Pathan tribal area along the border. In a briefing given only on condition of anonymity, the official cited the training as one reason for an airstrike this month on a religious school there that killed more than 80 people.

The arrests of Mr. Shah and others like him, Afghan and NATO officials say, show that groups intent on carrying out attacks in Afghanistan continue to operate easily inside Pakistan.

Mr. Shah said he was one of four would-be suicide bombers who arrived in Kabul from Pakistan on Sept. 30. One of them killed 12 people and wounded 40 at the pedestrian entrance to the Interior Ministry the same day.

The attack was the first suicide bomb aimed not at foreign troops but at Afghans, and it terrified Kabul residents. The dead included a woman and her child.

By Mr. Shah's account, it could have been far worse. Mr. Shah said he and his cohort had planned to blow themselves up in four separate attacks in the capital. That they failed was due partly to luck and partly to vigilance by Afghan and NATO security forces. But their plot represented a clear escalation in the bombers' ambitions in Afghanistan.

Wearing a black prayer cap and long beard, Mr. Shah recounted his own involvement in the presence of two Afghan intelligence officers at a jail run by the National Directorate of Security. The Afghan intelligence officers offered up Mr. Shah because, unlike others in custody facing similar charges, his investigation was over. He is now awaiting trial.

Mr. Shah showed no signs of fear or discomfort in front of his guards. But after two weeks in detention, he complained of tiredness and headaches from a longstanding but unspecified mental ailment, something his father confirmed in a separate interview at the family home in Karachi, the southern Pakistani port city.

At first Mr. Shah, who was educated through the sixth grade, denied that he intended to be a suicide bomber, but said he had gone to Afghanistan only to fight a jihad, or holy war. "I was just thinking of fighting a jihad against the infidels," he said. "I was hearing there was fighting in Afghanistan and seeing it in the newspapers."

But by the end of the hourlong conversation, he admitted that he had intended to blow himself up in Kabul, and said he regretted his actions. He was vague about the target of his suicide mission. "I did not know where I was going to do it," he said.

After he was arrested, Mr. Shah said, he learned that one member of his group, whom he called Abdullah, succeeded in carrying out a suicide attack outside the Interior Ministry. "When I was arrested I heard about it and I thought it must be him," he said.

"They came here to be martyred," he said of his three companions, all Pakistanis, all around the same age, and all also from Karachi.

Mr. Shah himself is one of the 2.5 million Afghans who live as refugees in Pakistan and who, officials on both sides of the border agree, frequently cycle through the ranks of the Taliban and other militant Islamic groups.

The would-be suicide bombers arrested recently, the Afghan intelligence official said, emerge from two clear strands.

Some are linked to extremist groups that have long been set up and run by Pakistani intelligence as an arm of foreign policy toward rival governments in Afghanistan and India. They are technically illegal and the government now says it has cracked down on them.

Others are allied with Afghan groups like the Taliban and the renegade militia commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, also a longtime protégé of Pakistani intelligence, who has now allied himself with the Taliban, Afghan and NATO officials say.

Like Mr. Shah, several other would-be bombers arrested recently have come from Pakistan or were run by commanders based there, they said.

After a bombing cell of 12 people was picked up in Kabul recently, two of the men continued to receive cellphone calls while in custody, urging them to explode their bombs, the intelligence official said. The calls came from an Afghan commander called Pir Farouq, who lives in the Shamshatoo Afghan refugee camp in Peshawar, a frontier town, and is closely allied with Mr. Hekmatyar.

When Afghan intelligence, at NATO's behest, passed on the cellphone number of Pir Farouq to Pakistani intelligence officers, their informer, a member of the commander's inner circle, was swiftly killed, his body cut into eight pieces and dumped in the camp. NATO officials described the killing to journalists.

Another group of bombers was captured as they were planning attacks on NATO forces in northern Afghanistan. That cell was also connected to Mr. Hekmatyar, but organized by another of his commanders who lives in Quetta, a Pakistani border town, the intelligence official said.

In Mr. Shah's case, he and his companions had all studied at the same religious school, or madrasa, at Masjid-e-Noor, a mosque in Mansehra Colony, a working-class district in northeastern Karachi. Mr. Shah said he studied there for four years, earning the title hafiz, given to one who has memorized the Koran.

The madrasa was run until recently by Maulavi Abdul Shakoor Khairpuri, who, Mr. Shah said, was a member of a banned jihadi group, Harkat-ul-Mujahedeen. Mr. Shah said it was the maulavi who sent them on the suicide mission.

The maulavi had given him a note addressed to a man called only Umar, who was waiting for them when they arrived in Kabul. Bearded, aged 28 or 29, Umar was a Taliban member from Kandahar, Mr. Shah said.

The note directed Umar to give the group explosives and stated that the equivalent of about $1,400 would be given to the families of each bomber after they finished their mission, Mr. Shah said.

Umar handed them a white rice bag. Inside were four khaki vests, with three pockets sewn on each side of the chest where the explosives were placed. "It has wires leading to a remote control and when you press the button it explodes," Mr. Shah said.

"The vests were heavy," he added. "There were a lot of explosives."

Mr. Shah then started looking for a taxi. Someone, apparently an intelligence agent, offered to show him but led him instead to the intelligence office, where he was arrested. The other bombers slipped away with their vests. So did Umar.

The Afghan intelligence official confirmed much of Mr. Shah's story. So did Mr. Shah's father, Ahmed Shah, interviewed last month at his home in a run-down tenement on the east side of Karachi, though he said he did not know where his son had gone after leaving home three weeks before. The gaps and discrepancies in the father's and son's accounts seemed to indicate that neither was telling the full story.

When told why his son was in jail in Kabul, the father grew angry, but showed no surprise. "How can one feel when someone leaves the house without caring for his children — he has two small children," he said, a boy of 4 and a girl of 2.

"We got tired of talking to him; you could not talk to him," the father said. "Such a disobedient child, who does not care about anyone, who does not look after his parents, should go to hell."

Mr. Shah's teacher at the local mosque also contradicted Mr. Shah's account.

Maulavi Khairpuri, interviewed at his home next to the Noor mosque, denied being a member of the banned Harkat-ul-Mujahedeen, as Mr. Shah had said. But he did acknowledge being the local secretary of a pro-Taliban party, Jamiat-ul-Ulama-i-Islam.

The maulavi said he had no idea that Mr. Shah had gone to Afghanistan. He denied sending Mr. Shah on the suicide mission. "He was not brave enough to do that," he said dismissively.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Qwest Case Involving Privilege Protections (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider a case in which Qwest Communications International Inc. had been ordered to produce 220,000 pages of documents to shareholders in a civil securities fraud lawsuit.

Qwest attorneys had argued the documents were protected by attorney-client and work-product privilege.

Many shareholders involved in the lawsuit reached a $450 million class action settlement with Qwest, but claims are pending against former Chief Executive Officer Joseph Nacchio and former Chief Financial Officer Robert Woodruff.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court's decision that the company waived its privilege when it gave the documents to the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department.

The shareholders sued the company in 2001, about a year before the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department opened separate investigations into accounting improprieties that eventually led Qwest to remove billions of dollars in improperly reported revenue from its books.

Based in Denver, Qwest is the primary phone service provider in 14 mostly Western states.

The case is Qwest Communications International Inc. v. New England Health Care Employees Pension Fund, 06-343.

Daimler Audit Sparks Scrutiny As Executives Are Suspended (WSJ)

Disclosures About Bus Unit Prompt New Questions Tied to Internal Controls

FRANKFURT -- The suspension of several DaimlerChrysler AG executives, following an audit that disclosed what the company called irregularities at its commercial-bus business, is generating fresh scrutiny of the auto maker's internal-control and accounting mechanisms.

DaimlerChrysler, the world's fifth-largest auto maker by vehicle sales, said it detected the irregularities "in the context of a routine investigation of its own business." As a result, the company suspended an unspecified number of executives, effective immediately. A company spokeswoman said the number of employees suspended is in the "single-digit" range.

The spokeswoman declined to describe the nature of the alleged irregularities.

The auto maker also said the head of its bus operations, Wolfgang Diez, had resigned for "personal reasons" but declined to elaborate. Mr. Diez couldn't be reached.

The disclosure marks the second time this year DaimlerChrysler has publicly acknowledged having to take disciplinary action against employees as a result of possible ethical lapses within its business units. In March the company said it had dismissed or suspended several employees after an internal bribery probe found the company made "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe. As previously reported, the U.S. Justice Department is conducting a criminal investigation into the bribery allegations and whether senior executives were aware of the practice, and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is pursuing a parallel civil inquiry.

The DaimlerChrysler spokeswoman said the new actions aren't related to the bribery probe.

Public scrutiny of the company's control and accounting mechanisms has intensified recently as a result of the auto maker's admission on Sept. 15 that it expected its Chrysler unit to post a third-quarter loss of about €1.2 billion ($1.54 billion) -- more than double the amount it had predicted only seven weeks earlier.

The company has acknowledged being overly optimistic in continuing to build Chrysler vehicles even as inventories mounted. It has said that its practices for accounting for unsold inventories are consistent with industry practice and that it is aiming to return to profitability in the fourth quarter with new models like a compact Jeep and a redesigned Chrysler Sebring sedan. Many of the vehicles whose inventories swelled were Ram pickup trucks, Jeep sport-utility vehicles and Dodge minivans, the kinds of light trucks that U.S. auto makers have had trouble selling amid higher gasoline prices.

"They have to improve their controlling mechanisms internally," said Christoph Dolleschal, an analyst with Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein in Frankfurt. "There are already people saying 'how good is your controlling and auditing?' "

A DaimlerChrysler spokeswoman said company officials discovered the alleged irregularities at the bus division "on our own" and said the auto maker has taken steps to improve internal oversight. It established a "corporate compliance operations" department this year that examines its business practices to ensure compliance with anticorruption laws and the company's own ethics rules. The company last year set up a "sales-practices hotline" that employees can call when they have questions and to report "questionable events."

Wynn Resorts' CEO To Gain About $147 Million From Dividend (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Wynn Resorts Ltd. Chairman and Chief Executive Steve Wynn stands to reap about $147 million from the company's decision to issue a one-time special dividend of $6 a share.

Flush with roughly $1.4 billion in cash, Wynn Resorts declared the dividend -- its first since going public in 2002 -- to holders of shares of record as of Nov. 23. The total payout will amount to about $660 million. The company will pay the dividend Dec. 4.

"We have so much excess cash and had the opportunity to return capital to shareholders," Mr. Wynn said in a telephone interview from Macau.

Much of Wynn's cash on hand is a result of a $900 million windfall from the sale of a casino license in Macau to Australia's Publishing & Broadcasting Ltd. this year. Mr. Wynn opened his own casino in the Chinese enclave of Macau in September. The company also operates a namesake casino-resort in Las Vegas. Wynn Resorts shares jumped almost 8% on the news.

Mr. Wynn owned 24.5 million shares of the company, or roughly 24.2%, according to the company's most recent proxy filing. His Japanese partner in Wynn Resorts, Kazuo Okada, owns the same amount through a holding company. Each stands to reap about $147.3 million from the dividend.

For Mr. Wynn, the payday is about the same amount that he was forced to forgo last month when he was involved in a bizarre accident involving valuable art. In a much-publicized incident, Mr. Wynn, an art collector, accidentally tore a hole in the canvas of Pablo Picasso's 1932 painting "Le Rêve," which he was showing off to guests at the Wynn Las Vegas. Unfortunately,

DOJ_NMG_0094039

Mr. Wynn had agreed to sell the painting for $139 million to investor and art collector Steven Cohen. The sale was subsequently called off.

When asked if there was a correlation between the canceled sale and the dividend, Mr. Wynn said, "There is no connection whatsoever; that's a calculation I never came up with."

Analysts said they hadn't been expecting the dividend. Nonetheless, "the decision does not come as a surprise given Wynn's significant financial flexibility as a result of their sound operations to date," Joe Greff, casino analyst at Bear Stearns in New York, wrote in a research note.

And in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing, Wynn Resorts said the company's stockholder agreement was amended on Nov. 8 to require written consent from either Mr. Wynn or Mr. Okada's company Aruze USA Inc. before either party sells shares.

"We want to make it clear we're one shareholder," Mr. Wynn said. He added, "It creates one shareholder and makes life simple going forward especially if you want to increase your ownership, which both of us would do."

Separately, Wynn said that casino industry icon Jack Binion, whom Mr. Wynn hired in August to help open the new Macau casino, would no longer be involved in day-to-day operations in Macau. Instead, Mr. Binion will become a director of the company's Macau subsidiary. His restricted stock agreements and employment agreement will be terminated Friday. Mr. Binion wasn't able to be reached to comment.

Sticking With One Conviction (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, November 14, 2006

Prosecutors in broadband case agree four can go, but not the fifth

The government has conceded that four of five federal convictions against the former finance chief of Enron's long-defunct broadband unit should be tossed aside because they won't stand up on appeal, according to court papers.

If U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore follows the government recommendation and throws out those counts, Kevin Howard would face a maximum of 10 years in prison rather than 30 — and that's if she upholds the fifth count.

The government said in a filing that a flawed theory presented by prosecutors may have prompted jurors to convict Howard on four counts of conspiracy and wire fraud, so they should be vacated.

Howard's lawyers say the fifth conviction of falsifying books and records also was tainted and should be thrown out. Prosecutors disagree, saying it stands apart from the other counts and should stand.

"It's great news for Kevin," Jim Lavine, one of his attorneys, said Monday of the government's concessions. "It would be even better news if the judge grants it on all five counts."

The Justice Department didn't respond to requests for comment. Gilmore has yet to rule. Howard is slated to be sentenced in February.

Last May, a jury convicted Howard, 44, of the five counts for his role in a deal where Enron sold future profits in a video-on-demand deal to an investor so the energy company could book immediate earnings. Prosecutors said the deal was a sham because Enron promised to repay the investor.

Howard's co-defendant, former in-house accountant Michael Krautz, was acquitted of the same charges.

Stems from August rulingThe government's filing last week stems from an August ruling by a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that threw out most 2004 convictions against four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in another Enron case. In that trial, prosecutors said the Merrill executives deprived Enron of their "honest services" because they participated in a sham deal to help the energy company book bogus earnings.

The appeals panel ruled that the honest services theory didn't apply because the defendants' actions were aligned with corporate goals and didn't rob Enron of property or money. The panel threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions of three Merrill defendants because prosecutors wrongly applied the honest services theory, but upheld perjury and obstruction of justice convictions against one of them.

The panel also threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions against a fourth Merrill defendant for lack of evidence.

The appeals court rejected the government's request that the entire panel hear arguments on the issue. The Justice Department has not said whether it will appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, retry the case or walk away.

But the move by prosecutors in Howard's case appears to have bypassed another potential reversal by conceding before sentencing that most of the convictions should be thrown out.

"They have to maintain their credibility in the court of appeals," said Peter Henning, a law professor at Wayne State University Law School in Detroit. "It doesn't do any good to go in and make an argument that you know is going to be a loser."

DOJ_NMG_0094040

He added that Gilmore could toss out the fifth count as well.

"The question will be whether the court views that there's spillover, and whether the books and records conviction was tainted by the prejudice of having honest services in counts one through four," Henning said.

Howard and Krautz were among five former broadband executives whose first trial in 2005 ended with a handful of acquittals. Jurors were hung on dozens of other counts.

Howard and Krautz were the first of the five to be retried. Second trials of the other three are postponed indefinitely pending appeals.

Trading On The Enron Mystique (WSJ)

By Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Enron is dead. Long live Enron.

Five years after the Texas energy-trading giant collapsed, the traders behind some of Enron Corp.'s brashest efforts to carve out new markets are pushing further into those frontiers.

Enron alumni have joined hedge funds and trading operations capitalizing on fast-growing commodity markets that the company once dominated or helped develop, from its stronghold of natural-gas and power trading to experimental futures markets in pollution-emission credits and weather contracts. A few Enron refugees have even joined industrial or consumer-goods firms, where they negotiate contracts to reduce the risks of volatile energy, food and raw-materials prices.

The growth of commodity markets popularized by Enron, and the ability of its veterans to raise money in budding areas, is to some a validation of at least part of the company's model: trading commodities of all kinds.

"In the general population, there is an Enron stigma. In the trading community, there is Enron mystique," says Vince Kaminski, a former quantitative expert at Enron. After Enron's Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing five years ago next month, the sought-after risk guru moved to hedge-fund giant Citadel Group, and then to Citigroup Inc.'s commodities desk. He now teaches prospective energy traders at Rice University.

Before imploding amid accounting-fraud accusations, Enron plowed big sums and talent into markets criticized after its fall as quixotic or a distraction from its core business of transporting and selling energy. It even had investigated whether it could launch movie-box-office futures as a way for studios to manage the risks of a big flop, a former Enron executive who panned the idea recalls.

While most markets besides gas and power weren't big moneymakers for Enron, ex-traders today are piggybacking on the company's early investments in everything from pulp-and-paper products to coal trading. And they are finding their background a selling point, much as the collapse and bankruptcy of junk-bond pioneer Drexel Burnham Lambert launched dozens of careers elsewhere in the 1990s.

"Employers look at having worked at Enron as a risk-management experience, and they think people might have learned from the Enron mistake and those traders might have become better," says Michael Karp, chief executive of Options Group, an executive-search firm that works for many banks and hedge funds. The traders' renaissance comes as some Enron executives from other areas of the company have forfeited assets and begun serving prison terms. Even Enron trading veterans whose reputations were tarnished by criminal and civil probes are making inroads.

Former high-ranking executive Lou Pai, who oversaw Enron's efforts to push into a number of new trading markets, has put some of his Enron-related earnings to work as a silent backer of a Houston-area firm prominent in brokering pollution-emission credits, Element Markets LLC, court documents show.

Mr. Pai left Enron before its troubles came to light, selling hundreds of millions of dollars of stock to meet a divorce settlement, according to interviews and legal records and proceedings. He still faces civil litigation and potential regulatory scrutiny for his role in Enron's financial management, lawyers following Enron matters say.

His affiliation with Element Markets emerged after he attempted this spring to buy a portfolio of emissions credits from an Enron unit operating in bankruptcy protection. Officials of the Enron estate overseeing the sale alleged that Mr. Pai failed to disclose his identity as a former company insider in an auction. They said selling to a former insider posed a conflict and sold to another buyer.

Mr. Pai nonetheless landed the assets; he repurchased them from the winning bidder without Enron's knowledge, according to a consultant advising the Enron estate. Now Mr. Pai is working to break into trading carbon-dioxide emissions, several Enron veterans familiar with his plans say. Mr. Pai didn't return calls to his home or office.

David Delainey, a former high-ranking trading executive, pleaded guilty to insider trading in connection with Enron's collapse. Nevertheless, Louis Dreyfus Energy Services, an arm of privately owned global commodity merchant Louis Dreyfus, hired him to oversee a trading operation in Calgary, Alberta. Mr. Delainey was sentenced last month by a federal judge in Houston to 2½ years in prison. He didn't respond to interview requests before his sentencing.

Citigroup snapped up Stuart Staley, a successful coal trader at Enron. Mr. Staley, 40 years old, now runs the gas- and power-trading operations of Citigroup from Houston, where traders he sought to hire already resided or wanted to return. Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. and Bear Stearns Cos. are building energy-trading operations in Houston, among other cities, with former Enron traders. Barclays PLC's Barclays Capital unit and Deutsche Bank AG employ former high-level Enron traders.

Constellation Energy Group Inc., a large energy merchant, is ramping up its trading of coal and emissions credits in the U.S. and Europe with former Enron traders. Tyson Foods Inc., the meat and poultry producer, hired an Enron trader to run its commodity-trading and risk-management operations.

Nowhere is the Enron "mystique" stronger than with 32-year-old trader John Arnold, who founded hedge fund Centaurus Energy LP in Houston with $8 million a few years ago and employs other Enron alumni. The firm now has an estimated $3 billion in assets and would be larger if Mr. Arnold hadn't returned many investors' cash and winnings to keep his fund from growing unwieldy, investors and traders say.

Primarily a natural-gas trader, Mr. Arnold did well last month in volatile markets even as rival Brian Hunter at Amaranth Advisors LLC suffered multibillion-dollar trading losses, commodities players familiar with Centaurus's performance say.

Investors are rushing to back other Enron veterans. A Chicago-based fund of hedge funds has invested in a firm called Top Shelf Capital in Calgary, operated by senior former Enron trader John Lavorato and an Enron colleague, Jonathan McKay. They declined interview requests.

A former colleague of Mr. Hunter at now-liquidating Amaranth, Harry Arora, also was an Enron trader. Mr. Arora founded a new hedge fund, ARCIM Advisors LLC, this summer while Amaranth was still doing well.

Also hanging out a shingle: Jeff Shankman, the former president and chief operating officer of Enron's second-largest trading division. He is launching his energy-focused hedge fund, Trident Asset Management, this week.

Enron "created a fantastic alumni network," says Mr. Shankman, 39. "The thing I regret most at Enron is having to defend my tenure there," when "most of us were hardworking, decent people who did our best for a company we believed in."

Mark Tawney and another Enron alumnus, Bill Windle, were involved in Enron's early efforts to structure weather instruments for energy companies and other firms with payouts based on precipitation and temperature that affect their businesses. They moved on to insurance giant Swiss Re to build up its weather desk and then left to form a weather-derivatives-trading hedge fund in Houston last year. After finding that the capital-intensive transactions worked best with a large financial institution as a credit partner, they returned investors' money and have just launched a weather-risk-management desk in Houston for a unit of RenaissanceRe Holdings Ltd., a Bermuda reinsurer.

Some days, it almost feels like they are still trading for Enron: The Tawney-Windle group bought 10 of Enron's actual trading desks from a used-furniture vendor.

Apple Hires IBM's Rosenberg To Fill General Counsel Vacancy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 14, 2006

Apple Computer Inc. said it hired Donald J. Rosenberg from International Business Machines Corp. as senior vice president and general counsel, filling a post vacant since the spring.

Mr. Rosenberg had spent more than 30 years at IBM, most recently as the technology giant's senior vice president and general counsel. Before taking over IBM's legal department in January, Mr. Rosenberg was assistant general counsel for litigation and was responsible for IBM's interaction with government regulatory agencies. He also served as IBM's lead in-house counsel in a number of lawsuits and settlements.

"We're thrilled to welcome such a seasoned professional to our executive team," said Apple Chief Executive Steve Jobs in a press release. "Don has a broad range of experience that includes litigation, securities, intellectual property and antitrust, and he will be responsible for overseeing all legal matters and government affairs for Apple."

Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel, left the Cupertino, Calif., company in May, not long before it announced "irregularities" in options grants from 1997 to 2001.

The appointment comes as Apple faces legal challenges amid problems with past stock-option grants. The company said last month that Mr. Jobs, a tech-industry icon, knew that Apple manipulated some of its stock-option grants, citing the conclusions of an internal probe that found 15 instances of improperly backdated options and raised "serious concerns" about the conduct of two former Apple executives.

Authorities are examining whether companies fabricated the date on which options were granted to executives and other employees -- a practice known as backdating -- to give the options extra value. Backdating can run afoul of securities laws. To date, more than 100 companies are under federal investigation.

Apple said Mr. Rosenberg received a B.S. in Mathematics from the State University of New York at Stony Brook and a J.D. from St. John's University School of Law.

The Options Blood Bath (WP)

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

IN THE WAKE of the Enron Corp. scandal, we argued vigorously for new rules on corporate governance, but we never took pleasure in the demise of Enron's audit firm, Arthur Andersen LLP, which reduced competition in the over-concentrated accounting business and hurt employees who had done nothing wrong. In the current executive options scandal, likewise, defenestrating senior executives shouldn't be the priority. What matters is that the rules should prevent future abuses.

The latest scandal involves the practice of granting executive options on a day chosen retrospectively for the cheapness of a company's shares. This has the effect of enriching executives at the expense of shareholders: If a company's share price is $100, but a grant of 100,000 options is backdated to a day when the share price was $90, then the executive has been given $1 million. There's nothing wrong with such grants if they are disclosed properly. But frequently they haven't been. So far, more than 160 companies have been embroiled in the backdating scandal. More than 50 senior managers have been ousted, including, most recently, Bruce E. Karatz, chief executive of KB Home, a home-construction company, who will forfeit ill-gotten gains of about $13 million.

This loss of senior talent may be justified if the transgressions are serious. William W. McGuire, the ejected boss of UnitedHealth Group Inc., may have led his insurance firm to spectacular growth, but his greed in amassing $1.1 billion in stock options plus a pension of $5.1 million a year is matched only by the revelation that the board member who chaired the compensation committee had conflicts of interest. Even so, there are reasons to feel queasy about the broader options blood bath. The offenses mostly date from the years between Congress's 1994 obstruction of an accounting rule that would have caused the cost of executive options to be accounted for properly and the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, which signaled that Congress had turned serious on accounting honesty. So however regrettable it might be, the fact is that Congress sent a signal of tolerance to which executives responded.

Moreover, there has been little consistency among companies as to what merits an executive's ejection. The board of Apple Computer Inc. appears to have gone lightly on Steve Jobs, chief executive and high-tech icon. If that is acceptable, it's hard to feel certain that other chief executives, some of them with statures approaching that of Mr. Jobs, truly deserved to go.

If the ousting of executives provokes mixed feelings, what of reforms that might prevent abuses? Backdating was partly a way of granting executives "in-the-money" options -- ones that grant the right to buy a share for less than its current value -- without having to report them as an expense. But the accounting rule that Congress obstructed 12 years ago was finally pushed through in the wake of the Enron scandal, so now all executive stock options must be treated as an expense, whether they are in-the-money or not. So one incentive for backdating has already been abolished.

But it's still fair to ask whether the use of executive options should be reined in, if not by regulation then at least by company directors. Because options are opaque, they invite abuses. Why not give managers a stake in their company by granting them restricted stock instead?

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Allows Evidence In Leak Case (NYT/AP)

The New York Times/AP, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (AP) — Classified information will be crucial evidence in the C.I.A. leak trial and the special prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, went too far in his proposal to limit its release, a federal judge ruled Monday.

The defendant in the case, I. Lewis Libby Jr., former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is accused of lying about his conversations with reporters about a Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Wilson. Mr. Libby wants to use classified material at his trial in January to show that he had a lot on his mind and could not remember details of his conversations about Ms. Wilson when questioned by investigators.

Judge Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court said that Mr. Libby had a right to use some classified material at trial in January and that Mr. Fitzgerald's proposed redactions were too restrictive. "He is alleging both that the volume of his work would have impacted his memory and that some of the information presented to him as the vice president's national security adviser was so potentially catastrophic to the well-being of the country that the focus he had to devote to this information also impacted his memory," Judge Walton said.

Judge: Libby May Use Classified Data (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

Classified information will be key evidence in the CIA leak trial and Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald went too far in his proposal to limit its release, a federal judge ruled Monday.

Former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is charged with lying to investigators in the case and wants to present classified material at his trial in January to show jurors that he had a lot on his mind and couldn't remember details about the leak.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said Libby has a right to use some classified material at trial in January. Walton has not said publicly what must be allowed, and both sides are arguing behind closed doors over how the information will be blacked out for jurors.

In a ruling Monday, Walton said Fitzgerald's proposed redactions were too restrictive. The memory argument is a key part of Libby's defense, Walton ruled, and he must be allowed to use classified information to make that case.

"He is alleging both that the volume of his work would have impacted his memory and that some of the information presented to him as the vice president's national security adviser was so potentially catastrophic to the well-being of the country that the focus he had to devote to this information also impacted his memory," Walton said.

Walton said he isn't going to give Libby a free pass to allow all classified information into court. He said the two sides must balance Libby's need to defend himself with the government's need to protect sensitive material — a compromise that he believed could be achieved.

Walton told Fitzgerald to "go back to the drawing board and come forth with a more balanced proposal."

Libby is charged with lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame believes her identity was leaked to the press as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Complete Isolation Urged For Aryan Brotherhood Leaders (MCT)

By Kimberly Edds, The Orange County Register

McClatchy Newspapers, November 14, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - Four Aryan Brotherhood leaders who used an elaborate communication network to order murders and incite race wars to bolster the gang's control in prison should spend the rest of their lives cut off from almost all human contact, federal prosecutors said Monday.

Brotherhood chief Barry "The Baron" Mills, top lieutenant Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham and midlevel leaders Edgar "Snail" Hevle and Christopher Gibson were convicted in July of conspiring from behind bars to order the murders of rival gang members to protect their nationwide extortion, gambling and drug-traffic operation.

All four men, already serving time for other crimes, face life in prison without the possibility of parole.

Mills, Bingham and Hevle appeared in federal court briefly Monday to be sentenced for their role in the conspiracy. Gibson, who is recovering from back surgery, did not appear.

U.S. District Court Judge David O. Carter called the proposed conditions - which would keep the men from seeing or talking to anyone other than their attorney - "tantamount, if not worse, than death."

In court papers filed last week, Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe also asked that the men be banned from having any writing instruments and papers and barred from having books, magazines and other reading materials unless they came directly from the publisher.

"These are horrendous conditions," Carter said. "There is no human contact."

Carter refused to consider the restrictions without the signature of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He also asked for assurances from the U.S. Bureau of Prisons that they are up to the costly task. Sentencing was postponed until Nov. 21.

Just 11 federal inmates are incarcerated under such stringent conditions, Carter said. Among them are Unabomber Ted Kaczynski and Yousef Ramzi - the self-proclaimed mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing - and Hung Thanh Mai, an Asian gang member who executed rookie California Highway Patrolman Don Burt in a Fullerton parking lot and then tried to hire a hit on the trial judge and state prosecutor.

Prosecutors argue the measures are necessary to keep the Aryan leadership from commanding more violence in some of the nation's most violent prisons.

Even with Mills and Bingham housed in the nation's most heavily guarded prison in the nation - the Administrative Maximum Security Facility - in Florence, Co., the white supremacist Aryan Brotherhood has managed to communicate - and order violence, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0094044

Mills, 58, was convicted of ordering the murders of a dozen people, six of which were carried out. Bingham, 59, was found guilty of calling for the death of five people. Two of those were carried out.

Defense attorneys have argued that federal prisons are violent, dangerous places and the four men were just doing what it took to survive. Forbidding access to the outside world is "draconian and cruel," lawyer Mark Fleming said.

Witnesses during the four-month trial painted the Aryan Brotherhood leaders as a ruthless group who directed murders and other violent attacks using notes written in code or with invisible ink made from fruit juice or urine that were passed from inmates to friends, family members and even corrupt prison guards.

Their orders traveled between state and federal prisons hundreds of miles apart, sparking a 1997 violent race war between Aryan and rival gang members inside a Lewisburg, Pa., prison that left two black inmates dead.

Since the indictments were handed down in 2002, the four have posted stellar progress reports, with no behavior violations, Fleming said.

"They were nothing but gentlemen throughout the entire trial."

Judge Says U.S. Attorney General Must Approve Sentencing Request For Aryan Brotherhood Leaders (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ANA, California-A judge postponed the sentencing of four leaders of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang Monday, saying that any request by prosecutors to bar the defendants from receiving visitors, letters or phone calls behind bars must come from the U.S. attorney general himself.

The four men were convicted of murder, conspiracy and racketeering in a case aimed at dismantling the Aryan Brotherhood, a white supremacist organization accused of dealing drugs and spreading terror inside some of the United States' most dangerous prisons.

Prosecutors asked U.S. District Judge David O. Carter to bar the defendants from communicating with anyone but their attorneys. The government also asked that the convicts be prevented from keeping writing implements, paper or previously used reading material in their cells, but federal prosecutor Stephen Wolfe said he would drop that request.

The judge said such restrictions were "horrendous" and had been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. He postponed sentencing until Nov. 21.

Inmates subjected to similar restrictions include convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, Sept. 11 figure Zacarias Moussaoui and Ramzi Yousef, mastermind of the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

"If you're really serious about this ... the attorney general is going to make the specific request of this from the court," Carter said.

Barry "The Baron" Mills, 58, and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, 59, were expected to receive life sentences. Edgar "The Snail" Hevle, 54, and Christopher Overton Gibson, 46, face anywhere from 20 years to life in prison.

Mark Fleming, Mills' lawyer, said the proposed prison conditions are "draconian."

"They're cruel and unusual in my opinion," Fleming said. "It's worse than the death penalty."

Heir To Norfolk Shipyard Gets 17-1/2 Years In Child Porn Case (VP)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-Pilot

Virginian-Pilot, November 14, 2006

NORFOLK - Willoughby Warren Colonna IV, heir to a shipyard worth millions, was sentenced Monday to 17 1/2 years in prison for possessing and sharing child pornography.

A federal court jury convicted Colonna in August on 10 child pornography charges, including advertising on the Internet movies depicting girls, one younger than 5, having sex with an adult.

Colonna, 26, known as Bill or Billy, testified during his trial that he had no idea his computer contained child pornography.

FBI agents, however, told the jury that Colonna admitted the images and movies were his when they raided his parents' Chesapeake home in the summer of 2004.

Family members wept in the courtroom as U.S. District Judge Robert G. Doumar handed down the sentence, which fell at the low end of federally recommended guidelines but above the mandatory minimum sentence of 15 years.

Colonna declined to make a statement at the sentencing hearing.

Colonna's grandfather, however, testified at the hearing that he had hoped his namesake would one day take over the family business, started 131 years ago by the original Willoughby Colonna.

"It's always been my dream to have it continue in the family name," Willoughby Warren Colonna Jr. said.

DOJ_NMG_0094045

"I've had numerous opportunities to sell the business," he continued, "but I wouldn't feel right selling the place."

He said his grandson had worked in the shipyard along the Elizabeth River in Norfolk but had left to attend college. At one point, Colonna worked delivering pizzas.

Colonna's father testified that his son never exhibited any sexual attraction toward children.

"He's always been a good boy," said Willoughby Warren Colonna III.

"He's a very conscientious person."

Doumar asked whether he thought it peculiar that his son moved in with one of his former high school teachers when he was 18.

"Did you think that was a little odd?" the judge asked.

"Yes, I did," he answered.

The evidence at trial showed that Colonna had 400 videos on his computer that depicted prepubescent children in sexually explicit scenes, including one child younger than 5.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael C. Moore told the judge that Colonna could have made it easier on himself.

"This could have been a different story had he come in and pled guilty and said, 'I've got a problem and I need help,' " Moore said. "That's not the case here."

Colonna was sentenced under the federal Protect Act of 2003, which toughened child pornography and sexual abuse penalties, including mandatory minimum prison terms of 15 or 20 years for certain offenses.

"He had the promise of a great future," Doumar said in court, "which he did not seem to utilize at all."

"I don't understand any of it," he said.

Study: Way Less Porn On The Web Than You Might Think (MERCN)

By Elise Ackerman

The San Jose Mercury News, November 14, 2006

A confidential analysis of Internet search queries and a random sample of Web pages taken from Google and Microsoft's giant Internet indices showed that only about 1 percent of all Web pages contain sexually explicit material.

The analysis was presented during a federal court hearing last week in Philadelphia in a suit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union against Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and obtained on Monday by the Mercury News.

The ACLU said the analysis, by Philip B. Stark, a professor of statistics at the University of California, Berkeley, did not appear to substantially help the Department of Justice in its effort to prove that criminal penalties are necessary to protect minors from exposure to sexually explicit information on the Internet.

The Justice Department had commissioned the study as part of an effort to resurrect the Children's Online Protection Act, which was signed by President Clinton in 1998, but immediately challenged by the ACLU.

A federal district court in Philadelphia and a federal appeals court found the law to be unconstitutional. In June 2005, the Supreme Court upheld the ban on enforcement of the law but sent the case back to district court for more fact finding regarding Internet filters.

``One of the things we think came out of the government's study is that the chance of running into graphic content on the Web when filters are on is extremely low,'' said Catherine Crump, staff attorney at the American Civil Liberties Union.

Stark's study found that only 6 percent of all queries returned a sexually explicit Web site, despite the consistant popularity of queries related to sex. It also found that the filters which did the best job blocking sexually explicit content also inadvertently blocked lots of content that was not explicit.

Government witnesses argued that while the percent of sexually explicit Web pages was small, it still amounted to a huge number. ``A lot of sexually explicit material is not blocked by filters,'' Stark wrote in the conclusion to his study.

Attorneys for the Justice Department were not available for comment on Monday afternoon.

The eight-year-old lawsuit ignited widespread public debate last year after Google objected to a subpoena it had received to turn over billions of Web site addresses and two months of search queries to government attorneys. Google argued in federal court that the request would put both the private queries of Google users and the Mountain View giant's trade secrets at risk.

A federal judge subsequently ordered Google to turn over 50,000 random copies of Web pages from its index, but did not require Google to produce search-engine queries. Microsoft's MSN and Yahoo provided a sample of 1 million Web sites. MSN, Yahoo and AOL also provided a week of search queries.

Seth Finkelstein, a programmer and civil-liberties activist, said Google's stance was ``horribly self-serving.''

``There were no privacy implications in the sense that the data was restricted to a very small set of researcher who were under various sets of protective orders,'' Finkelstein said.

DOJ_NMG_0094046

Finkelstein said Stark's findings about the prevalence of pornography on the Internet are similar to other academic studies.

``What we are learning about the Internet is that it reflects life and that the Internet is not -- contrary to what some people might think -- more sexual than people are in general."

Dare Enters Guilty Plea (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, November 14, 2006

Real estate investor blamed for Urban League collapse admits to fraud, faces 27 years in prison

ALBANY -- Aaron R. Dare, a real estate investor who was once widely regarded as a visionary and rising star in Albany's minority community, pleaded guilty Monday to felony fraud charges in U.S. District Court as part of a sweeping FBI investigation of his troubled business dealings.

Dare, 37, who was accused of driving the now-defunct Urban League of Northeastern New York into financial ruin in 2001, has been plagued for years with allegations of underhanded business dealings, mismanagement of his rental properties and a series of unpaid debts. He faces up to 27 years in prison.

The FBI investigation blew open last year when federal agents raided the downtown office of Dare and his former business partner, Albany Police Detective Kenneth P. Wilcox, who died in an April car crash while on duty. The Times Union applied last month to have the search warrant unsealed, and the request is still pending before a federal magistrate.

Meanwhile, a federal grand jury is continuing to investigate multiple real estate transactions involving Dare and his business associates, according to a source familiar with the case. Dare avoided indictment Monday when he abruptly pleaded guilty and pledged to cooperate with authorities, including testifying before the grand jury examining the case.

His attorney said he has met numerous times with Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Storch to hammer out his plea and cooperation agreement.

Dare pleaded guilty to three felony charges. The first involved a scam to inflate the price in an $8.5 million real estate deal in 2001 when he purchased three major multiunit properties: The converted Hinckel Brewery near Lincoln Park in Albany; the Pastures Apartments in the Albany's South End; and the Old Franklin School Apartments in Schenectady.

Dare and the seller, Bernard Watkins, were later accused in an unrelated lawsuit of privately negotiating their deal to avoid paying $400,000 to a broker who had been marketing the properties. The outcome of that lawsuit could not be determined late Monday.

In 2004, taxpayers bailed Dare out of his debt-ridden real estate business as the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, which had insured Dare's purchase of the properties, took over the three apartment complexes and paid off the $7.4 million mortgage.

Watkins, who is not identified in Dare's plea agreement, is a target in the ongoing investigation, according to a source close to the case. Watkins could not be reached for comment and it's not clear whether he has retained an attorney.

In a separate charge, Dare pleaded guilty to conspiring with an unnamed business associate to falsely inflate the prices of 31 residential properties that were sold to so-called straw purchasers, including several convicted criminals, according to public records examined by the Times Union over the past year.

The mortgage fraud transactions took place between 2003 and December 2005 and allegedly involved Wilcox, according to a federal law enforcement official and another person familiar with the investigation.

The plea and cooperation agreement signed by Dare states only that a business associate, who is identified in the court papers as a "conspirator," took on the role of recruiting borrowers to obtain mortgages for residential properties that were controlled or owned by Dare and his partner.

Federal prosecutors declined to identify the properties, or the purchasers, in Dare's plea agreement.

Dare personally prepared the purchasers' mortgage applications and often falsely represented their financial backgrounds so that a bank would approve the deal, according to his plea agreement.

"As part of this scheme, the conspirator of defendant Dare would and did obtain cashier's checks in the names of borrowers as purported proof of their access to capital when, in truth and fact, this was not the borrowers' capital and the checks were retained after the closings by the conspirator of defendant Dare," the plea agreement states.

Dare and his partner in the scheme reaped the benefit of selling properties with inflated appraisals to purchasers who often had no means to pay the mortgages.

Mortgage fraud, fueled in part by a hot housing market and low interest rates, has been one of the nation's fastest-growing white-collar crimes, according to a special report last year by the Chicago Tribune.

DOJ_NMG_0094047

Over the past several years, Dare and Wilcox jointly operated several limited liability corporations, including title and real estate companies. Through those companies, they bought and sold, or handled closings for, dozens of homes, most of them in Albany's inner-city neighborhoods.

Dare was just 27 when he took over the Urban League, spearheading economic development plans that included building affordable housing, sponsoring the New Covenant Charter School and constructing an office building that the city bought for its public safety headquarters after a finance company that was supposed to occupy it, NFC Corp., went bankrupt and its top official was later convicted of federal fraud charges.

Dare's expansive vision caught the attention of Gov. George Pataki and former Vice President Al Gore, both of whom visited Urban League projects in Arbor Hill.

But all the while, the group was losing millions borrowed from banks and donated by charities. It ended up broke and owing $1.8 million it could not repay.

After the Urban League collapsed, Attorney General Eliot Spitzer cited Dare for misconduct in handling its finances and barred him from leadership roles in New York charities for 10 years.

"I'm disappointed because I've known Aaron since he was a freshman at Albany High School, and I've always liked the young man," Mayor Jerry Jennings said. "It's very unfortunate that he chose to do this."

Albany Police Chief James Tuffey, who took over the department in December, said he was not aware of the federal investigation. However, several departmental sources said it was known by certain police officials that the FBI investigation was unfolding.

Dare's attorney, Arnold Proskin of Loudonville, told U.S. District Court Judge Lawrence E. Kahn that Dare agreed to plead guilty in the face of overwhelming evidence.

"I made my recommendation and he made his decision," Proskin said in court. "Ultimately, it would be a negative result at trial, and Aaron knows this."

Dare faces a maximum potential penalty of up to 27 years in prison and fines totaling $750,000, plus restitution. Kahn ordered Dare released on recognizance, but under the supervision of U.S. probation authorities, pending his sentencing, which is scheduled for March 6.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, which take into account factors such as a person's criminal history, Dare could face much less than the maximum penalties.

But Kahn, citing those guidelines, warned Dare that "my discretion in sentencing you is somewhat limited."

Outside court, Proskin and Dare both declined to discuss the case.

"The agreement speaks for itself," Proskin said. J. Lyons can be reached at 454-5547 or by e-mail at blyons@timesunion.com.

Guilty Plea In Housing Projects Fraud Case (ALBIZ)

Albany Business Review, November 14, 2006

The former head of the Urban League in Albany, N.Y., pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to three felony fraud charges related to financing agreements for the purchase of multi-family housing projects and other residential properties in Albany and Schenectady, according to federal authorities.

Aaron R. Dare, 37, of Albany, faces 27 years in prison and/or a fine of up to $750,000 and other penalties when he is sentenced March 6, 2007.

Dare pleaded guilty to one count of wire fraud and one count of causing false statements to be made to obtain loans to purchase the Hinckel Brewery Apartments at 201 Park Ave. in Albany, the Olde Franklin School Apartments at 1675 Ave. B in Schenectady and the Historic Pastures Village Apartments in Albany, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Dare also pleaded guilty to conspiring with another person to commit wire fraud as part of a scheme to defraud private mortgage lenders to obtain loans to buy various residential properties in and around Albany.

The pleas were entered before U.S. District Court Judge Lawrence E. Kahn.

DOJ_NMG_0094048

The scheme involving the Hinckel Brewery, Olde Franklin School and Historic Pastures took place between late 2000 and August 2002. Dare provided false information to the private mortgage lender, AMI Capital Inc., of Bethesda, Md., and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development concerning the experience, qualifications of himself and his purported investors, according to the Justice Department.

Promissory notes in the amounts of $1.8 million and $700,000 were prepared and executed between Dare's company, Emerge Real Properties LLC, and entities affiliated with the seller that falsely made it appear to AMI and HUD that Dare and/or Emerge had approximately $2.5 million in equity and credit to apply toward the purchase of the properties.

In fact, the promissory notes were false and fraudulent, according to the Justice Department. Dare and his companies did not have the equity and credit to apply toward the purchase of the properties. As part of the scheme, another promissory note was prepared and executed, which was not provided to AMI or HUD, that effectively cancelled out the purported equity reflected in the fraudulent $1.8 million promissory note.

Also, the stated purchase price of the properties was inflated from about $6 million to about $8.5 million to take into account the bogus promissory notes, according to the Justice Department.

AMI loaned Dare's company $7.5 million to buy the three housing projects. The loans were insured by HUD. Shortly after closing on the loans in August 2002, Dare fell behind on payments and eventually defaulted. HUD foreclosed on the properties and sold them, suffering a loss of about $1.9 million.

Former Urban League CEO Admits To Defrauding HUD (NOCOGAZ)

North Country (NY) Gazette, November 14, 2006

ALBANY---The former chief executive officer and president of the Urban League of Northeastern New York pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to fraud charges, admitting to committing wire fraud and making a false statement in order to obtain loans from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

Aaron R. Dare, 37, could be sentenced to 27 years in federal prison and be fined $750,000 when he is sentenced March 6.

Dare's plea related to financing agreements he made for the purchase of residential properties in Albany and Schenectady. He pleaded guilty to one count of wire fraud and one count of making a false statement in order to obtain loans to purchase the Hinckel Brewery Apartments at 201 Park Ave., Albany; the Olde Franklin School Apartments at 1675 Ave. B in Schenectady and the Historic Pastures Village Apartments between late 2000 and August 2002.

He also admitted to conspiring with another person to commit wire fraud as part of a scheme to defraud private mortgage lenders to obtain loans to buy various residential properties in and around Albany.

The U.S. Justice Department said that Dare prepared and executed promissory notes in the amount of $1.8 million and $700,000 between his company, Emerge Real Properties LLC; the mortgage lender, AMI Capital Inc. of Bethesda, Md., and HUD, to falsely make it appear to AMI and HUD that Dare and/or Emerge had approximately $2.5 million in equity and credit to apply towards purchasing the properties. DOJ said that Dare had neither the equity nor credit.

On the basis of the promissory notes and statements, AMI loaned Dare and his company $7.5 million to buy the three housing properties, the loans being insured by HUD. After the closing on the loans, Dare failed to make payments and defaulted. HUD then foreclosed on the properties and sold them at a loss of about $1.9 million. 11-13-06

KCAL-TV, CBS 2, Los Angeles, November 14, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES Four National Guard members from the Southland who served together in Iraq pleaded guilty to federal charges for an embezzlement scam that cost the Army more than $340,000 in unauthorized pay, federal authorities said Monday.

Derryl Hollier and Luis Lopez of Los Angeles, Jennifer Anjakos of Chula Vista and Lomeli Chavez of Oceanside each pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy and one count of wire fraud, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Prosecutors say the four were members of the 223rd Finance Detachment, which processes pay for Army National Guard members. They were deployed together to Iraq from March 2004 to February 2005, when they returned to Compton, according to the government.

From March to December last year, an unnamed co-conspirator accessed a Defense Department computer that processed payroll, according to court documents. The co-conspirator entered more than $340,000 in unauthorized pay and entitlements for himself and the defendants, the court papers state.

Hollier, Lopez and Anjakos then kicked back at least $150,000 of the money to the co-conspirator, according to the government.

The four are set to be sentenced Jan. 29, when they face up to five years in prison and a fine of as much as $250,000.

The defendants have agreed to cooperate with the ongoing investigation, according to the Justice Department.

GOP Fundraiser Guilty In Ohio Coin Case (AP-Y)

By John Seewer, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 14, 2006

A former GOP fundraiser was convicted Monday of embezzling from a rare-coin investment fund in a scandal that contributed to the rout of Ohio's Republican Party on Election Day.

Tom Noe, a coin dealer and former Republican fundraiser, was convicted of 29 of the 40 counts against him, including theft, corrupt activity, money laundering, forgery and tampering with records.

The corrupt activity charge was the most serious, carrying a mandatory 10-year prison sentence.

The scandal surrounding the investment became a political liability for the GOP in Tuesday's election. Voters elected Democrats to the governor's office, a U.S. Senate seat and three of four other statewide offices after 12 years of Republican rule.

Noe stood still and stared straight ahead when the verdicts were announced. He nodded when the judge said he would be taken into custody. He did not look at jurors while the judge asked them to confirm their verdicts.

After Noe was taken from the courtroom in handcuffs, his wife, Bernadette, and their three children huddled together and hugged in a front row.

The Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation gave Noe $25 million in 1998, followed by another $25 million in 2001 to invest in rare coins.

Noe, 52, was accused of using some of the money to pay off business loans and finance a lavish lifestyle. Prosecutors did not say whether he used the money to make campaign contributions to Republicans, including President Bush.

Defense attorneys declined to comment after Monday's verdict. During the trial, they insisted Noe had permission to invest the money and that the coin fund produced $7.9 million in profits over seven years.

Separately, Noe pleaded guilty to funneling $45,000 to Bush's re-election campaign and was sentenced in September to two years and three months in federal prison.

Sentencing in the rare-coin case was set for Nov. 20.

Investigations into the coin investment led to ethics charges against Republican Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest to failing to report golf outings and other gifts. Four former Taft aides pleaded no contest to similar charges.

Investigators began looking at the coin investments after The (Toledo) Blade revealed the funds' existence in April 2005. State officials initially defended the investment, saying it earned more than $15 million. But then Noe's attorney told investigators the fund had a possible shortfall of $10 million to $12 million.

Authorities raided Noe's businesses, where they seized coins, several $10,000 bills and collectibles such as a Christmas card signed by Jackie Onassis and Beanie Babies.

Before the investigation began, Noe was a star of the Republican Party and was once a member of state boards that oversee the Ohio Turnpike and Ohio's public universities. He was a top GOP fundraiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans including Bush and Taft in 2004.

Ohio Jury Convicts Ex-GOP Fundraiser (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

CHICAGO, Nov. 13 -- A federal jury in Toledo concluded Monday that former Republican fundraiser and coin dealer Tom Noe swindled the Ohio government in a risky investment scheme that raised doubts about GOP leadership and contributed to last week's virtual Democratic sweep of statewide offices.

Jurors convicted Noe, 52, a former county chairman who helped raise more than $100,000 in 2004 for the Bush-Cheney ticket, of 29 of 40 counts, including theft, corruption and forgery. He faces at least 10 years in prison for stealing from the state workers' compensation fund and trying to hide his actions.

Noe's trial, with its vivid testimony of lined pockets and bogus transactions, made headlines in the three weeks before Election Day. The details -- starting with the very idea of investing $50 million in rare coins -- provided fodder for Democratic advertisements and voter angst.

The damage to the chances of Republicans, who held every statewide office before last week's vote cost them a seat in the U.S. Senate, as well as the governor's chair, was significant even before the 12 jurors and four alternates took their seats in the courtroom.

Along the way, the investigation touched Gov. Bob Taft (R), who pleaded no contest in August 2005 to accepting secret gifts from Noe and others. Members of the governor's staff admitted to borrowing money from Noe or using his Florida home.

Noe pleaded guilty this past May to a charge of illegally funneling $45,000 to President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign. Prosecutors said he arranged for friends, including elected officials, to donate money, then reimbursed them. He was later named one of 19 Ohio "Pioneers," who had raised more than $100,000 for the ticket.

Critics used the charges against Noe, who soon resigned from the Ohio Board of Regents and the Ohio Turnpike Commission, to argue that Republicans had become the party of corruption from Columbus to Washington.

Noe's misdeeds were mentioned in tandem with wrongdoing of Rep. Robert W. Ney (R), who quit the House after pleading guilty to accepting gifts and contributions in return for official actions. Among the benefactors and beneficiaries were lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his clients.

The Toledo coin case involved two chunks of money entrusted to Noe by the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, which gave him $25 million to invest in 1998 and another $25 million in 2001. The idea was to diversify a $15 billion portfolio, but things did not work out.

Evidence from Noe's bookkeeper showed that on the day he received the first $25 million, he paid off a $396,000 bank debt and transferred $1 million to his coin shop. As time went on, investigators said, Noe wrote himself $1.8 million in checks, bought a boat and wrote $1.5 million in checks to contractors and vendors.

He bought only a few coins.

"Tom thought that we could always make up the money and always make it good," testified Timothy LaPointe, Noe's business partner, who said he falsified invoices to trick state auditors and profited nicely.

"I did it for the money," LaPointe said, "and I did it for Tom."

Noe did not present any witnesses in his defense. His attorney told the jury that his client had done nothing wrong.

Assistant Lucas County prosecutor John Weglian offered a different version, telling jurors in closing arguments on Election Day: "The moment he got control, he began stealing."

Analysis: Missed Red Flags On Israeli Spy (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, Upi Homeland And National Security Editor

United Press International, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (UPI) -- The Navy counter-intelligence officer who garnered a confession from Israeli spy Jonathon Pollard says that U.S. agencies missed a forest of red flags about him and risk repeating the same mistakes today they made more than 20 years ago.

Ron Olive, the investigator who debriefed Pollard in 1985, says in a new book that "The warning indicators and the problems were clear from the beginning of (Pollard's) career" and even before, and that his bizarre behavior should have prevented him from ever working for the U.S. government.

"It's a wake-up call to U.S. intelligence today," he told United Press International, about his account: "Capturing Jonathon Pollard," published by the Naval Institute Press.

The book discloses what Olive says are fresh details about the sensational spy case -- a whirlwind 11-day-long investigation which eventually revealed that Pollard passed 360 cubic feet of "the most classified intelligence material the United States possesses" to his Israeli handlers.

Olive's book reveals that administrative convenience and bureaucratic bungling allowed Pollard to be recruited and promoted despite being "a dreamer, a fantasist," who repeatedly exhibited behavior that should have barred him from working for any U.S. government agency.

Among the red flags that investigators missed when Pollard was being considered for a top secret clearance from the Navy was his prior rejection by the CIA, where Pollard had applied for work in 1978.

Pollard told a CIA polygraph examiner that he had used marijuana 600 times and told nine foreign nationals that he was going to work for the agency. "Not surprisingly, he didn't get the job," Olive told UPI.

But when Defense Department investigators asked the CIA if they had any record of Pollard, they were told no.

"If they had told (background investigators) that Pollard wasn't hired because of drug use, he would never have been in the history books," Olive said, adding that "It was CIA policy at the time" not to disclose the results of pre-employment polygraph tests to other U.S. agencies. He said the policy was based on a misunderstanding of federal privacy law.

Following Pollard's guilty plea, Olive says the CIA agreed to change the policy and share that kind of information during background checks.

"The agency should at least get credit for keeping him out," said one retired CIA counter-intelligence veteran.

Olive also faulted the background investigators, from the Pentagon's Defense Investigative Service, for not even bothering to check whether Pollard had a masters degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University, Boston, as he claimed. In fact Pollard had dropped out and never completed the degree.

"If they had talked to one or two of his roommates" from Stamford University, where he got his first degree, said Olive, they would have come across accounts of his bizarre behavior.

Pollard told acquaintances at Stamford that he worked for the Israeli intelligence service Mossad, and had been made a colonel in an elite Israeli army unit, Olive said.

He added that on one occasion, Pollard had run through the corridors of a university building waving a firearm, shouting "everyone's out to get me."

In the event, Pollard was issued with his clearance via a waiver, said Olive, and was never actually subjected to a proper background check.

Olive said he fears a repetition of that kind of mistake is almost inevitable given the huge numbers of people being recruited to intelligence agencies and contractors to fight the war on terror.

Growing pressure for clearance investigations to be completed on a foreshortened timetable, so that people could begin work, is "a disaster waiting to happen," he said.

Even after Pollard started work for the Navy, Olive pointed out, his bizarre behavior continued, and should have raised serious questions about his reliability.

On one occasion, Olive relates, Pollard excused his lateness and disheveled appearance at a job interview for a naval intelligence post by claiming that his wife had been kidnapped by the Irish Republican Army.

Another time, he approached senior officials, asking for permission to run a "back-channel" collection effort against South Africa.

Pollard claimed that he knew a South African naval attaché in Washington, which was true, and that his father had been CIA station chief in South Africa -- an easily checkable lie.

"We've got a kook on our hands," said then-Director of Naval Intelligence Adm. Sumner Shapiro in April 1980, after a meeting where Pollard outlined his South African scheme.

Moreover, Olive said, Pollard was in desperate financial straights, "getting eviction notices, borrowing money from friends."

"You can't do that with a clearance," said Olive, noting that one object of the clearance process is to weed out people who might have a financial motive to betray their country.

Despite all this, Olive said Pollard was repeatedly promoted and eventually his clearance, which had been reduced to a "Secret" level because of concerns about his stability, was restored after he repeatedly threatened to sue the Navy.

Olive also recounts how FBI agents interrupted his interrogation of Pollard after he had begun confessing. He had acknowledged spying for Israel, but had not yet begun to reveal details of what he stole. Two agents arrived at the interview room and told Olive that Pollard had to be taken to the magistrate's court for an initial appearance.

"I said, 'Are you crazy? ... This man has waived his Miranda rights, he is confessing to espionage.' They just said it was FBI policy that suspects be taken to court on the day of their arrest and they had to take him."

"If they would have let us (continue to) talk to him ... I was convinced in the next two or three hours, we could have gotten the whole story," said Olive.

An FBI spokesman told UPI that the policy was based on U.S. Supreme Court rulings that arrestees have to be taken before a court within "a reasonable period" of time.

"I've had the same thing happen to me (during an investigation)," said the Bureau's Michael Brooks, "and it's frustrating. But those are the rules."

FBI: Pollard Passed Info To Pakistan And Australia (JERP)

The Jerusalem Post, November 14, 2006

According to new evidence released by the FBI on Monday, Jonathan Pollard not only passed classified information on to Israel, but also to Pakistan and Australia.

In a presentation given by FBI agent Ronald Olive, which was broadcast on Channel 10, it was revealed that Pollard was also involved illegally in arms sales to Taiwan, France, Kenya, Afghanistan, and Argentina.

In his report, Olive made no mention of what type of information Pollard passed to Australia and Pakistan, nor of how it was transferred.

Olive also said the FBI had initially believed Pollard was spying for the Russians, and that they'd had no idea at the time that Israel was involved or that Pollard was even Jewish.

Justices Reinstate California Killer's Death Sentence (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094052

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, reversing the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, restored a death sentence Monday for a Central California man who robbed and brutally killed a young woman 25 years ago.

The justices, in a 5-4 decision, concluded that jurors who decided the fate of Fernando Belmontes had weighed all the evidence — good and bad — before condemning him to die for the murder of 19-year old Steacy McConnell in Victor, Calif.

Monday's decision, the first of this term, was the latest of many over the last decade in which the high court's conservative majority clashed with the liberal-leaning appeals court based in San Francisco.

In this case, two sides differed over how jurors would have understood the instructions they were given in California death penalty cases in the early 1980s.

Those instructions were changed in 1983 to tell jurors they could consider "any other aspect of the defendant's character or record" that might call for life in prison, rather than death, for a convicted murderer.

Before that change, jurors were given a long list of factors to consider, including whether the defendant had a mental defect or disturbance, was dominated by another person or was intoxicated at the time of the crime. Finally, jurors were told they could consider "any other circumstance which extenuates the gravity of the crime." That phrase caused considerable confusion. Some judges said it allowed jurors to consider all factors that call for leniency, such as the defendant's conversion to Christianity while in prison. Others said it barred jurors from considering evidence that did not involve the crime.

Belmontes had a long criminal record in March 1981 when he went to McConnell's home, armed with the steel bar of a dumbbell. He clubbed the young woman over the head as many as 20 times, breaking her skull. He emerged from the house covered with blood and carrying her stereo. He and his accomplices later sold it for $100.

Belmontes was arrested and put on trial in San Joaquin County and convicted of burglary and murder. During the sentencing hearing, prosecutors described his violent crimes, including a recent beating of his pregnant girlfriend. A defense lawyer described Belmontes' impoverished and troubled childhood and his embrace of Christianity while behind bars.

After hearing its instructions, the jury unanimously sentenced Belmontes to die. The California courts upheld his sentence, as did a federal judge in Sacramento.

But when his appeal eventually reached the 9th Circuit in 2003, his death sentence was reversed in a 2-1 ruling.

Judges Stephen Reinhardt and Richard Paez, both of Los Angeles, concluded there was a "reasonable probability" that jurors would have spared Belmontes had they been free to consider evidence of his "future conduct" behind bars. Reinhardt believed the instructions incorrectly told jurors to look back only at the crime and not at evidence that showed Belmontes "would adapt well to prison."

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer appealed the case to the Supreme Court, which last year overturned Reinhardt's opinion in a brief order. The high court said the case should be reconsidered in light of its ruling in another case that same year, in which it had reversed the 9th Circuit and restored a death sentence for an Orange County murderer who had become a Christian while incarcerated.

Undaunted, Reinhardt and Paez reaffirmed their original ruling in favor of Belmontes.

Lockyer appealed again to the Supreme Court. This time, the justices heard arguments in the case and Monday issued a 16-page ruling reversing the 9th Circuit.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said the appeals courts "erred by adopting a narrow, and we conclude, an unrealistic interpretation" of the jury instructions. Two prison chaplains and Belmontes' church sponsors testified to his religious conversion at the sentencing hearing, he noted, after which the judge told jurors to weigh "all the evidence."

Kennedy wrote that it was "improbable" that the jury would hear such testimony and not take it into account.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined Kennedy's opinion in Ayers vs. Belmontes.

The four dissenters said "the natural reading" of the instructions given to the jurors wrongly barred them from considering evidence that did not involve the crime. By this reading, good conduct behind bars could not "extenuate the gravity of the crime" and therefore did not count.

"The incremental value to California of carrying out a death sentence at this late date is far outweighed by the interest in maintaining confidence in the fairness of any proceeding that results in the state's decision to take the life of one of its citizens," said Justice John Paul Stevens. Joining him in dissent were Justices David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

A pro-law enforcement group in Sacramento welcomed the ruling. "This well-deserved sentence should have been executed many years ago," said Kent Scheidegger of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation. "Claims such as this one, having nothing to do with actual guilt or innocence, should only be reviewed once, not litigated over and over for decades."

But a lawyer for Belmontes, now 44, said the case is not over yet.

DOJ_NMG_0094053

"This is not the end of the road," said Eric Multhaup, a defense lawyer from Mill Valley, Calif. "This is an unwelcome setback, but there are other issues that the 9th Circuit did not address," he said, including claims that his trial lawyer was "ineffective."

Supreme Court Upholds Death Sentence In California Case (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, November 14, 2006

The Supreme Court's first decision of its young term was a swift but divided opinion upholding the death penalty for a California man who killed a young woman during a burglary more than 25 years ago.

Yesterday's 5 to 4 decision was the second time the fate of Fernando Belmontes reached the Supreme Court, and once again the justices sent it back to the California-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, saying the appeals court had misinterpreted the high court's rulings in overturning Belmontes's death sentence.

The court heard arguments in the case on Oct. 3, its first day hearing cases. The court's initial decisions in a term often are ones easily reached, and while yesterday's vote could not have been closer, it reflected a common split between conservatives and liberals on the court.

After Belmontes was convicted of bludgeoning to death 19-year-old Steacy McConnell with a dumbbell bar, he and his attorneys presented evidence at the sentencing phase about his troubled childhood and also his conversion to Christianity. They offered what is known as "forward-looking" mitigating evidence, arguing that if given a life sentence, he could lead a productive existence in the structured atmosphere of a prison and perhaps even help others.

But his attorneys said the trial judge misled and confused jurors by not specifically instructing them that they could consider such evidence. Instead, the judge, after listing specific mitigating factors, issued a more generic direction to consider any other circumstance that "extenuates the gravity of the crime even though it is not a legal excuse for the crime."

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the majority, said the judge's directions were adequate.

"It is improbable the jurors believed that the parties were engaging in an exercise in futility when respondent presented (and both counsel later discussed) his mitigating evidence in open court," he wrote.

He noted in the opinion, joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., that it was the third time the court has upheld the specific instructions. Scalia, joined by Thomas, also issued a concurring opinion that said an additional Supreme Court decision, which Kennedy said he did not need to rely on, made this "an easy case."

But Justice John Paul Stevens said the trial judge's decision not to expressly instruct jurors to consider the mitigating evidence resulted in a confusion that "pervaded every aspect of respondent's sentencing hearing."

He wrote: "I simply cannot believe that the jurors took it upon themselves to consider testimony they were all but told they were forbidden from considering." Stevens was joined in the dissent by Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg, David H. Souter and Stephen G. Breyer.

The case is Ayers v. Belmontes, 05-493.

The court also announced yesterday that it was declining to review two highly publicized cases.

Without comment, justices decided against hearing the appeal of Michael Skakel, the nephew of Ethel Kennedy's who was convicted of beating to death his Greenwich, Conn., neighbor Martha Moxley when the two were teenagers 31 years ago. Skakel is serving a 20-year sentence. His attorneys had argued that the statute of limitations on the crime had passed before he was arrested in January 2000. He was convicted in 2002. The case is Skakel v. Connecticut, 06-52.

The court also declined to review author Lewis Perdue's contention that the blockbuster novel "The Da Vinci Code" is substantially similar to his own book, "Daughter of God." A federal judge had ruled that "Da Vinci" author Dan Brown had not copied the premise of Perdue's book, and an appeals court had upheld the decision. The case is Perdue v. Brown and Random House Inc., 06-213.

Justices Uphold A Death Sentence Twice Overturned (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — The Supreme Court on Monday reinstated a death sentence that a California jury imposed in 1982 and that was twice overturned by the federal appeals court in San Francisco.

Ruling 5 to 4, the justices held that a disputed instruction that the appeals court found had improperly constrained the jury's discretion to consider all the defendant's mitigating evidence in fact gave the jurors adequate advice and had probably not confused them.

DOJ_NMG_0094054

The decision was the first of the court's new term, which began on Oct. 3, the day on which this case, Ayers v. Belmontes, No. 05-493, was argued. Usually, the first decision of a term is unanimous, or nearly so, a logical result of the fact that unanimous decisions are easier to produce than those that must await a dissenting opinion.

No one at the court on Monday could remember a term that began with a 5-to-4 decision. But while this decision might, on the surface, suggest that the current court is on the way toward setting a record for internal division, that is not necessarily the case. A more likely explanation is that much of the majority opinion was in fact drafted last spring, before the court agreed to hear California's appeal.

The entry on the court's public docket shows that while the state's appeal was pending the justices discussed it nine times at closed-door conferences. With cases typically being discussed only once or twice, if at all, nine is an unusually high number. It suggests that a group of justices was trying to win majority support for an opinion that would decide the case summarily, without argument or further briefing.

The failure of such an effort typically results in a compromise decision to accept the case for argument, with much of the opinion already having been drafted.

In any event, the dispute among the justices, as disclosed in the opinions issued on Monday, with Justice Anthony M. Kennedy writing for the majority and Justice John Paul Stevens writing for the four dissenters, was one of nuance rather than disagreement on basic principles of death penalty jurisprudence.

The question was whether the jury instruction, which the court had found to be adequate in two earlier decisions involving different defendants, had given the jurors the impression that they could consider only one type of mitigating evidence.

The court's death-penalty precedents require that the jury be able to give open-ended consideration to any mitigating evidence the defense chooses to offer. Except for Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, who do not accept these precedents, there is general agreement on that point; those two justices nonetheless signed the majority opinion on the basis of their agreement with other, more specific precedents at issue in the case.

The defendant in this case, Fernando Belmontes, was convicted of beating a 19-year-old woman to death with a steel bar in the course of burglarizing her home. He wanted to present mitigating evidence not about the circumstances of the crime, but about his record during an earlier incarceration in a juvenile prison.

Mr. Belmontes was a model prisoner there who underwent a religious conversion. He wanted to argue that this record showed that he would be a well-behaved and productive inmate if he was sentenced to life in prison rather than death.

California's death penalty statute lists a number of mitigating factors that a defendant may invoke, concluding with a "catch all" factor that includes "any other circumstance which extenuates the gravity of the crime even though it is not a legal excuse for the crime."

While subsequent California Supreme Court and United States Supreme Court decisions made clear that this factor was more open ended than it appeared to be, permitting evidence that relates to the defendant's character rather than to the crime itself, the question in the case was how Mr. Belmontes's jury understood the factor in its unadorned form.

In overturning his death sentence through a writ of habeas corpus, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found there was a "reasonable probability" that the jury did not realize that it could take into account Mr. Belmontes's evidence of his likely behavior as a prisoner.

Justice Kennedy's majority opinion said the Ninth Circuit was mistaken. He said that various comments by the trial judge "made it clear that the jury was to take a broad view of mitigating evidence."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined the opinion along with Justices Scalia and Thomas.

In dissent, Justice Stevens said the record showed "that confusion pervaded every aspect" of the sentencing hearing, including the catch-all factor. All participants in the hearing were "addled," he added.

Justices Stephen G. Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David H. Souter joined the dissent.

High Court Moves To Reinstate Calif. Man's Death Sentence (LAW/AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

AP, November 14, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday moved to reinstate the death penalty for a California man convicted of murdering a 19-year-old woman during a burglary.

Justices reversed an appeals court ruling that threw out Fernando Belmontes' death sentence because the trial judge misled jurors who were considering whether to give Belmontes the death penalty or life in prison.

The 5-4 decision was the Court's first since starting its new term in October. It reflected an increasingly common division in death penalty cases between the Court's conservative and liberal blocs.

DOJ_NMG_0094055

Justice Anthony Kennedy said it was implausible to conclude that jurors failed to take all the evidence into account before settling on a sentence of death.

Belmontes beat Steacy McConnell to death with a dumbbell bar in the burglary of her home in 1981. He was convicted of the crime and sentenced to death, a decision upheld by state courts and a federal judge.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, however, twice commuted the sentence. The second time was after the Supreme Court told it to reconsider Belmontes' sentence under a decision that restored the death penalty in another California murder case.

The appeals court said the trial judge misled jurors about whether they could consider the prospect that Belmontes could live a productive life behind bars based on his good behavior during an earlier commitment to a California correctional facility for youth.

"It was mistaken ... to find a 'reasonable probability' that the jury did not consider respondent's future potential," Kennedy wrote in his majority opinion. Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Samuel Alito, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas joined Kennedy's opinion.

In his dissent, Justice John Paul Stevens said the majority opinion reaches a "strange conclusion" based upon speculation. "I simply cannot believe that the jurors took it upon themselves to consider testimony they were all but told they were forbidden from considering," Stevens said, also writing for Justices Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David Souter.

Overseer Finds Kickback Plan At University (NYT)

By David W. Chen And Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, November 14, 2006

TRENTON, Nov. 13 — Nearly a year after avoiding prosecution for Medicaid fraud by consenting to have a federal monitor investigate its finances, the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey is engaging in “illegal activity” that “persists to this day,” according to a report from the monitor released on Monday.

The report also accused the university’s interim president, Bruce C. Vladeck, who was appointed by Gov. Jon S. Corzine in the spring to restore credibility, of “trying to refute, rebut and bury” information about violations of anti-kickback laws. It was the first time that the federal monitor, Herbert J. Stern, had directly criticized Mr. Vladeck.

The report charged that university officials at “all levels” were “complicit” in concocting an illegal plan to pay 18 cardiologists nearly $6 million, starting in 2002, to refer their patients to the university’s hospital, in violation of federal law. Though school officials were warned on Sept. 25 by their own consultant that such practices could be illegal, they did not report it to Mr. Stern, as required under the deferred-prosecution agreement that they signed in December 2005 to avoid criminal charges, according to the report.

The cardiology kickback scheme led to $36 million in illegal Medicare and Medicaid payments that the school may have to repay, along with $43 million in potential fines and penalties, the report said. The doctors who participated in the plan could face lawsuits, the loss of their medical licenses and even federal criminal charges, though one interviewed on Monday denied all the allegations in the report and said he had fulfilled his responsibilities at the university.

For more than a year, the university, which is the state’s medical school, has been battered by an onslaught of bad news, both in print and in official investigations, suggesting that it was home to tens of millions of dollars of Medicaid fraud, wasteful spending and no-bid contracts awarded to vendors with ties to elected officials or former university trustees. The United States attorney, Christopher J. Christie, also threatened to prosecute the school.

In his report on Monday, Mr. Stern, a former judge and United States attorney, focused on how the university had been anxious in 2002 and 2003 about the prospect of losing its license to perform heart operations at University Hospital unless its cardiac surgeons conducted such procedures with more regularity.

In the report, Mr. Stern said he was particularly disturbing that Dr. Vladeck, an experienced health administrator, appeared to have misled investigators and downplayed allegations of wrongdoing found in the university consultant’s report in September. Rather than being told of the consultant’s report, Mr. Stern said, he learned of the cardiology scheme by reading about it in a legal publication about a settlement in a related whistleblower’s lawsuit.

When asked about the monitor’s report, Anna Farneski, a spokeswoman for the school, issued an unusually long statement by e-mail that was both apologetic and defensive.

“We have made it the clear and unvarying policy of the new administration at U.M.D.N.J. to cooperate with the monitor’s office in full compliance with both the letter and the spirit of the deferred-prosecution agreement, and in that regard, we were particularly dismayed by the monitor’s assertion that we had not been in compliance relative to this issue,” she said in the statement.

DOJ_NMG_0094056

In discussing the whistleblower's settlement, Ms. Farneski said that "there was no affirmative effort to conceal the substance." As for the report by the consultant, the accounting and consulting firm J. H. Cohn, Ms. Farneski said it "has serious methodological flaws."
